we begin to acquire the spirit of domination, and to lose the relish of honest equality. The principles of our forefathers become suspected to us, because we see them animating the present opposition of our children. The faults which grow out of the luxuriance of freedom, appear much more shocking to us, than the base vices which are generated from the rankness of servitude. Accordingly, the least resistance to power appears more inexcusable in our eyes, than the greatest abuses of authority. All dread of a standing military force is looked upon as a superstitious panic; all shame of calling in foreigners and savages in a civil contest is worn off. We grow indifferent to the consequences inevitable to ourselves from the plan of ruling half the empire by a mercenary sword. We are taught to believe, that a desire of domineering over our countrymen is love to our country; that those who hate civil war abet rebellion; and that the amiable and conciliatory virtues of lenity, moderation, and tenderness to the privileges of those who depend on this kingdom, are a sort of treason to the state." And again, in his speech on conciliation with America—a speech which would go down to posterity with no less fame than the most celebrated orations of ancient times—"As long as you have the wisdom to keep the sovereign authority of this country as the sanctuary of liberty, the sacred temple consecrated to our common faith, wherever the chosen race and sons of England worship freedom, they will turn their faces towards you. The more they multiply, the more friends you will have; the more ardently they love liberty, the more perfect will be their obedience. Slavery they can have any where. It is a weed that grows in every soil. They may have it from Spain, they may have it from Prussia: but until you become lost to all feeling of your true interest and your natural dignity, freedom they can have from none but you. This is the commodity of price, of which you have the monopoly. This is the true act of navigation, which binds to you the commerce of the colonies, and through them secures to you the wealth of the world. Deny them this participation of freedom, and you break that sole bond which originally made, and must still preserve, the unity of the empire. Do not entertain so weak an imagination, as that your registers and your bonds, your affidavits and your sufferances, your cockets and your clearances, are what form the great securities of your commerce. Do not dream that your letters of office, and your instructions, and your suspending clauses, are the things that hold together the great texture of this mysterious whole. These things do not make your government. Dead instruments, passive tools, as they are, it is the spirit of the English communion that gives all their life and efficacy to them. It is the spirit of the English constitution which, infused through the mighty mass, pervades, feeds, unites, invigorates, vivifies, every part of the empire, even down to the minutest member." The great principle then of the legislation of all good government ought to be, that of confidence in the people, and conciliation towards them; and the objection to this bill was, that its principle was not conciliation, but terror. It was the nature of freedom to be irregular, and to fall into occasional excesses, like the elements of air, fire, and water. Thunder and lightning sometimes did partial damage, but were, on the whole, beneficial. He supposed the present Ministers, if they could, would take care that there should be no thunder or lightning. They would say to the fire, "You are a good servant, and we like you very well when blazing in our kitchens or chambers, but we don't like you when you blaze in lightning, and sacrilegiously, as he had read in a newspaper not long ago than yesterday, destroy the spires of our churches when we are worshipping God." To the water they would say, "We like you very well when you are flowing along in delightful rills, but we can't endure that you should come down upon us in torrents of rain, in snow and hail;" and to the air they would say, "We are delighted with you when you blow in breezes, but we cannot permit you to collect yourself into masses of 50 clouds, without notice by seven farmers or graziers. You must not blow in hurricanes, or we shall deliver you over to a justice of peace. You shall occasion no disaster at all—there shall be no storms—you must always be still and peaceable." In this manner the Ministers must succeed in preventing these partial disasters; but they would soon find that the air would become noxious, that the waters would stagnate and be corrupted, and the result would be pestilence and death. It was the nature, then, of freedom to fall into occasional excesses, but who would for that reason put an end to freedom altogether? True, it was the duty of Government to suppress all dangerous agitations (Hear, hear): but then they ought to do so upon the pattern of freedom and the Constitution. He happened to differ with a late most respected friend of his (Mr. Wyndham probably) on the subject of bull-baiting; and he recollected that his friend had, in reasoning with him on the subject, argued thus—"True; the practice may be sometimes carried to a very improper excess; but do not, on that account, shackle the liberties and break down the spirit of the people." This was what he now said to Ministers. They knew how nobly the people had supported their burdens; with how much fortitude and patience they had borne their distresses; and how gloriously they had fought the battles of their country: and the liberties of the sound part of the community ought not to be infringed merely for the purpose of checking the excesses of some ill-disposed individuals. He himself did not hold exactly those opinions on the subject of Parliamentary Reform which he had once held. (Hear, hear.) He avowed it, and was bound to do so as a conscientious member of Parliament. He was no advocate for those schemes of Reform which scared the sound and considerate portion of the community; but he did not think there was occasion for these new measures, which were adopted in suspension of the liberties of the community. It was not wise nor politic to confide an authority like this to any one justice of the peace, and that was the great objection to the bill. Its tendency was to create disgust and disaffection; to produce the evil which it was intended to avert; and to drive the ill-disposed to secret and desperate courses. The bill was, in his opinion, founded on an entirely wrong principle; and on that ground he gave it his decided opposition.

The Lord Chancellor.—He was happy to hear from his noble friend, that he did not now entertain opinions on certain points in which they differed, to the same extent in which he formerly held them. It had been often said, that on these points he (the Lord Chancellor) was in an error; but he had now the satisfaction to learn, that his noble friend approximated a little to these supposed errors. He should be happy if he and his noble friend could approximate a little more; but with respect to this bill, unless his noble friend approximated to him, it was not likely that he should approximate to his noble friend. His noble friend had made some alarming observations on the effects of fire, air, and water; and spoke of controuling them as if they had been living within the jurisdiction of this country as British subjects, and liable to be regulated by acts of parliament. As a member of their lordships' House, he wished they were subject to their jurisdiction: for there was a fire in the house, which, whether it operated on the Constitution of the country or not, certainly often operated on his constitution, and that of others, in no very favourable way; and if they could restrain the mischievous effects of that fire, their lordships would do a great deal of good to themselves. (Hear, hear.) So with respect to air; it was a great misfortune that it was not a British subject within their lordships' jurisdiction; for then, out of regard to a most respectable friend of his now present, the clerk at the table, who found himself so ill at ease when these windows were open, he was sure their lordships would be very glad to put air under some regulation. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) As to water, few of them had much to do with it. (A laugh.) But he really could not believe that his noble friend was very serious in his opposition to the bill, when he considered that so great a portion of his noble friend's speech was made up of long quotations from Burke, and these observations about fire, air, and water. All in the measures now adopting, and in the vote which he certainly intended to give in favour of the third reading of this bill, he thought that he was forgetting the principle, that the liberty of the subject ought, in its utmost constitutional extent, to be secured; if he were convinced that he was acting so as to endanger those laws which, from long practical experience, he knew to be much more beneficial to the subjects of this country than the laws of any other state were to its subjects, then he should never, after the vote of this night, enjoy a moment's comfort while he lived; for he admitted, in its fullest extent, the truth of the proposition, that it was their lordships' most sacred duty never to suspend those laws which were enacted to secure the subject's liberty, except in cases of necessity. But why should they quarrel because their views were different as to the means by which the same object was to be effected? His noble friend acted for the benefit of those well-disposed subjects of the British empire who really wished to enjoy that liberty which the laws and constitution of their country secured to them. That was his (the Lord Chancellor's) object too: and for that purpose he now interfered, to check the machinations of those individuals whose design was not to enjoy, but to subvert, the laws, constitution, and liberties, of their country. (Hear, hear, hear.) The question, therefore, was a question rather of fact than of principle. It was merely this: what was the most proper course for the preservation of the laws, constitution, and liberties of the country: not for this week, or the next, but permanently; and so as to transmit those blessings, unimpaired, to posterity, which they had received from their forefathers? This was the great principle, as he understood the subject, upon which their ancestors had acted for their benefit; and this was the principle upon which they ought now to act for the benefit of their posterity. The great principle of the British Constitution he conceived to be the security of practical liberty; but what security would there be for liberty if our laws were unalterable—if we could not accommodate them to circumstances, and suspend their operation if necessary? In that case we should have made a constitution, not to preserve liberty, but to destroy it. The whole question their lordships had to consider resolved into the state of the times. What noble lords had to ask themselves was, whether looking at the circumstances of the country, there were not ground of necessity for the measures which had been submitted to Parliament in order to preserve the liberties of the people? It had been asserted, that the laws of the country, as they at present stood, were sufficient, if duly executed, for preserving public order and tranquillity. Whether the laws had been sufficiently executed or not, he should not say; he had not had the opportunity of determining that question in every respect: but with regard to that department of the laws with which he was best acquainted, he felt himself in a situation to question the sufficiency of the law. He had, on a former occasion, expressed an opinion to their lordships, that, since the passing of the libel bill, prosecutions were not likely to be more effectual than they had been before that period; and it was of importance to recollect how much that consideration influenced a question like the present. He could state what had occurred at a former period. In 1794 he became Attorney-General, and his predecessor in office had left a considerable number of prosecutions for libel on hand, and numbers afterwards occurred. If the laws were then thought sufficient, he was never charged with neglect in executing them; the charges had been of a contrary nature. With regard to himself, he had certainly never cared two-pence about the numerous libels of which his conduct in office had been the object. As he had never promoted any publication in his favour, so he had never stopped any against him: but when he saw, that the object was not to libel this or that individual, but every thing venerable in the Constitution, he then no longer hesitated to put the law, such as he found it, in force; and he did not believe that any body was, in 1817, disposed to blame him for not doing enough in 1794. But then, as now, it was found that the existing law had become quite inefficient, and the Legislature was obliged to interfere. What was then to be done, but to resort to new enactments; for the existing law was no more capable of restraining the spirit of libel, than it would have been to control the fire, air, and water, of which the noble lord had spoken. But it was said the people ought to be conciliated. The advice was good, but how were persons to be conciliated who declared they would not be satisfied unless they obtained what it was the duty of Parliament not to give. With regard to some observations which had been made on the provisions of the bill, his noble and learned friend was wrong in supposing that a meeting became legal in consequence of a notice having been given: for though the bill declared that a meeting should not be legal without notice, it did not follow that it should be legal with it. His learned friend also thought it extremely improbable, that any thing, as by law established, should be proposed to be altered at a public meeting, otherwise than by the authority of King, Lords, and Commons. He should wish to ask his learned friend, whether he recollected to have heard of a proposition made at a public meeting to resort to physical force, and whether that was not appealing to other authority than that of King, Lords, and Commons? If he did admit that there had been meetings at which propositions having that tendency had been made, he could not consider provisions guarding against such proceedings as unnecessary. There was surely nothing improper in enacting, that a magistrate might interfere on such sentiments being publicly avowed. It would be the duty of any magistrate at a meeting, to say to the individual who uttered words of such a tendency, that he was holding language he was not entitled to hold. A common constable might do this as the law now stood. He knew that it had been observed, that, as the same authority existed now, there was no occasion for this enactment; but the difference was, that the bill supposed a magistrate present at every meeting legally called, which was not the case under the existing law. If the meeting should resist the magistrate in executing the law according to his sense of duty, then, indeed, the consequences would follow which his noble friend had described; but these consequences were not the fault of the magistrate, but of the meeting which so resisted. Their lordships must, therefore, in considering every point always come back to this question—whether the state of the times be such as to require the measures recommended for adoption by his Majesty's Government? In deciding this question, they must have regard to other circumstances than the order and decorum which might be attributed to certain meetings. He was old enough to recollect the dreadful riots of 1780; and if he were asked, what was the most orderly public meeting he ever saw in his life, he should answer, that which assembled to meet Lord George Gordon. Nothing could have been more regular and orderly than that meeting was in the morning; and yet it proceeded, in the evening, to set London in flames. If then lordships thought it better to punish than to prevent mischief, their opposition to this bill would be founded on a rational principle. For his part he thought it wiser to look to prevention, than to punishment, as a remedy for the evil of which the country had to complain; and on that ground, and on the necessity of the case, arising from what he conceived to be the state of the times, he gave his support to the bill.

Lord St. John was ready to admit, that the learned lord had placed the inducement for passing this bill upon the only true ground—the necessity of the measure; and the only question was, whether that necessity was made out. Undoubtedly, to preserve the Constitution was the first duty of Parliament: to see that the laws were duly executed, the second. If any measure like this bill was necessary, it must be adopted, with however much regret they might acknowledge it to be called for: but what necessity enjoined, necessity also limited; and if necessity were admitted, it was still to be asked, whether this was the measure required. The reports on their lordships' table stated, that some law was necessary; but taking that for granted, it by no means followed, that any law which might be proposed by his Majesty's Ministers must of course be the proper one. Unfortunate as the present situation of the country might be, it was not more so than on former occasions, when measures of this kind had been resorted to: and yet it was impossible to find any precedent which warranted the proceedings now adopted. In 1722, the Habeas Corpus Act had been suspended, but not upon the Report of a Secret Committee. There was, on that occasion, no green bag sealed up. The papers were laid on the table in an open box, to which every member had access. The papers were referred to a committee, of which Mr. Pulteney was chairman, and every kind of evidence was admitted before that committee. But Sir Robert Walpole, when he recommended the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act to Parliament, did not confine himself to that measure alone. He did not fold his arms and say, that nothing could be done for the country. It was known that it was on the distress of the country, occasioned by the failure of the South Sea Scheme, that the Pretender built his hopes; and Sir Robert Walpole therefore, before he proposed to suspend the Constitution, exerted every effort to remove that distress. What, therefore, appeared to him particularly blameable in the conduct of his Majesty's Ministers, was their not following the example of that great statesman. They had not called Parliament together in due time for considering our public situation; and the reason they gave for this neglect was most insufficient. They had stated, that they thought the presence of members of either House would be more useful in their respective neighbourhoods. He certainly did not mean to deny the great utility of the residence of members of Parliament in the country, at a period when they had so many opportunities of administering relief to those that stood in need of it around them; but whatever benefit could be obtained in that way, was not to be compared to the advantage which was to be expected from those legislative measures, to which their attention ought without delay to have been directed. The failure of trade, and the great defalcation which had taken place in the revenue, were subjects to which the early attention of Parliament ought to have been called. It had, as he understood, been said in another place, by a person who, from his situation, might be considered as having the best means of knowing the situation of our trade, that the whole of our commercial system was founded on erroneous principles; but, while he admitted this, he also stated, that Ministers did not find themselves strong enough to attempt to alter the existing system, much as they were convinced it was wrong. Now, as the argument was, that dissatisfied persons availed themselves of the public distress to promote their mischievous designs, why had no legislative measures been proposed for the relief of that acknowledged grievance. It would have been a better course had Ministers proposed to remove the cause of commercial suffering by the repeal of that system of restriction in which it originated. If all the measures that Parliament could devise for this object should prove incompetent, then indeed it would have been time to resort to the suspension of the Constitution, and to severe laws like that under consideration: but that of which he particularly complained was, that such measures should have been adopted before any attempt was made to remove the evil which this course of severity was meant to correct. With regard to the provisions of the bill, he must assert, that they went far beyond the necessity which had been pleaded for them. Such was their severity, that he was persuaded many magistrates would hesitate to put in execution a law attended with such penal consequences. Nothing could be more revolting than to see such extraordinary powers vested in the hands of one magistrate under this bill, when the authority of two was requisite to pass a pauper from one parish to another. In the same manner the exempting power was vested in two magistrates, but in order to inflict the punishment of death one was thought sufficient. Indeed, the whole of the provisions, as far as he could understand, were contrary to the spirit of our ancient laws. It would have been acting with more humanity if Ministers had at once proposed to make the offences punishable by this bill treason; for then the parties would have the advantage which the law in the case of treason allows for the defence. If, in plain and unequivocal language, it had been declared, that to say any thing at a public meeting tending to bring into contempt the Constitution and Government as by law established, should be regarded as high treason, great mercy would have been shewn to those persons whose language might, as unfortunately as perhaps undesignedly on their part, be considered liable to that construction. For these reasons he felt it to be his duty to oppose the bill.

The Earl of Westmoreland could not after what had fallen from the noble and learned lord who commenced the debate, and the noble lord who spoke last, give a silent vote on this question. To express the ground on which he should vote for the third reading of the bill, he had to declare, that he gave his consent to the measure, not for the purpose of punishing those who had been guilty, but with the view of protecting the lives and property of his Majesty's subjects, and for the preservation of those liberties, which would be best secured by the suspension, for a time, of their enjoyment. The noble lords had assumed, that there was not sufficient danger to call for precautions; but that was a question which Parliament, he conceived, had already decided in the affirmative, and was not now to be argued. He certainly never considered the present measures, or others of a similar kind, which had been heretofore adopted, as injurious to the Constitution; but, on the contrary, as passed for its special protection. That such was the case, reference to the page of history would prove. Since this country had obtained the full confirmation of its liberties, similar measures had been adopted about twenty or thirty times; and, on every occasion, the Constitution, instead of being injured, came out from the trial unimpaired. Whether the suspension of the Habeas Corpus was necessary in war or in peace, depended on the state of the country. It might, in fact, be more necessary in peace than in war to adopt precautionary measures of the nature of those under consideration; for in war the Crown is armed with greater powers. If, therefore, any exigency did exist in a period of peace, it afforded the strongest ground for increasing the authority of the Government. The noble lord who spoke first had been extremely apprehensive that the people of England would be prevented from presenting petitions against Ministers; and that the sense of the country would in other ways be prevented from being heard. How were the people of England prevented from speaking their sentiments? The first thing the bill did was to declare, that it did not touch any description of persons who assembled under due and legal authority. In the next place it declared, that no meeting should be assembled unless seven householders signed the requisition. It was next required that regular notices should be given. Now, what was there in all this to prevent the people from meeting, and expressing their sentiments on the Property-tax, or any other measure, on which they might wish to make a representation to Parliament, or the Throne? Did it prevent the people from communicating properly with their representatives, to say, that meetings shall not be held for the purpose of proposing alterations in the law without the consent of King, Lords, and Commons? Another clause required, that there should be no clubs or places of meeting but what were known to the magistrates. To this clause the noble lord surely would not object. He must, therefore, contend, that there was no ground for supposing that this bill could in any way impede the people in the constitutional expression of their opinions, or present any obstruction to their petitions. He hoped there was as much humanity on that side of the House as on the other; he himself felt for those who might fall under the penalties of this act; he felt for the unhappy instruments of designing men; but he felt still more for those who suffered by their crimes. His sympathy for the case of Mr. Platt was more alive than for that of incendiaries or traitors.

Earl Grosvenor had intended to have entered at some length into the discussion of the general principles of the bill before them; but though he felt himself at present unequal to the task, he believed he should have a future opportunity of so doing, when in the course of the session he should call the attention of their lordships to certain topics, from the consideration of which it was impossible to exclude them. He had heard, with a degree of horror, that it was the intention of his Majesty's Ministers to propose the continuance of the act for suspending the law of Habeas Corpus. If this report should turn out to be well founded, he should deem it his duty, if alive, at whatever distance he might be, to come down to that House and oppose it, unless some very great alteration indeed should have taken place in the public mind, with regard to those questions which were the subject of complaint and dissatisfaction. The noble and learned lord (Lord Eldon) had defended this measure, as might have been expected, on the sole ground of necessity; but the noble earl who spoke last, had placed the defence of it on the principle of convenience. (Hear, hear.) He must object to the allegation in the preamble; and no such words were introduced into that of 1796, which declared, that "acts of tumult, riot, and disorder," had been produced at meetings assembled under the pretext of petitioning for a redress of grievances. He was astonished also to hear it stated, that there was no difference in point of danger between the period of 1796 and the present. He had acquiesced, though without taking a very active share in the discussion of them, in the adoption of those proceedings at that time; because the country was committed almost to a war ad internecionem with the French republic. It was generally supposed, that a correspondence subsisted between the enemy and persons in this country, the object of which was the landing of an invading army, which was to be joined by numerous parties here, and to effect the entire overthrow of the Constitution. Their lordships knew that a force actually was landed on the coast of Wales. How different now was our political situation! But they were told of the disaffection which prevailed; and if it could be shewn that a majority, or, comparatively, a very large portion of the population was disaffected, he should be prepared to withdraw his opposition. But he must contend, that every day's experience furnished new proof, that if there was disaffection in the country, it was of partial, and very limited extent. Was there any danger of tranquillity abroad being disturbed? Was it possible that any fears could be entertained as to the continuance of peace; for by whom was it possible that it could be interrupted? Not by Napoleon Buonaparte, whom we had chained, like another Prometheus, to a rock; not by the French Government, which we had restored; not by our allies, Spain, or Germany, or Russia. He believed that the state of their finances was still worse than our own; and that this alone was a sufficient security for their pacific dispositions. To what meetings, recently called to petition for Reform, were they to look for evidence of the sedition which was asserted to be so universal? Was it to the meetings of the counties of Kent, Durham, and Cornwall; or to those which had been held in the city of London? With regard to what had been said of the power still left to the people of assembling under the authority of the sheriff, or other magistrates, it seemed to be forgotten, that they would not always consent to the requisition for concurring a public meeting; and that in many cases they had already refused. He did not believe the new mode prescribed by the bill of calling meetings would ever be resorted to for he recollected an instance of the operation of the former act in 1796. Sir W. Addington, a very respectable magistrate, soon after the passing of the act, was called to a meeting held at Copenhagen-house. As he approached the platform on which the orator was addressing his audience, he made known his exposition of the act by exclaiming, "Pull down that fellow;" who was accordingly silenced, and the assembly dispersed. He was aware that this magistrate had been a person of irritable temper, and that he had incurred reprehension for his conduct. The ratio censoria of the bill was to put down sedition; but its practical effect might be to prevent petitioning for Reform. As to the former measures not having been followed by any execution of the severer penalty, he believed there had been one instance, and that was the case of a person who had himself been an informer.

Quam necis artifices arte perire sua.

He begged the House to reflect on the mischief arising to the community from measures which must necessarily operate to multiply the number of the odious and mischievous race of spies and informers. He believed the public mind to be possessed by a deep anxiety, amounting to a determination of obtaining some Reform. The people seemed generally persuaded, that "there was something rotten in the State of Denmark." This persuasion might be traced to the spread of education, and the extension of religious knowledge; for Christianity was decidedly favourable to the enjoyment of a regulated liberty. Religious despotism was, he felt convinced, trembling to its fall—a fall, the echo of which would resound through all nations. The noble earl concluded by adverting to the disturbances at Manchester, the account of which, he learned by information from Chester, had been greatly exaggerated.

The Duke of Athol wished to state in a few words the reasons which induced him to give his strenuous support to the present measure. He differed from the noble viscount (Lord St. John) in thinking, that the existing discontents were to be traced to the conduct of Administration. They were occasioned by the pressure of severe distress, arising from a combination of circumstances, aggravated by a very unfavourable harvest. He sincerely believed, that the measures resorted to had improved public credit, by giving confidence to the well-disposed, and exciting alarm in the disaffected. He thought the country had been rapidly returning, within the last two months, to its former state of prosperity; and that this was in a great degree owing to the energy with which the Government had acted on the spur of the moment, and before the evil had assumed a more formidable shape. Upon no other principle than that of giving up a part of public liberty in order to preserve the whole, would he have given his support to these measures. A person of his acquaintance, whom he had asked as to his feelings with regard to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, replied, that he would rather be in the power of his Majesty's Ministers for three months, than have his warehouses under the power of a mob for three hours. He abstained from addressing the House on most occasions, because his own opinions were more ably expressed and supported by others; but he could not sit silent and hear the distemper of the public mind attributed to a wrong cause. He was happy to find that the demand for manufacturing industry was reviving, as well as that a great improvement of the agricultural interests had taken place. All these circumstances convinced him that the distress, lately so universal, was daily decaying. It was with these views, and upon these principles, that he thought the present proceedings just and necessary. With respect to a renewal of the suspension, it was impossible for any peer to say, at that time, whether circumstances might call for it; but if they did, it would be the duty of Ministers to propose it; and if it was their duty, they would deserve to be impeached if they did not perform it, and even ask for yet greater powers if the emergency should require them.

Lord St. John explained.

Lord Auckland declared, that he had felt some anxiety not to lose this opportunity of proclaiming his opposition to the bill under consideration. His objections to it were founded in a sincere belief, that the necessity of the case did not warrant so violent a proceeding. (Hear, hear.) He entertained the utmost respect and esteem for several members of the Select Committee: but he considered their Report as an exaggerated representation of the actual danger, and of the prevailing disaffection. He knew of no one overt act, except the riots on the 2d of December, in the metropolis; and what were the circumstances attending them? A few mischievous deluded men appeared ready to execute crimes, and to commit murder and conflagration, hoping to find the majority of the population in a similar disposition; and in this attempt they had been disappointed. (Hear, hear.) The attack on the Prince Regent was not adduced as any ground for the present measure. For the correction of the offence of libel, the laws were admitted to be sufficient. The orators of the debating clubs had already fallen into dispute with their auditors, and could hardly inspire much apprehension. The Union Clubs, with their branches and affiliations, sounded at first very mysteriously, but seemed to him to be of little more importance, as an object of alarm, than the stories commonly used for the purpose of terrifying children. For his part, he saw nothing more remarkable in the times than the patience which had been manifested under such severe and universal distress. Where irritation had appeared, its consequences were prevented by the active and vigilant execution of the laws. In these circumstances he could not consent that the great barrier between the power of the Crown and the liberty of the people should be removed; or that the birthright of the subject should be left to the discretion of Ministers, liable to be influenced by the malice or surmises of individuals. A noble earl had alluded to the precedent of an indemnity. He did not admire the precedent, and thought the circumstance that rendered the suspension less hateful than it would otherwise be, was the right of action reserved to those who might be deprived of their personal liberty by its means. As a noble earl had pledged himself to oppose the continuance of the suspension, he, too, would pledge himself to oppose a bill of indemnity, if it should be proposed in favour of what might be done under the powers intrusted to Ministers by that act. The same objections which he had stated to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, applied generally to the provisions of this bill. The punishment decreed by the bill was quite disproportioned to the crime. In the country, where the people conceived they had a right to meet and discuss the measures of their Government, and where, before the enactment of the present bills, they might do so without restraint, there might be people who would object to the power of a single magistrate to disperse them, especially if that magistrate, as might be the case, was actuated by insolence, prejudice, or petulance, to curb popular privileges; and for this disobedience, which in their minds never amounted to rebellion, but was merely the offspring of ignorance or obstinacy, they were to be punished with death, and pay for their tardy dispersion, with the price of their blood. With this impression of unwarrantable and unnecessary severity—because he always loved and respected what was free—because he was proud that other nations, in attempting to throw off their yoke, quoted us as examples, and emulated our freedom—because he conceived, that the lowest were entitled to express their opinions of the conduct of their Government, as well as the most affluent or powerful; and because he did not wish to see this noble privilege invaded or abridged, he would oppose the present bill. The Constitution, he was convinced, would be impaired by it, instead of being protected, as had been stated by the noble earl opposite (Westmoreland). When he (Lord Auckland) heard of danger to the Constitution, he always had in his apprehension two classes of persons with whom that danger might originate. The first party was composed of those whose object it was to pull down all the privileged orders, to destroy every thing that savoured of the prerogative or legitimate authority of the Crown. The second, and not the least dangerous, consisted of those who were for narrowing our liberties, and who grudged the people the exercise of their undoubted rights. (Hear.) Between these contending parties, he wished to hold the balance even, neither yielding to the designs of the one, nor to the wishes of the other. He did not mean to enter into an examination of all the reasonings that had been employed in support of the bill; but he could not help alluding to an argument advanced on a former occasion, and repeated again by a noble duke (Athol) to-night, that the system of measures introduced by Ministers had improved our commercial condition; and, particularly, that the adoption of them had raised the public funds. The funds had certainly risen about the time the Constitution was suspended; but the connection between those two events, as traced by the noble lords, appeared to him as fanciful and extraordinary as any thing he had ever heard. It put him in mind of a story of a traveller who stopped for a night at Stoney-Stratford, and who, having in the morning asked the name of the place, said, "I am not surprised that it is called Stoney, for I never was so bit before with fleas in all my life." (A laugh.) The relation between the measures of Government and the rise of stocks appeared to him to be of the same fanciful description, and proved by the same profound and recondite mode of argument. (Hear.)

The Marquis of Buckingham was prepared to contend against his noble friends who had spoken before him in this debate, against the bill, that this measure was necessary in the present circumstances of the country; and that its necessity pleaded its justification. His noble friends had first denied the danger, and then they argued that, even upon the admission of the danger, the remedy was not appropriate. He differed with them in both their positions. He was convinced of the danger, and he believed the remedy was calculated to meet the emergency. He did not doubt the existence of the danger from the beginning; but even had he undervalued its evidence at the commencement of the session, sufficient proofs of it had since come to light. His alarm was not reduced by seeing those who usually advocated popular opinions blind to its extent, or even ready to deny its existence. The disavowal of danger was made by some, because they were anxious to under-rate what could not fairly be acknowledged without furnishing grounds for those measures to which they objected. He had heard, that there was no danger to the Constitution from the designs of those whose operations this bill was intended to restrain; and that, because they were not headed by powerful individuals, therefore their machinations were harmless. This argument had no influence on his mind, because we could find parallels in history of revolutions effected by instruments at first as insignificant and contemptible in appearance as the persons alluded to. The French revolution was no distant event of this kind. It had passed in our own time—it had occurred at our own door—it did not now agitate the world, but its memory was still fresh. The edifice was reduced to ruin, but the vestiges that remained shewed its original extent. We remembered its fall, and we should never forget the crimes and the atrocities on which it was built, or the blood with which it was cemented. On its broken and disjointed fragments we might read an awful lesson of prudence and caution; and the flame that blazed on its ruined summit warned us not to approach it, or to rear a similar structure. But how was this great and disastrous revolution begun? Was it begun by mighty armies? Was the first step taken by great generals? Were powerful nobles at the head of the first insurrectionary movements? (Hear.) No; it was brought about by the lowest of the people, by the efforts of the vile and the worthless from the most degraded ranks of society. (Hear.) Distress was the pretence, the motive, and the instrument. It was brought about by general suffering. It was brought about under colour of necessary change, and salutary reform. The moment the principle of reform was established, the moment that government was vilified, the moment the laws lost their authority, the danger began. Leaders were found to head the disaffected, and the most powerful joined the most contemptible in overturning those institutions which, by their command of so much physical force, they saw themselves able to do. (Hear, hear.) He did not compare the free government of this country with the arbitrary government of France before the revolution, but he was prepared to contend that the means employed against the latter were similar to those that had proved successful against the former; and that the difference of their nature would not make a corresponding difference in favour of their permanency, without salutary precaution on our part. It had been said, and said with truth, that the space was short between the dethronement and the death of a monarch. With a little modification, the maxim might be applied to a government or a constitution. Allow it to be stript of all respect in the eyes of the people—allow it to be vilified and degraded at public meetings, and it will soon lose its energy, and with its energy the power of prolonging its own duration, or securing public liberty. (Hear, hear.) The efforts of the insignificant prepared the way for the attacks of the powerful, as the pioneers of an army undermined a fortress before the soldiers advanced to the assault. When he saw small purposes attempted to be brought about by great means, his suspicion was excited—when he saw now the same combinations as in 1794—when he saw the same means wielded by the same hands (hear)—when he saw the same instruments at work—when he saw the same principles promulgated, the same doctrines advocated with undiminished energy—when he saw the same system of conduct begun, the same rallying signs used, the same banners of rebellion displayed as on that occasion—when he saw religion as openly scoffed at as in 1794—when he saw all these symptoms, he could not disguise from himself that the evil was the same now as then: and that a similar remedy ought to be applied. (Hear, hear.) The pretence of the meetings which this bill affected, was to petition Parliament or to address the Crown. The ostensible purpose was laudable, but Parliament should take care that assemblies of people collected for these ends should limit their powers to the accomplishment of them, and not convert their meetings into the means of outrage. The Constitution gave the privilege of petitioning the Legislature, or addressing the Crown; but where did it say, that under colour of exercising this privilege the people might meet to create confusion, to alarm the well-disposed, and to plunder the defenceless? Were they to break the laws of the land under the pretence of exercising a constitutional right, and then to plead this right a cover for the breach? (Hear, hear.) The legal exercise of the right should continue and be protected; but would any one say that it ought to be protected as lately exercised? Would any one say that the meeting at Spafields, that the meeting at Manchester, that the meeting at Portsdown-hill, took place in the due exercise of the right of petitioning, and that similar meetings ought still to be allowed? But, said his noble friends, why make a new law when the old laws were sufficient to put down the evil. He had not admitted that the existing laws were sufficient, nor was he prepared to do so. All the House knew the means that were employed to evade the law; the whole country knew that meetings might take place under the ruling demagogue of the day, in which the people might be told that Parliament were careless of their prayers, and were determined to refuse redress; that the Executive had resolved on their ruin; and, in short, in which their passions might be excited, so as to carry them beyond their own control, into acts of tumult and riot. When they had been hurried by seditious and inflammatory harangues to breaches of the peace, the riot act might then be read and the multitude dispersed; or, if they refused to disperse, they might be punished. This was the law as it at present stood. Was this law sufficient to meet the exigency of the times? Was it better to punish after a breach of the peace had happened, than to prevent the peace from being broken? Was it better to allow outrages to be committed, that they might be punished, than to guard against their commission, and save the vengeance of the law? But then, said his noble friends, one of them in particular, (Lord Erskine,) why allow such power to one magistrate as this bill invests him with? When they made this objection, they forgot the powers of the law as it at present stood. Could not one magistrate read the riot act? Could not one magistrate commit on his own responsibility? How foolish, therefore, was it to permit one magistrate to order the military to fire upon the multitude who refused to disperse, and to deny his competence to order a simple dispersion. How inconsistent was it to declare the sufficiency of one for an act of punishment, and to demand the concurrence of two in an act of prevention or precaution. (Hear, hear.) The real enemies of the people were those who, out of tenderness for their wishes or opinions, would allow them to proceed to abuse their privileges, and to degrade into instruments of faction or sedition their most sacred rights, that of petitioning the Legislature or addressing the Crown. Considering the men who employed the privilege of petitioning for their own destruction as its real enemies; conceiving, likewise, that they were the worst enemies of the people, he (Lord B.) would support the present bill. Good effects had already resulted from the measures past, or in progress. Why had the Spafields meeting been put off, but because the objects proposed to be accomplished by it could not be openly professed (hear); because the deluded people were only to be assembled for the purposes of confusion? Believing, as he did, that in the real Constitution is comprehended obedience to the laws; believing that the real rights of the people could best be preserved by guarding them from abuse; and being of opinion that the present measure was calculated to accomplish the object, he would vote for the third reading of the bill. (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of Darnley would offer a few observations. The noble marquis (Buckingham) who had just sat down had said, that the means employed to bring about the French revolution, and those now employed by the discontented in this country, were of the same kind. He (Lord D.) could not assent to the proposition. The revolutionary party in France was assisted by the arbitrary nature of the Government—by an extensive and prodigal court. Circumstances did not exist to the same extent in this country. He (the noble lord) believed in the danger of no conspiracy, far less of the insignificant and contemptible party which was said to have conspired. The general anxiety was directed to Parliamentary Reform, and the general agitation rose from distress. How did the matter stand? We had enjoyed peace now for some time, but we were still suffering under the pressure of severe distress: the manufacturing, the commercial, and the agricultural classes were all suffering. In consequence of this, it was natural to expect that a few ill-designing persons should wish to take advantage of the irritation of the public mind. But how had they shewn their temper? Where was there any dangerous meeting but at Spafields? It was now nearly four months since that meeting. At the first meeting there was some rioting; and Government, if they had been anxious to prevent a second, should have called Parliament together earlier, so as to obtain its assistance if they really thought the present measures necessary. On the 2d of December there had been some outrage, but few joined the mob, its progress being arrested by that active magistrate, the Lord Mayor, to whose exertions he mainly attributed, in this season of difficulty, the preservation of the peace of the metropolis. Had, however, the Ministers been alarmed, they ought to have called Parliament to take measures of prevention. All this was, however, allowed in order that Ministers might obtain their own ends; that they might have a pretence for their arbitrary measures; and might be enabled to confound those who opposed the abuses of administration with those who endeavoured to effect a revolution. Though the laws as they stood were, in his view, competent to the preservation of the public peace, he would not have objected to such clauses in the bill as those by which such meetings as that of Spafields might be prevented; but when he was asked to give such powers to a single magistrate as those with which the present bill would invest him, he could not consent to the demand. His noble friend (the Marquis of Buckingham) had made a mistake in comparing the powers of the magistrate under the riot act, and under this bill. In the riot act his duty was clear, because the nature of the assemblage could not be doubted; but under the present bill there was no overt act. The meeting was legally assembled, and was to be dispersed upon his discretionary view of the doctrines promulgated, or his opinion that they tended to bring into hatred and contempt the Government. He could not, therefore, give his consent to the bill. He (Lord D.) could not concur in an observation that had fallen from the noble earl (Westmoreland) opposite, that because we had reduced the army, and were at peace, there was greater danger than in war; and that, consequently, this measure was necessary to come in aid of a military force. If this argument was useful for any thing, it tended to shew, that in reducing the army we had violated the Constitution, and that a standing force was the only safeguard of our freedom.

The Earl of Aberdeen allowed that the bill must be founded on necessity, but contended, that if its necessity were proved, its policy was sufficiently established. The noble and learned lord (Erskine) had said that the general opinion of the country was against it: he had conversed with many on the subject, and, so far as he could ascertain their sentiments, they were decidedly in its favour. There might be different measures of necessity; some would say that it was only necessary when the great majority of the people were disaffected; some, when a considerable number; and others, when we were upon the eve of a revolution. Without determining upon the numbers which created the degree of danger necessary for such a bill, he would only remark, that revolutions began often in small minorities; but want of number was made up by an excess of activity and energy. He was perfectly satisfied, that without some measure like the present, there was great danger to the Constitution. The resemblance between the present time and the period of 1794 was denied, because we were then at war, and were now at peace; but the question was not respecting peace or war, but danger or security. Bloodshed and plunder might be effected as easily in peace as in war, if the discontents of the people were equally strong. A noble marquis, on a former night, had attributed the general distress and discontent to the acts of the Government. He himself had attended as anxiously as he could to that question, but he could not see how our people suffered by the annexation of Genoa to Piedmont, or of Lombardy to Austria. If this were the only account of the distress, he (Lord Aberdeen) despaired of finding its true cause. The only manner in which Government could be said to distress the people was by imposing burdens upon them. The only relief in their power was to lighten those burdens, which they were doing by all the means within their reach.

Earl Grosvenor explained.

The Duke of Sussex did not intend to have risen on the present occasion; but his political opinions, and his notions of the Constitution, were so different from those maintained on the other side of the House, that he could not give a silent vote. He would not follow the example of the noble lords who took their precedents from foreign countries—a conduct which, without any disrespect, he might say, was foreign to the present subject. A noble marquis near him (Buckingham) had said that, at the commencement of the French revolution, no men of consequence were engaged in it; this he was not willing to allow. Although few men of rank were at first engaged in it, yet many men of talents, and vast numbers of literary characters, were active promoters of it. It was supported likewise by one of the royal family. When that person of great rank joined it, both he and many of his partisans were unaware of the extent to which it would be carried, or of the dangers which it threatened. He was perfectly unacquainted with that personage, but he was convinced that he could not foresee, much less control, the storm which he and his coadjutors had kindled. Many circumstances contributed to precipitate that country into danger, which did not affect England at the present moment, and without which the parallel was imperfect. Among these was bankruptcy, with which we were not threatened. He did not mean, however, to go at length into the subject, but merely to controvert an opinion of the other side, and to state shortly his own view of the Constitution. He thought it most advisable to stand by the principles of the Constitution, such as it had hitherto existed; and he was persuaded that any deviation from those principles would only bring on the misfortune it was meant to avert. This he said most conscientiously, and could not feel satisfied had he given a silent vote on the present occasion.

Lord Sidmouth, after observing that the bill, as it stood at present, contained a clause for the prevention of meetings within a mile of the door of Westminster-hall, stated, that the restriction was not intended to be such as to create a difficulty to the inhabitants of Westminster. It had been considered since yesterday, that Covent-garden, the usual place for holding elections for Westminster, was within the precincts of that city, and that the borough of Southwark did not form any of the usual avenues to Parliament. He therefore proposed to withdraw the clause, that no persons, above the number of 50, should meet within a mile of the door of Westminster-hall, and to substitute, as an amendment, the words, “saving and excepting in St. Paul’s, Covent-garden, and the borough of Southwark.” The clause, so amended, could not produce any inconvenience to the inhabitants of Westminster or the Borough: and as it would at all times secure a free passage to the House, he should propose that it might be permanent.

Lord Holland objected to the substance, form and time, of the clause. When these measures of coercion had been first adopted, he had himself been willing to consider what step might not be permanently disadvantageous to the people, and yet might meet the wishes even of those who thought all public meetings dangerous. He then thought that meetings near the House of Parliament might with propriety be prevented; not because they were dangerous, but because they sometimes presented an obstruction to the performance of parliamentary duties; and therefore, while Parliament was sitting, he thought there was no great objection to such a clause.—But the present clause particularly marked out the inhabitants of Westminster, though there was no reason why they should be so distinguished. Neither was there any reason why the mile should be computed from the door of Westminster-hall, for Parliament might not always be stationary, and it were better that the boundary should be drawn from the place in which Parliament might be sitting. The provision, however, went beyond the reason of the thing; for the object ostensibly in view was, to clear the avenues of Parliament; why, then, should the prohibition extend a mile? Why was it extended even to Charing-cross? A tumult there could not greatly inconvenience members, who on such an occasion might pass through the park; and why extend the time beyond the period when Parliament was sitting? Till now he had not been aware, that since the time of Lord George Gordon, any act had passed to prevent the overawing of Parliament; but if that were the case, there could be no necessity for the present measure. A noble friend of his had been reproached with change of opinion; there was nothing disgraceful in changing an opinion on mature grounds; and never was any thing more unmerited than the present reproach, for the circumstances under which his noble friend had justified such a measure, were totally different from those which were alleged in its support at present; and Ministers admitted that nothing but the most pressing necessity could be a sufficient ground for its adoption. He submitted it to the candour of the noble viscount, whether the amendment proposed ought not at least to be made the subject of a separate bill, and not to be mixed up with the present measure.

On the Chancellor's putting the question, that the amended clause should stand part of the bill,

Lord Rosslyn thought it hard on the people of Westminster to be deprived of the place of their meeting to petition Parliament on the Sovereign, and not to be held in defence of their rights. He complained that the House had been taken by surprise. Last night they had been told that this was only a temporary measure; and now, without any notice, at the last stage of the bill, it was proposed to render it permanent. Thus he thought dealing hardly by the House, and the people of Westminster.

Lord Liverpool was astonished there could be any objection to a clause which met with the general concurrence of the House. It could occasion no inconvenience to any body of men, and was only intended to ensure order in the entrance to the House. The noble lord had complained of surprise; but the real question was, whether there was any objection to the measure; he could see none. The inhabitants of Westminster were not precluded from holding their legal meetings, and Covent-garden had always been the legal recognized place for those meetings. Some limit must be fixed on, and he knew none less objectionable than that which had been proposed. An assembly at Charing-cross would be much more inconvenient, and a much greater obstruction to the attendance on Parliament, than a tumult in Palace-yard.

Lord Lauderdale thought it extremely inconvenient that the inhabitants of Westminster should have no place of meeting but Covent-garden; for the effect of this clause would be to prevent their meeting at all. Covent-garden was private property, and it was in the power of the proprietor to prevent people assembling there, or, at all events, to obstruct the avenues.

The Lord Chancellor stated, that the right of holding a market there was private, but that the streets could not be closed to the public.

Lord Lauderdale insisted, that the avenues to Covent-garden might be closed.

The Lord Chancellor replied, that if he were obstructed, he should think he had a legal right to complain.

The amendment was then adopted without a division.

The House divided on the question that the bill do pass, when the numbers were,

PROTEST

On the motion for the third reading of the bill

House of Lords, March 25, 1817.

Dissentient,—Because it appears to us that this Statute, in inflicting the Penalty of Death, is unjustly severe: that it gives to Magistrates a formidable and unnecessary power, improperly controuling the general expression of opinion, and interfering both with the Public and Private Meetings of the People, in times of which we consider the danger to be much exaggerated, and which we think call for measures of conciliation and relief, and not for coercion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, March 25.

Several petitions were presented from different parts of the county, complaining of the distress arising from the Poor Rates, and praying for relief.—They were referred to the Committee on the Poor Laws.

Petitions were also presented from various places, praying for Retrenchment and Reform, which were ordered to lie on the table.

The Irish Peace Preservation Bill, and the Irish Arms Registry Bill, went through Committees.

Papers were presented at the Bar from the office of the Chief Secretary of Ireland, relative to the Consolidated Fund,—from the Audit-office respecting Public Accounts,—from the office of Imports and Exports, the Annual Returns.—Ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, March 26.

The Exchequer Court Proceedings Bill was committed and reported, and several other bills were advanced in their different stages.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, March 26.

SEDITIONOUS MEETINGS BILL.] A message from the Lords announced their lordships' assent to the Seditious Meetings Bill, with certain amendments.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the amendments be taken into consideration to-morrow.—After a few words from Mr. Brougham, Mr. Curwen and Sir J. Graham, the motion was carried, and the amendments were ordered to be printed forthwith.

VOTES OF THE HOUSE.] The Speaker, in pursuance of a notice he had given last night, took the liberty of addressing a few words to the House on the adoption of some more convenient mode of printing the votes of the House. Since the time of Charles II. in 1680, the duty of superintending the printing of the votes had been committed to the Speaker; but, nevertheless, he should not deem it proper to make any alteration in an established practice without the concurrence of the House. Some new arrangement was now become necessary. The business of the House had increased in a threefold degree since the Union with Ireland, and fivefold since the year 1771. This induced him, some time since, to adopt a more commodious way of printing the votes than had formerly been in use; and by doing so he had considerably reduced the amount of the former charges. This alteration had received the sanction of the House in 1810; since that time the growing business of the House had rendered it impracticable to distribute the votes in a few days after they were given. In consequence of this he had been led to consider the subject attentively; and he had devised a method by which he should be enabled to distribute the votes at an early hour the next morning, together with the notices, orders of the day, and second readings of private bills. The effect of the measure would be also to bring up the arrears of the journals, so that the House would possess them complete within a week after the session closed; and to reduce the charges of printing (which amounted to many thousands, one half. If the House thought proper to refer the proposal to a select committee, it would be his duty to abide by whatever decision might be made; but he thought it important that the House should come to an early determination, that the business being arranged during the recess, an opportunity might be afforded of making the experiment during the remainder of the present session.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, after stating that it was unnecessary to add any recommendation to so salutary a proposal, moved "That a select committee be appointed to consider a more expeditious mode of printing the votes of the House." The motion was carried in the affirmative, and the following committee appointed:—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer,	Lord Lascelles,
Mr. Bathurst,	Lord Milton,
Mr. Rose,	Sir James Graham,
Mr. Long,	Mr. Peel,
Sir Arthur Piggott,	Sir George Hill,
Mr. Williams Wynne,	Mr. W. Dundas,
Mr. Dickinson,	Mr. Home Sumner,
Mr. Abercromby,	Mr. Cartwright,
Sir M. W. Ridley,	Mr. Calcraft,
Mr. Banks,	Sir W. Curtis,
	Mr. Brogden.

DUTY ON SALT.] The House went into a committee on the Salt Laws.

After some conversation between Mr. D. Gilbert, Mr. Lushington, Mr. Rose, Mr. Davernport and Mr. Calcraft,

It was resolved, that Salt should be exported duty free, under certain regulations; and that a duty of thirty shillings a ton should be imposed on mineral alkali, and the present duties repealed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, March 27.

The Exchequer-Court Proceedings Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The further consideration of Bayley's Divorce Bill was postponed till the 30th of April.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, March 27.

BANKRUPT LAWS.] Mr. Lockhart brought in his bill to amend such part of the bankrupt laws as related to granting the bankrupt's certificate. (see page 119.) After a few observations from Mr. Wrottesley, it was ordered to be read a second time on the 1st of May.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord A. Hamilton presented a petition from Kilwinning, Stevenston, and Saltcoats, in the county of Ayr, praying for a Reform in Parliament. The petitioners stated, there was not a single borough in that county in which the manufacturing and commercial interests had a single vote. (Hear, hear, hear.) Ordered to lie on the table.

The noble lord then presented a petition from the royal borough of South Queen's-ferry praying for Reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

ATTORNIES.] Mr. Newman presented a petition, signed by numerous and respectable solicitors and attorneys of Plymouth, Plymouth-dock, and Stonehouse, praying for an alteration in the existing laws, as very improper persons now were enabled to practise as conveyancers and solicitors, not only to the great hardship of those who had been regularly bred to the laws, but to the prejudice of the public.

RIBBAND WEAVERS.] Mr. P. Moore presented a petition from the ribband-weavers of Wrentry, praying for the protection of the House.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, this was a branch of trade by no means undeserving of consideration; but he was afraid, that the monopoly which they wished to enjoy would operate to their injury as well as to that of the public.

Mr. Brougham was glad to hear that the right hon. gentleman thought it necessary that inquiry should be made. It would have been a more statesmanlike, a wiser, and a better policy, to take a general view of our trade, as he had before recommended, but without success, and not to proceed on an isolated point. He trusted, however, that the necessity of that measure would be felt, and that the right hon. gentleman would still direct his attention to it. All that these petitioners said was, give us the same advantages as the French manufacturers have, and we shall be satisfied.—Ordered to lie on the table.

CATHOLIC PRELATES.] Sir J. C. Hippisley trusted, that the information conveyed by the several official dispatches for which he was about to move might tend to counteract the mischievous impressions of the most gross and unfounded representations which, from time to time, were made in another part of the united kingdom. He thought this a fit occasion to allude to a letter stated to be written by a Roman Catholic priest, a Mr. Hayes, from Rome, containing the most unwarrantable assertions respecting himself (Sir J. H.); and he could venture also to say as much for the noble viscount at the head of the Foreign Department, whom he did not see in his place. In fact, these assertions of Mr. Hayes were wholly false. The honourable baronet concluded with moving for copies or extracts of all dispatches from Ministers accredited to foreign States to his Majesty's Secretary of State, respecting the appointment of prelates under the see of Rome. Ordered.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Mr. D. Gilbert appeared at the bar, and stated, that he held in his hand the first Report of the Committee of Finance. (Hear, hear.)

The hon. member being desired to bring it up, delivered it to the clerk at the table. (General cries of read, read.)

As soon as order was restored, the clerk began to read as follows:—The Committee of Finance, having proceeded to take into consideration the several matters referred to them, have lost no time in presenting this their first Report to the House. The office which your Committee thought themselves first bound to undertake was, to consider what retrenchments could be made consistently with the public service, and with a view to real and practical economy. 2dly, Your Committee deemed it indispensable, that ample recompense should be afforded to persons holding high and effective offices; and, 3dly, that such offices as might be considered in the nature of sinecures ought to be abolished on the death of the persons who now enjoy them. This subject is by no means new to the House. It has been often brought before them, particularly in 1812, when it was made the ground of a bill, which was sent to the House of Lords, and some of the provisions of that bill are referred to in this Report. Your Committee, therefore, recommend, that the following offices, which are of the last description, should be abolished, viz. Chief Justices of Eyre, North and South of Trent; Auditor of the Exchequer; Clerk of the Pells; four Tellers of the Exchequer; the Warden of the Cinque Ports; the Governor of the Isle of Wight; and the Commissary-General of Musters. (Hear.)

The clerk was about to proceed, when Mr. Gilbert said, it was unnecessary to go further. Enough had been read to satisfy the House of the spirit of the Report, and of the feelings by which the Committee had been actuated.

Lord Cochrane rose, and said, that the abolition of these offices at the death of the persons now holding them would not tend, in the smallest degree, to relieve the unparalleled distresses under which the country now laboured. In order to give effectual relief, it was absolutely necessary that something should be done immediately.

No farther observations being made, the question was put, that the Report be printed, which was agreed to.

The New Street Bill, the Irish Arms' Registry Bill, and the Irish Peace Preservation Bill, were read a third time and passed.

TITHES.] Mr. Newman moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill to empower ecclesiastical and other persons to grant leases of tithes, so as to bind their successors. This bill was founded on the resolutions of the Select Committee that sat last year on the subject of tithes. It was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second on the 24th of April.

SEDITIONOUS MEETINGS BILL.] On the Speaker-General moving the order of the day, that the Lords' amendments of this bill should be taken into consideration,

Lord Folkestone insisted that the measure could not possibly be discussed that night; and there could not be a better argument for its postponement than that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had himself last night admitted, that the amendments were to be printed for the previous consideration of members; but it had been absolutely impossible to enter on that consideration. He had received, indeed, in good time this morning, the various amendments, and had endeavoured as much as lay in his power to master the subject; but all in vain. He had found, besides two entirely new clauses, fifty-five amendments. (Hear, hear.) The printed papers gave only 14 references to the original bill, and of those 14 only one was correct. (Hear, hear.) In some instances, indeed, he could find the matter referred to in the line above or the line below, but never could be certain which was really intended; in others it could not be found at all. The very first reference afforded a strong instance of the incorrectness that prevailed throughout. On these grounds he thought it impossible, in point of decency, that the House should so soon proceed to the discussion of the amendments.

The Speaker stated, that early in the morning one of the printed papers had been brought to him, in which he had discovered several mistakes: these he had corrected, and had ordered the whole to be reprinted, which was all he could do.

Lord Folkestone observed, it was very hard after all the pains hon. members had taken, to be now told that there was a correct copy, but that they had been losing their time on one which was confessedly erroneous. This was a farther reason why the business should be deferred.

Mr. Brougham then put it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether, with reference to the decorum of their proceedings, he would persist in pressing the discussion.

A conversation ensued, in which Mr. Calvert, Mr. Ponsonby, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer participated, when the amendments were ordered to be taken into consideration to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, March 28.

The Irish Peace Bill and the Irish Arms Bill were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

Friday, March 28.

The Irish Grand Jury Presentment Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be referred to a committee of the whole House on the 4th of April.

WOOL-TRADE.] Mr. Brougham presented a petition from the wool-growers at Winchelsea, complaining of the facilities afforded to the importation of foreign wool, and praying for the protection of the House.—Ordered to lie on the table.

HABEAS CORPUS—DUNDEE.] Mr. Brougham presented a petition from the merchants, householders, and other inhabitants of the royal burgh of Dundee and its vicinity. The hon. and learned gentleman stated, that this petition was signed by a numerous and most respectable body of persons, who complained of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act and of the trial by jury. The petitioners, he observed, certainly appeared to labour under some mistake, as to the operation of that bill in Scotland, conceiving it to be a repetition of a former measure; but in consequence of the amendment of a learned gentleman, who, with his usual discernment, had detected the clause which went to that effect, Scotland was now placed in the same situation as England with respect to this subject. The petitioners next complained of the foul and base assertions which had been so industriously propagated, that a conspiracy existed in Scotland for overthrowing the Government; and that the people in general were disposed to violent and tumultuous measures. They felt themselves called upon to assure the House, that, out of 32,000 inhabitants of Dundee, it was their firm belief, (and, surely, said Mr. Brougham, these respectable merchants and householders must know the fact,) that there was not one within the walls of that city who ought to be called a disloyal subject; and they were fully persuaded, that all the people of Scotland were sincerely attached to the reigning family, and to the laws and Constitution of the country. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. B.) could not help thinking, that the imputations which had been cast upon the brave and loyal people of Scotland, from whatsoever quarter they might have arisen, deserved the severest reprobation. The ignorant and officious zeal of those who had spread such reports was unworthy of the notice and patronage of the Government, and called for the censure of the House. It was no light matter to attack so large a body of his Majesty's subjects by such foul and unwarrantable assertions. He would say, from his personal knowledge of many of the persons in Dundee, that they were rather attached to the other side of the House, than to the principles which actuated the conduct of those among whom he had the honour to sit. Seeing the matter, therefore, in this point of view, he considered it the more worthy of attention; and he trusted the House would recal this petition to their minds when they came to discuss the measure that was ordered for their consideration that night. (Hear, hear.)

The petition having been read,

Lord Folkestone rose and observed, that, by the Scotch law, no warrant in Scotland could be effectual, unless signed by a person resident in that country. He wished to know, therefore, whether this act could extend to Scotland?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could only say, that he never believed any part of Great Britain would be exempted from this act; and he should be very sorry to find it otherwise.

Mr. Brougham (observing that some attention was being paid to the signatures at the foot of the petition) stated, that a noble lord, who had signed it, afterwards erased his name, not because he had altered his opinions, but merely because he doubted whether it were fit for a peer of the realm to subscribe a petition to that House. (Hear.)

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

VOTES OF THE HOUSE.] Mr. B. Bathurst moved that the Report of the Select Committee relative to the printing of the Votes of the House, which he brought up yesterday, be now taken into consideration.

The Report was then read, stating the great advantages that should result to the House and the public from the early circulation of the Votes of the House, and that the Committee had adopted a plan for their being printed, which would be seen from the papers attached to their Report.

Mr. Grenfell complained of the great expense which members were put to in the Vote-office, and contrasted it with the practice in Ireland, previous to the Union, when every member received a copy of the printed votes, without being subjected to any expense.

The Report was then agreed to.

PRISONS IN IRELAND.] Mr. Bennet rose to call the attention of the House to the state of the prisons in Ireland; and, after paying some compliments to Mr. Peel for his humanity in personally visiting and inspecting the prisons in that country, moved for an account of the greatest number of persons confined at any one time in the Marshalsea of Dublin, during the last 12 months.

Mr. Peel observed, he should be happy if this motion should tend to ameliorate the condition of persons under confinement. It was in vain to expect that any temporary remedy could be applied to their relief. He was perfectly confident, that the expense would be less to make an assessment for a new prison, than to attempt to repair the wretched houses in which the prisoners were now confined. It could not be denied, that ten human beings of both sexes had been cooped up in a space which did not exceed 12 feet by 6, without blankets, or any other accommodation. (Hear, hear.) This matter certainly deserved the most serious attention of the House.

Mr. Bennet then moved for an account of the number of insolvent debtors in Dublin now in confinement, and an account of the fees which they were liable to pay, previous to their discharge.

Mr. Peel would also agree to this motion; but he could assure the hon. member, that the Chief Justice of Ireland was continually occupied during the vacation in attending to the cases of those persons.

The motion was carried.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS BILL.] The Solicitor-General having moved the order of the day for taking into further consideration the amendments made by the Lords to this bill,

Lord Folkestone rose and asked the Speaker whether the bill was not a money bill, to such an extent, at least, as to induce the House, in maintenance of their ancient privileges, altogether to reject the measure thus amended?

The Speaker had no difficulty in replying, that in the sense in which that House understood the term money bill, the bill then before them was not a money bill. In this bill, as well as in other bills not actually money bills, there might be clauses relating to money, to which the House could not permit the Lords to make any amendments. In fact, in the very first clause of the bill a penalty had been extended by the House of Lords, and therefore when the bill came under the consideration of the House, he should suggest to them the expediency of rejecting that amendment.

The order of the day was then read.

The Speaker then observed, that it was his duty to call the attention of the House to an alteration made by the Lords. As the bill passed the Commons it was declared, that any person refusing to deliver a paper to a justice of the peace should forfeit 50*l.* The Lords had extended the penalty to any person refusing to deliver the paper to a justice of the peace, "or the mayor or head officer of the county, city, town, or place respectively." This was an amendment to which the House, consistently with its privileges, could not agree.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in consequence of what had fallen from the chair, moved that the House should disagree with the lords in this amendment, which motion was agreed to.

On the next amendment being read, viz. "after 'holden' insert 'and such notice so given by such means as aforesaid, shall be as effectual to all intents and purposes, as if the same had been given by public advertisement inserted in any such newspaper as aforesaid.'"

Lord Cochrane protested that he felt he should abandon his duty if he failed to take the sense of the House on every one of the amendments made in this bill. It was so essential to the best interests and privileges of the country that the bill should not pass into a law, that he held it to be an indispensable duty to object by every means conformable to the customs and rules of the House, not only to the bill in toto, but to every alteration that had been made in it. With respect to the present amendment, it was not only unnecessary, but actually destroyed the sense of the passage in which it occurred. He should take leave, therefore, to divide the House on a motion for leaving out of that amendment the words—"by such means as aforesaid."

No division, however, took place, the noble lord not having a fellow-teller in support of his motion.

Lord Cochrane then adverted to the extraordinary clause which had been introduced by the lords, stating it to be highly inexpedient that public meetings or assemblies should be held near the Houses of Parliament or near his Majesty's Courts of Justice in Westminster-hall.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke to order. That clause was not then under the consideration of the House.

The Speaker observed, that the several amendments in the bill must be considered in their turn. That before the House was to leave out "being" and insert "shall be."

Lord Cochrane felt it his duty to state at once the general motives which actuated his conduct on the present occasion. That so extraordinary a proposition as that to which he had just adverted should be entertained, and even adopted, could not astonish those who observed how that House went on. Why was any mention made of danger to the Courts of Justice in Westminster-hall from public meetings? Was there not equal danger to Courts of Justice in Guildhall from public meetings there? The fact was, and he said it without hesitation, it was that House which was afraid. It was the Ministers who felt that they deserved the reproach, and perhaps the indignation of the people. He told the right hon. gentleman, and his Majesty's Ministers generally, that the consciousness of their bad measures made them afraid to meet the people. The assertion about the Courts of Justice was a mere false pretence to cover these apprehensions. A noble and learned lord in another place had stated—

The Speaker informed the noble lord, that it was contrary to the rules of the House to allude to any thing that might have been said by a member of the other House of Parliament.

Lord Cochrane said, that he had used the words "another place."

The Speaker observed, that the rules of the House must be substantially attended to.

Lord Cochrane bowed with great submission to the correction of the Chair. He had thought it his duty, at the very commencement of this discussion, fully to state his opinion. He had also thought it his duty to declare, that he would take the sense of the House on every one of the Amendments; but as on the last proceeding he had not been so fortunate as to have a seconder, he should not persevere in his intention; it appearing to him probable, considering the great majority opposed to his single opinion, that in that particular he was wrong.

The clerk having then read several Amendments,

Mr. Brougham rose and said, that he did not wish to offer any unnecessary impediment; but he hoped, that as the Amendments were read, his Majesty's Ministers would explain to the House when the alteration was substantial, and not merely verbal. Though the printed papers might have been distributed by twelve, he himself did not get the amended bill till near two: he was engaged in professional occupations till four, and he was now called on to agree to amendments, many of which might be, as amendments frequently were, entirely new measures. The fact was, that the chief amendment, the cause prohibiting a meeting within a mile of Westminster Hall, was a new legislative measure, which that House was about to dispose of by a single vote, instead of its passing through the various stages—the three readings—the Committee, &c. by which a strict scrutiny of every measure proposed was occasioned.

Mr. B. Bathurst observed, that the clause to which the hon. and learned gentleman adverted, was the only substantial alteration that had been made in the bill.

After a conversation of some length on the meaning of the Amendment introduced by the Lords into that part of the bill which related to the proclamation by the magistrates for the dispersion of illegal meetings, Lord Folkstone contending that by the bill as amended, the magistrates were directed to disperse themselves, (a laugh), and Mr. B. Bathurst maintaining that the meaning was sufficiently intelligible,

Mr. Brougham represented the risk which Parliament was about to run, of adopting a measure not only without due care and circumspection, but on the very phraseology of which such great differences of opinion existed. He was persuaded, that the only satisfactory proceeding would be to print the bill as amended, continuously, and then the House would have an opportunity of comparing it with the bill, as it left them, which it was impossible to do without confusion at present. Unless this was done, it was very probable, that they would not merely commit tautology (it was too late in the day to complain of that error in Acts of Parliament), but enact rank nonsense, on which no Court of Law could subsequently act.

Lord Cochrane pointed out some further errors in this Amendment, and maintained that from beginning to end, the bill was a mass of blunders; and were these to be tolerated in an act imposing the penalty of death on his Majesty's subjects? Although the House had been lately accustomed to think lightly of jails and chains and dungeons, he did hope that they would not persevere in this most hasty and ill-judged proceeding.

Some discussion then took place between the Solicitor-General and Mr. Plunkett, on various verbal inaccuracies in the amendment.

Mr. Brougham again urged the necessity of inquiring, with more accuracy, into the precise nature and expression of all the amendments. Several pieces of nonsense had already been detected in them, and who knew what others might remain undiscovered? The House, for the sake of its own consistency and dignity, and the interests of the country, ought, he repeated, to have the bill printed as amended by the Lords, and not be satisfied with the amendments by themselves, (which were scarcely intelligible) and in order to allow of this being done, he would move that the further consideration of the amendments should be adjourned until Monday.

Mr. Abercromby thought that the bill should be reprinted with the amendments.

Mr. S. Bourne observed, that the printing of amendments was only a practice of modern times. It was too much to say, that the consideration of the amendments ought to be postponed, in order to adopt the novel course of printing the whole bill with the amendments of the Lords. It surely could not be difficult to alter the latter part of the clause, so as to make it grammatical.

Mr. Ponsonby observed, that if the printing of amendments was a modern practice, the returning a bill of no great length, with no fewer than fifty-five amendments, was a practice never known before the present day. He did not believe that on the other side of the House there was at that moment one man who would not in his conscience be better pleased, if the House were to adopt the course proposed by his hon. and learned friend. Surely there was no pressing necessity for this law; and having already obtained the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, they might wait a little while, that the House might give the bill that attention which a sense of its own dignity required.

Mr. Canning thought the insertion of the words "to command," in place of the word "commanding," would obviate every objection.

Sir M. W. Ridley saw no necessity for hurrying on this measure with such undue haste, especially when he called to recollection what was now taking place in another part of the country, alleged to have been in a disturbed state, namely, Manchester, where persons were committed under the 5th of Charles the Second, which prohibits meetings for the purpose of petitioning to alter any thing by law established, without the consent of three magistrates, on a requisition signed by 20 householders, under the penalty of 100*l*.

The House then divided :—For the adjournment, 31—Against it, 77—Majority, 46.

The amendment was afterwards agreed to, with the insertion of the words “to command,” instead of “commanding.”

On the question for agreeing to the amendment on the clause, declaring it lawful to disperse meetings held under any notice “which shall express or purport that any matter, by law established, may be altered, otherwise than by the authority of the King, Lords, and Commons, in Parliament assembled,” to which the Lords had added, “or to such effect,—”

Lord Folkestone observed, that this was an amendment of a most sweeping nature, as it left to the interpretation of a magistrate, not only whether a notice purported the alteration of the Constitution, but whether it was to “such effect.” They had lately heard of a requisition which had been sent to the Mayor of Bristol, to convene a meeting for the purpose of petitioning for Parliamentary Reform, the Mayor had objected to such a meeting, because he conceived that under Reform was meant rebellion, and he was supported in this construction by many reverend and learned persons; and there were few pulpits in Bristol from which the Sunday before the meeting exhortations were not put forth that people should not attend the meeting, because rebellion was the object. They had heard also of a requisition to the Sheriff of Cornwall, signed by some of the most respectable gentlemen of that county, and the Sheriff had refused to call the meeting, because he was persuaded it could mean nothing less than the overthrow of the Constitution. When they knew that such a construction had been put upon the most innocent requisitions by some magistrates, it was too much to give them a right to interfere with meetings called by others, by words so sweeping as those introduced by the Lords’ amendment, and to dissolve any meeting; persons disobeying their commands being subject to the penalty of death. He should propose therefore to amend the Lords’ amendment, by leaving out the words “or to such effect.”

Mr. Ponsonby objected to the amendment of the Lords, as giving an indefinite power to the magistrates. In all the instances of legislative phraseology which he had seen, he never met with any thing more loose, vague, and indefinite. The words, “to that effect,” were generally employed when we wished to express, in popular language, something that did not require precision; but who ever heard of a Legislator, who would inflict pains and penalties on lax and indefinite terms? He could not conceive a meeting to be held, in which individuals might not offend against the law, if a magistrate were allowed to determine its legality by his opinion of what was “the effect” of the language employed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer defended the amendment. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Ponsonby) was mistaken in supposing that the amendment referred to any speeches that might be delivered at popular meetings, in which the magistrate might be supposed to exceed the bounds of prudence by the hurry of the moment. It referred not to speeches, but the notice which called the meeting, which might be deliberately examined and coolly weighed. The objection of the right hon. gentleman lay to the clause of the original bill, which had passed the House, and was not proposed to be amended by the Lords. The amendment was intended to guard against a notice neither purporting nor expressing “that any thing by law established may be altered without authority of King, Lords, and Commons:” but implying such a doctrine.

Mr. Ponsonby explained. He objected to the laxity of the expression. In a law so highly penal there ought to be nothing loose or indefinite.

Lord Cochrane asked whether Government and the Constitution were synonymous terms; and whether any thing to be said at public meetings tending to bring the Administration into hatred and contempt, were to be construed as if propounded against the Constitution? If this bill passed into an act, and if, in enforcing it, blood should be spilt, or murder committed, a heavy responsibility would lie on the heads of Ministers. They might be accused of being accessory to the crime which their vague, tyrannical, and indefinite laws, hurried with such indecency through the House, might occasion.

Mr. Abercromby objected to the amendment, as being capable of dangerous constructions. A meeting called for the purpose of petitioning for Reform, might by some magistrates be thought to have “the effect” of bringing the Government and Constitution into contempt, or of overturning the legal authorities.

Mr. B. Bathurst acknowledged, that if the clause had stood as it originally did with the word “purport,” he should not have objected to it: but the intention of the Lords’ Amendment evidently was to prevent notices being issued, which, though not in words but in meaning and intent, impeached the authority of Parliament.

Sir J. Newport said, that the words “or to such effect,” would give Magistrates the power of preventing all meetings. There were very few populous places where one justice of the peace might not be found to disapprove of any meeting of the people; this was not merely his theory; the Magistrates of Glasgow thought that no popular meetings should be held at this time. It was utterly useless to introduce the words "to such effect," after the word "purport," unless it were intended to countenance the supposition on the part of Magistrates that no meeting should be held for any political purpose whatsoever.

Mr. Plunkett concurred with his right honourable friend (Sir J. N.) in thinking that the Amendments of the Lords were highly improper. If the word "purport" implied all which the words "such effect" could convey, the latter were useless, and if useless, were pernicious (hear). For if words were introduced to express notices which had been already sufficiently provided for, officious persons, or persons of heated imaginations, might be found, who might say, that something further was meant than the first words could be construed to signify. He was friendly to the measure before the House. Though he was not present when it was first introduced, he should not now shrink from the responsibility of supporting it: but when penalties such as those inflicted by the bill before them were introduced, it was the duty of the House to see that they were involved in no ambiguity. Such was the latitude, laxity, and unmeaningness of the words introduced by the Lords, that he was compelled to object to them. He could not consent to allow any Magistrate to act under a discretion so wide and unlimited.

Mr. W. Elliot also objected to the Amendments of the Lords, as entirely unnecessary, and tending rather to impede than facilitate the execution of the law.

Mr. Wetherell said, as the words introduced by the Lords were nearly synonymous to these which before stood in the clause, he saw no objection to their remaining.

Mr. Brougham observed, that the reason why he objected to the words "to such effect," was precisely because the word "purport" had been before introduced. He would ask the right hon. gent. opposite (Mr. B. Bathurst), whether, if a meeting were called to pass resolutions on the distresses of any district without mentioning petitions to the King or Parliament, it would not be taken to come within the clause as it now stood? On the answer to this might depend some of his further arguments.

Mr. B. Bathurst said, it was not very regular to question a Member on his opinion as to the operation of any clause. If the House understood that the word "purport" would comprehend all notices in substance as well as words, impeaching the authority of Parliament, the amendment of the Lords would be superfluous; and if so, he acknowledged it would be useless (hear).

The motion for leaving out the words "to such effect" was then agreed to.

The clause referring to Meetings within a mile of Westminster-hall was then read,

"And whereas it is highly inexpedient that public meetings or assemblies should be held near the Houses of Parliament, or near his Majesty's courts of justice in Westminster-hall, on such days as are hereinafter mentioned; be it therefore enacted, and it is hereby enacted, that it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to convene or call together, or to give any notice for convening or calling together any meeting of persons consisting of more than fifty persons or for any number of persons exceeding fifty, to meet in any street, square or open place in the city or liberties of Westminster, or county of Middlesex, within the distance of one mile from the Gate of Westminster-hall, save and except such parts of the parish of Saint Paul's Covent Garden, as are within the said distance, for the purpose or on the pretext of considering of or preparing any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration or other address to the King, or to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, or to both House, or to either House of Parliament for alteration of matters in Church or State, on any day in which the two Houses or either House of Parliament shall meet and sit, or shall be summoned or adjourned or prorogued to meet or sit; nor on any day on which his Majesty's Courts of Chancery, King's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer, or any of them, or any Judge of any of them, shall sit in Westminster-hall; any thing heretofore contained to the contrary notwithstanding: and that if any meeting or assembly, for the purposes or on the pretexts aforesaid, of any persons, shall be assembled or holden on any such day, contrary to the intent and meaning of this enactment, such meeting or assembly shall be deemed and taken to be an unlawful assembly, by whomsoever or in consequence of what notice soever such meeting or assembly shall have been holden: provided that nothing in this enactment contained, shall by any construction whatever be deemed or taken to apply to or affect any meeting convened, called or holden for the election of Members of Parliament, or any persons attending such meeting, or to any persons attending upon the business of either House of Parliament, or any of the said Courts."

On the question that it be agreed to,

Mr. Curwen rose and said, he felt it his duty to oppose it. The country should understand the whole purport of the clause, which he conceived to be pregnant with danger to the Constitution of the House, as well as to the rights of the subject. The bill before them had always been represented in that House as a measure of necessity, and which should not be carried one iota further than the necessity required. Such was the universal consent of all parties in that House, and the only question was, whether any necessity existed? It was also declared to be a measure to prevent illegal, but not at all to encroach on legal meetings.—Such were the principles which had guided that House, but had they been acted on by the other House of Parliament? No.—On the contrary they had passed the clause now under consideration, which was professedly levelled at meetings legally called to petition that House. The House on all occasions shewed itself laudably jealous of any encroachment on the privilege of originating all measures which touched the purse of the subject. It was not a less important or less essential part of power of the House, to receive the Petitions of the people. Every thing which lessened the communication between the House of Commons and the people, lessened its influence, and rendered it less a counterpoise to the two other branches of the Legislature. The other House had an interest to disunite and weaken them—but it was the duty of the House of Commons to resist the smallest attempt to touch so vital a part of its privileges. It was always from small beginnings that bad measures originated, as the smallest infractions of right might always be made precedents for greater ones. The attempt to connect the present clause with some inconvenience which was said to have been felt by the Courts of Law, was very suspicious. In the first place he doubted the fact, (Hear!) for if that was the case, they should before that have heard of it; and if it were so, a specific measure should have been introduced to remedy that inconvenience, instead of tacking such a clause to a bill intended to meet a temporary evil, and with which it had no connection. The hon. gent. called upon those who opposed Reform on this ground, that they would not subscribe to any change in the Constitution, to come forward in consistency to oppose the clause under consideration; for such gentlemen were bound, according to their professed principle, to resist any innovation as well upon the rights and privileges of the people, as upon the prerogatives of the Crown. But the prerogatives or power of the Crown seldom, if ever, experienced any opposition from that quarter. No—all the zeal of those gentlemen for the preservation of the Constitution seemed reserved to withstand any change in favour of popular principles. Hence the power of the Crown had gone on advancing, especially within the last thirty years, so that this power was now become such as to be felt in every direction. The power of the Crown was in fact present in all places, and in most places irresistible. From that power, therefore, the most serious danger was to be apprehended, and yet no alarm appeared to be felt as to its existence and effects, particularly among those who were so loud in their cries for the safety of the Constitution when any proposition was brought forward to extend the rights of the people. On the contrary, indeed, those who were most earnest to support and enlarge the power of the Crown, were always most forward to abridge the privileges of the people. Of that forwardness the clause before the House furnished a striking example,—for here was an attempt made, not to interfere with seditious or illegal meetings, as the bill proposed, but to curtail the right of meetings unexceptionably legal. Upon what ground, he would ask, was such an extraordinary proposition brought forward, or why should the Electors of Westminster be precluded from assembling at their usual place of meeting? There was no good reason for thus interfering with the Electors of Westminster in particular. He never recollected an instance in which any practical inconvenience had resulted from the meeting of the Electors of Westminster in Palace-yard, either to the Legislature or the Courts of Law; therefore the clause under consideration was totally uncalled for. Indeed, he never remembered a measure more uncalled for, more unnecessary, or more inconsistent with the constitutional privileges of the people, and therefore he felt it his duty to give it his most decided opposition.

The Honourable Mr. Ward could not see that such importance belonged to this proposition as the last speaker laboured to attach to it. If it were the object of the clause to prevent those inflammatory, or insolent, or foolish discussions which generally prevailed at Westminster meetings—if it were desired to put an end to those offensive, and often long and dull speeches, so pregnant, however, with libellous attacks upon the principles of the Constitution, and upon the character of that House, which were usually heard at those meetings, he could understand the motives of the opposition the House had heard,—if it were intended to interfere with the right of petition, or to prohibit the Electors of Westminster from being entertained with those insulting experiments upon the patience of that House, there might be some alarm for the enjoyment of their favourite privileges; for a practice had prevailed at those meetings which was equally new in the history of this country, and inconsistent with the dignity of Parliament, as that practice involved a system of detraction and contumely upon the reputation of that House. Heretofore it was the principle of popular leaders to raise a clamour against particular measures; but the uniform object of those who usually took a lead at Westminster Meetings was to deprecate, by every means in their power, the proceedings and character of that House, to point it out, indeed, as the great grievance which ought to be removed. It was indisputable that the harangues of those leaders were mainly directed to excite hatred and contempt against that assembly.—The people were not immediately called upon to put an end to the existence of that Assembly; but that call was perhaps reserved for the eve of the great Reform. But it was the duty of Parliament to guard the people from such acts of outrage as the system of their leaders had an obvious tendency to provoke. For the sake of the people themselves, he called upon the House to accede to the clause under consideration. For if they should be guilty of that misconduct to which the system of their leaders would prompt them, that House would be a party to the guilt if it rejected the proposed amendment. The meetings of these people, so liable to be misled by those who, it appeared, were but too willing to mislead them, ought to be removed from the place where the great temptation to outrage was convenient. This was the best provision that could be made to protect the deluded people from giving immediate effect to those feelings, to excite which so much mischievous industry was generally employed. Persuaded that the clause under consideration met the approval of the greater part of that House, and that it was also approved by many of those who usually opposed any measure originating on that side of the House, he should vote for its adoption, convinced that it had no tendency to interfere with any constitutional privilege, and that it was calculated to guard against great mischief.

Mr. Brougham was anxious to submit a few plain considerations to the House, before the approbation so confidently anticipated of the majority was declared. It must be conceded to him, he imagined, that there ought to be some limits within which the orders of the House ought to be confined, with regard to the number and the nature of the amendments which the Lords might pass upon a bill originating in that House; it being supposed that the Lords established no limits to themselves. For what could be more inconvenient than that the Lords should, by the addition or substitution of new clauses, alter the whole character of the proceeding, and send back to them, not an amended, but an entirely new bill? The amendment in question did not even apply to the title of the bill, which was "An Act for the more effectually preventing Seditious Meetings and Assemblies." Here then they had legislated on a subject not before them, a subject to which the bill had no reference: and whilst they professed to be legislating on one particular description of meeting, had legislated on a principle affecting all assemblies, however regularly or legally convened. Why was not this made the subject of a separate bill? But another objection was, that this was not a public, but a local enactment; a provision affecting only the people of Westminster. Now, in all cases of private bills, numberless guards were established for the protection of personal rights and property. Not the most puny right, not a single penny, could be taken from any citizen of Westminster by an act of the Legislature, without inviting his scrutiny and opposition, and without passing through a variety of stages. He would ask, was this fair dealing on the part of the Lords, either towards the people of Westminster, or towards that House? (Hear, hear.) To what an extent did not the House always carry their jealousy upon the least alteration attempted by the other House, with regard to the provisions of a money bill? Would they now, then, when an attempt was made of a different kind, but, he believed, for which no precedent could be found, bow to the usurpation, and surrender their privileges to the Lords? As to the nature of the proceedings which took place at the meetings alluded to, this was not a proper opportunity for considering them: but let them be what they might, a sufficient power for repressing the evil already existed, in the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and the trial by jury, as well as by the other provisions of the bill before them. If this farther enactment was necessary, it ought to be brought forward as a distinct and substantive measure. It would then be fairly canvassed and discussed upon its own independent merits. There was no instance of an amendment so foreign to the whole scope and purpose of the bill on which it was engrafted. Could it be said that time pressed, and that, therefore, it was necessary to pass it in this irregular form? What reason was there for entertaining alarm at the possibility of an immediate meeting, when they were about to adjourn for a fortnight, during which period none of the courts would sit in Westminster-hall? Practically speaking, no inconvenience of interruption had ever been created to the proceedings of Parliament, or the administration of justice in the courts of these meetings in Palace-yard. Expressions might have been used ungrateful to the ears of the hon. gentleman, and perhaps improper in themselves; but the evil to which the enactment referred, was not to the sentiments, but to the proximity of the place in which they were uttered. The mention made of the courts, in particular, excited his jealousy; for if this was the bonâ fide intention of the measure—if its object was chiefly to secure the free and dignified administration of the laws, why was the security confined to a few supreme courts in Westminster-hall? Why not extend it to the courts sitting in vacation at Guildhall, in Lincoln's Inn, the Old Bailey, and Doctors'-commons? These were all situated in the most populous parts of the metropolis, and the most exposed to the contagion of popular phrensy and delusion.—Palace-yard was much farther distant from the courts in Westminster-hall, than the place of meeting in the city from those in Guildhall; which was, in fact, within the same gate, and under the same roof. The clause, besides, appeared to him to be most clumsily drawn, considering the high authority from which it proceeded. He had never seen one so ill calculated to execute its own purpose. In the first place, it limited the number of 50 persons, as if any public notice was ever published in Westminster for the purpose of calling together that number of inhabitants, and exempting a meeting composed of 49, whilst it applied in all its rigour to the number of 51. Another piece of nonsense was the insertion of the word "declaration" after the words "petition, complaint, remonstrance," and before "or other address to the King." But the clause still left a loop-hole from which a public meeting might escape, as, if it should be called to consider of the distresses of the nation. He apprehended, if called for such a purpose, it would not be within the meaning of this statutory prohibition. It might be supposed that the clause would be the more acceptable to him on this account; but he opposed it on the principle, that it was inconsistent with the dignity of their own character and deliberative capacity. He was the more strongly inclined to condemn it for its inefficacy; because, notwithstanding the blunders with which it swarmed, it would at least indicate the disposition, if it did not manifest the ability, to injure. He conjured the House to pause before they committed an abdication of their own function; and not to suffer themselves to be taken in, he could call it nothing else, by the expressions relative to the courts. There was, perhaps, once a time when they were in jeopardy from the conduct of a profligate man, whom persecution alone could have lifted into importance. What was the conduct at that period, of the venerable judge who then presided in the Court of King's Bench? When Mr. Wilkes brought his tumultuous assembly into Westminster-hall, Lord Mansfield did not apply to Parliament for assistance, but trusted to the efficacy of those laws of which he was so faithful an administrator. When the day appointed for the trial arrived, universal agitation prevailed with respect to the result. Westminster-hall, and all its avenues, were crowded by an overwhelming mob, of which we have now no examples. Lord Mansfield saw this, and instantly made up his mind. He ordered the doors and windows of the Court to be thrown open, so that the whole of the vast multitude might see and hear what was going forward. In one instant a dead calm reigned over that tumultuous assembly, and the Chief Justice then delivered that wonderful address, which might be compared with the most noble productions of ancient eloquence. He told them, that all their clamour and threats were to him but idle air; that he valued only that popularity which accorded with the satisfaction of his own conscience, and that even in the last extremity, if his life should be sacrificed to their fury, it would be some consolation to him to think, that such an outrage might have the good effect of stunning them into sobriety. This was the conduct and language of a man who might confidently appeal, not as the phrase now was, to impartial posterity, but to his own contemporaries, even when most deluded and most infuriated. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Canning observed, that considerable reflection on a subject previous to its discussion, generally enabled honourable members to anticipate, if not all the illustrations with which they might be beautified, most of the prominent arguments that would be brought forward. On this occasion he had been disappointed in this expectation, for the reasoning which he had anticipated had not been resorted to, and some topics had, on the contrary, been introduced, which had at least the grace of novelty to recommend them. The hon. gentleman who appeared to see farthest into the merits and qualities of the measure before them, had discovered in it evidence of a most black conspiracy on the part of the House of Lords to usurp their functions, to annihilate the House of Commons, and to legislate without them. Truly this was a most dark design, and happy were they that they had among them so perspicacious a statesman to make it known. (A laugh.) If any infringement of their standing orders had taken place, it was undoubtedly fit to be referred to the Speaker, to whose circumspection on these points they had all frequently been witnesses. As to the objection to the title, he should refer to the preamble, in which the meetings described were such as might be called for, on pretext of the purpose of petitioning; and the object stated, was to prevent their ending in sedition—to prevent what was originally legal from being perverted to what was unlawful and mischievous. The insertion of the words "declaration to the King," was not a fault of the lords; they were in the body of the bill, and were used in the amendment; therefore, only to make it coincident with the other parts of the measure. The clause was not directed against the disposition, but against the locality of these meetings, and their liability to perversion. It was this consideration which brought them within the scope and intention of the whole enactment. None of these measures were founded on the assumption of an evil disposition in the people; but proceeded on the principle, that at a time of so much distress and difficulty, their feelings and passions might render them more easily than at other periods the instruments of designing men. Could it be said that such a rule might apply to the mass of the population, but not to the inhabitants of Westminster? Had the Spafields meeting been held in Palace-yard on the first day of the session, instead of plundering gunsmiths' shops, they might have been inclined to more irreparable mischief; to an attack upon the courts to whose justice they were rendering themselves amenable; and upon that House, which was enacting laws to quell their turbulence and sedition. He could hardly think the hon. and learned gentleman serious in his comparison of this measure to the case of a private bill; but when he talked of there having been no instance in which Parliament had been in danger, had he never heard of Lord George Gordon's mob, or of the riots at the discussion of the corn bill? The magnanimity of Lord Mansfield had been highly extolled; but he could not see in it those characteristics of fearlessness with which the hon. and learned gentleman had endowed it, when he reflected that it was displayed on the occasion of his pronouncing a judgment consonant to the wishes of those who surrounded him. He was, however, much surprised that the hon. and learned gentleman should, with his knowledge and experience, consider the idolatry of Mr. Wilkes as a singular occurrence in the annals of popular delusion. Could one instance be cited from the history of ancient democracy, or of modern jacobinism, in which the favourite of the mob had been a man of blameless character, or entitled to any portion of respect? Mr. Wilkes was not a phoenix: among them he was a gregarious creature: he was their knight of the shire, and represented them all. (A laugh.) He gave to this clause, therefore, the same support which he had given to the bill itself; as he believed it, in his conscience, to be called for by the pressing and peculiar circumstances of his country. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham, in explanation, said, that the right hon. gentleman was mistaken in what he had stated with respect to Mr. Wilkes. Part of the judgment in that gentleman's case was favourable to him, namely, the reversal of the outlawry: but the sending him back to prison was very far from being a popular measure; and, therefore, it was clear that some danger attached to the judge; and yet he threw open the doors and windows of the court. (Heir.)

Mr. Ponsonby was no more disposed than some gentlemen on the other side to defend the whole of Mr. Wilkes's political conduct; but he would venture to say, what in his heart he believed to be true, that Mr. Wilkes did deserve from the people of England the support which he received during a great part of his life. Could those who now heard him forget that Mr. Wilkes had put an end to the practice of general warrants? (Hear, hear.) Could they forget, that Mr. Wilkes, on other occasions, had been the intrepid and successful defender of the constitutional liberties of the country? As to what the right hon. gentleman had said respecting the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, he (Mr. P.) believed, that the judgment for reversing the outlawry was never disapproved of by any of the lawyers of that day, or since; but Lord Mansfield was just as right when he passed sentence on the conviction, as when he reversed the outlawry. He also believed, that the great body of the people thought the Court of King's Bench had discharged their duty faithfully. The right hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, had made an allusion to jacobins, and demagogues, and incendiaries, and a great deal of other matter, that had nothing to do with the question. The simple point of inquiry was, had any danger really existed from these meetings? "Sir," said Mr. Ponsonby, "I am surprised that none of us ever perceived the danger we were in. I am perfectly astonished that you, Sir, was never aware of this danger. I must conclude, however, that no danger whatever surrounded us, or you would have thought it your business to communicate our alarming situation to this House; and not have left it to the lords to provide for our safety. What, Mr. Speaker! are we so ignorant of the duties we owe to ourselves that the House of Lords must enact this clause for us, and send it down to us in a moment for our concurrence? I know not, Sir, why the House of Lords are to extend the shield over us for our safety, when we ourselves have not thought that our safety was in danger. I should be glad to hear any gentleman on the other side get up and state a case where the House of Lords have ever sent down a clause of this kind to be debated in one evening. I complain of this clause, Sir, not as an attempt on our privileges, in the common and technical sense of the word, such as infringing the power we have over the public purse, or any of those things we justly call our privileges, but I complain of it as being like a new bill, and as being sent down to us to debate at once. I disapprove the connecting the courts of law with the proceedings of Parliament. You talk of Lord George Gordon and the corn-bill, but in none of those cases were there any meetings: what, then, have they to do with the question? It is idle to state, that the riots on the corn bill, and in the case of Lord George Gordon, can justify the House of Lords in sending down such a bill to us. If all public meetings are liable to abuse, we may as well enact at once that no meetings shall be permitted. Have any of those parliamentary reformers against whom this clause was levelled attacked the peerage? I have never heard that they meditated the least attack on the House of Lords. It will not be asserted that their lordships were in danger; neither, Sir, did you consider that we were in danger. I do firmly believe that no danger threatened us, or is likely to threaten us: and therefore, considering this clause as an unnecessary violation of the liberties of the subject, I feel it my duty to oppose it. (Hear, hear.)

Sir W. Burroughs thought it necessary to strengthen the hands of Government at a time like the present; but censured Ministers for their neglect in not calling Parliament together at an earlier period. He agreed with all the measures they had adopted, except the Suspension Act; observing, that it was the only instance in our history of such a measure in time of peace. He did not comide in Ministers so much as they might expect, but he should support this clause, as he thought necessary.

Mr. Wilberforce having been prevented by indisposition from taking a part in former debates, was glad of an opportunity, even at this late period, of expressing his approbation of the measure now before them. He confessed he thought it necessary to the preservation of the liberties of the people. He remembered a similar proceeding formerly; but there was a new feature in this case, which marked the greater atrocity of the proceedings which they were endeavouring to suppress. It appeared that the persons whose practices they were now about to put down had made some of the most sacred passages of our religion the subject of their mirth and mockery at their hellish orgies. When they were going about to infect others with the disease under which they themselves were labouring, it was the duty of Government to warn them of the danger of receiving it. It was very curious, that on the former occasion, as soon as these meetings were suspended, the country returned to the utmost tranquillity; and so he hoped it would be in the present case. From what he had seen of his Majesty's Ministers, he was persuaded they would be well disposed to return to the sound and wholesome state of our constitutional privileges, when the sound and wholesome state of the country was prepared to receive them. With respect to the place of meeting, this was the very scene which the House would not wish the people to choose, but another where their passions would be less likely to be excited. He did not consider this measure so much calculated to offend the great body of the people, as it was suited to prevent the disaffected from carrying their combustibles about, with the hope of producing dangerous explosions. He hoped that there would now be opportunity to instruct the people in those true principles on which alone real liberty, happiness, and government must depend; this would secure those who had not been infected from the danger of the delusive doctrines of wicked men. This would fix in their minds a conviction of the necessity of public order and regular government. Seeing the matter in this point of view, he should give his concurrence to the clause in question. (Hear.)

Lord Cochrane said, the House must know, that public meetings were holden in the Guildhall of London, and why was more danger to arise to Westminster-hall, than to a court of justice sitting in Guildhall? The courts of justice ought to be expunged from this clause, or Westminster-hall should be omitted. This clause stated, that "it should be lawful for any persons, &c. to meet on any day in which the two Houses, or either of them, should meet and sit, or shall be summoned, or adjourned, or prorogued to meet or sit." Now this, he conceived, must include the whole septennial Parliament. (Cries of no, no; only the days of sitting.) However, his main objection went to the whole of the clause. In the proceedings in Palace-yard there had been no tumult, no outrage, no obstruction; no appearance whatever indicating even so much warmth as had been manifested that night by a right hon. gentleman who had lately returned from an embassy to Lisbon. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) He believed the House would find, not only that this clause was faulty in these respects, but that there was no necessity whatever for adopting it; and that it was a gross violation of the privileges of the citizens of Westminster. (Hear, hear.)

The Hon. Mr. Lyttelton said, that he had assented to the general principle of this bill; and, with regard to the clause now on the table, faulty and exceptionable as he thought it was, he should be inclined to accede to it, if it had been merely a temporary clause; thinking, as he did, that there had been a great abuse of popular meetings, and particularly of the Westminster meetings. He thought that the hon. member for Bramber (Mr. Wilberforce) had argued as if he considered this clause was to be temporary: and if Ministers would make it temporary he should have no objection to it.

When the hon. member concluded, the cries of "question" were very loud, and strangers were ordered to withdraw. During our absence, the House divided on the proposition of Mr. Lyttelton, that the duration of the clause should be limited to July, 1818:

Ayes . . . 34 | Noes . . . 113

A second division took place upon the clause itself—

For it . . . 113 | Against it . . . 30

A conference was then appointed with the Lords to-morrow, to procure their assent to the alteration made to the amendments.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Saturday, March 29.

The Royal assent was given by commission to the Exchequer Court Bill, and some other bills.

Commissioners, the Lord Chancellor, Earl Bathurst, and the Earl of Liverpool.

The Irish Arms Bill, and the Irish Peace Preservation Bill, were read a second time.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS.] Mr. Brogden, accompanied by several members, appeared at the Bar, and delivered a message from the Commons, requesting a conference on the subject of the amendments made by their Lordships in the Seditious Meetings Bill.

The messengers having withdrawn from the Bar,

The Lord Chancellor put the question on the message, and was directed to inform the Commons, that their Lordships agreed to the conference, and appointed the same to be held immediately in the Painted Chamber. In consequence, the messengers of the Commons were called in, and informed thereof by his Lordship.

The following Peers were then appointed to manage the conference on the part of the House:—

The Earl of Westmorland, Marquis Camden, the Earls of Morton, Aberdeen, Bathurst, and St. Germans, Lords Boston and Rolle, who proceeded to the Painted Chamber.

After a short interval the deputation returned, and the Earl of Westmorland stated that the conference had been held with the deputation from the Commons, on whose part it was communicated, that they had not agreed to some, and had made certain alterations in others, of the amendments made by their Lordships to the Seditious Meetings Bill, and that a written statement of the same had been delivered to him.

This paper being read by the Lord Privy Seal, was ordered to lie on the table.

The Earl of Liverpool then moved that this House do not insist upon the amendments so negatived by the Commons, and that it do agree in the alterations of the Commons in the amendments made by their Lordships to the bill in question, which was ordered accordingly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, March 29.

A message was sent to the Lords to request a conference on the amendments made to their Lordships' amendments on the Seditious Meetings Bill.

Mr. Brogden soon after appeared at the Bar, and stated that their Lordships had appointed a conference to be held forthwith in the Painted Chamber.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. B. Bathurst, Mr. Brogden, and others, were appointed to manage the conference on the part of the Commons; and on their return, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, that they had left the Bill and a copy of the amendments for their Lordships' consideration.

A message from the Lords informed the House that their Lordships did not persist in their amendments on the Seditious Meetings Bill, to which the Commons had disagreed; and further, that their Lordships had agreed to the amendments made to the Bill by the Commons.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. B. Wilbraham presented a petition, signed by the gentry, clergy, and freeholders of the township of Leigh and its neighbourhood, in the county of Lancaster, expressing the surprise of the petitioners at certain petitions which had been presented to the House praying for Reform in the representation, &c. and totally disclaiming the sentiments contained in those petitions.—Ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 31.

The Royal assent was given by commission to the Seditious Meetings Bill, and other bills. Commissioners, the Lord Chancellor, Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Melville.

The Irish Peace Bill, and Irish Arms Bill, were committed and reported.

On the motion of the Earl of Liverpool, the House adjourned till Wednesday fortnight.

Monday, March 31.

FORGED NOTES.] Mr. Brougham presented a petition from Mr. Brooks, of High-street, Bloomsbury pawnbroker and silversmith, complaining of having been taken into custody on a charge of felony, because he had kept in his hand a forged Bank of England note, with a view of recovering his loss from the party who paid it him. He had been thus severely treated, torn from his family, and rendered subject to an imputation the most prejudicial to his business, though he had offered to concur with the Bank in any measure for the conviction of the real offender, and though the note had been stamped with the word "forged."

General Thornton and Mr. Curwen stated similar cases of great hardship and oppression.

The petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the House at its rising should adjourn till Monday se'n night.

Mr. Ponsonby said, he should not have objected even to a longer adjournment; but he could not avoid observing, that the House was now separating after the Royal assent had been given to the last of a series of coercive measures—measures which, it was true, were rendered necessary by the public distress, which had produced the immediate cause for them; but Parliament was about to adjourn without having done any thing but enact those coercive measures: he hoped, therefore, that before the House met again, his Majesty's Ministers would have taken some step towards the alleviation of those distresses. He did expect much from the exertions of the Committee that was sitting; and he hoped that, on the return of the House, his Majesty's Ministers, and the Committee together, would be able to state that something had been done. He should not have objected to a longer adjournment if such a hope were held out; and even if it were not, the state of the Speaker's health would prevent him from opposing the motion.

Mr. Canning trusted that the right hon. gentleman would not be disappointed in his expectation concerning the attention which the Committee and his Majesty's Ministers would bestow on the subject before them; but if the right hon. gentleman laid in his claim for a sudden and complete removal of all the distress of the country, he claimed what it was beyond the reach of Ministers to effect, and put impossibilities to be performed by human means. In making such a demand on the limited powers of the Committee, he feared the right hon. gentleman could only be actuated with a view to excite or increase the public discontent. He was certain there could be no want of attention on the part of the Committee; and he hoped that some plan for practical relief, to a certain extent, might be found; but he should be sorry to excite such exaggerated expectations as the right hon. gentleman had held out, for the removal of evils which it was beyond the power of human wisdom to prevent, or human legislation to remove.

Mr. Ponsonby expected no complete or sudden removal of the evils alluded to; but, hitherto, no step had been taken.

Mr. Brougham complained, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) had, in his usual way, not only imputed to his hon. friend (Mr. Ponsonby) what he did not say, but motives, in saying, by which he never could have been actuated (hear, hear); and that the only object of what he had uttered was to excite discontent and disaffection. (Hear, hear.) He put it to the House, whether a more temperate address had ever been made within those walls; his hon. friend had only expressed a hope that something would be done to alleviate the distress of the people. For his part, (though the hon. gentleman might on that account the more impute unjust motives to him for saying so), he was not so sanguine on the labours of the Committee as his hon. friend;

for he well recollected the origin of that Committee, and the manner in which it was composed. He well recollected, that the appointment of the Committee was not conceded as a boon by Ministers, but extorted in consequence of a notice given from an hon. friend of his, that such a Committee would be moved for. He must say one word, too, on a disappointment of another kind, which he foresaw must occur. He was afraid, after all the pains that had been taken to prevent the people of Westminster from meeting, that if the House expected no meetings would take place within a mile, they would be grievously disappointed. He would explain this, in order that the disappointment might fall lightly, and not create what would be termed ground for alarm: though he should not be surprised if Ministers were not much disposed to cry out on such an occasion as against a direct breach of the law. But whatever numbers assembled, and for whatever purpose, no breach of the law would be committed; for in that hurry in which all dignity of proceeding, all due deliberation on a most important subject, and all the forms of that House, had been set at nought, it had entirely escaped the notice of Ministers, that, besides the flaws in the clause respecting Westminster, there were two others that rendered the bill altogether nugatory. The first was, that a meeting might be held in Palace-yard, or elsewhere, for the purpose of addressing the Prince Regent, or the Crown, for the removal of his Majesty's Ministers (hear, hear); because, by the clause in the bill, the meetings were prohibited from considering the alteration of any thing in Church or State; but the removal of his Majesty's Ministers was not any alteration in Church or State. In the next place the object of the bill was to protect Parliament from the vicinity of the Westminster meetings, and they were not to be held within a mile of the doors of Westminster-hall; but there was nothing to prevent a meeting in the hall itself; and one of the largest meetings he ever knew had been held within that building: so that all the citizens of Westminster might, for the consideration of any subject whatever, meet in Westminster-hall, within a pistol-shot of Parliament. He trusted, therefore, that no disappointment would be experienced, no alarm excited, and no argument be adduced for the enactment of further coercive measures, if a meeting should be held in Westminster-hall, the most numerous and best attended of any. He concurred with his hon. friend in the hope that something would be effected during the recess towards alleviating the distress that so loudly demanded attention; and he hoped, also, that during the adjournment no steps would be taken by Ministers touching the affairs of South America; or any thing done to impede the independence of those colonies—an object, the accomplishment of which every liberal mind must so ardently desire. He trusted that Ministers would not commit the country in the way of mediation, more than they had committed already.

Mr. B. Bathurst stated, that the bill did not apply to meetings held while Parliament was not sitting; that he believed the courts of justice had the power of preventing meetings in Westminster-hall during the time they were employed there; and that, at all events, Mr. Fox had on one occasion submitted to their authority on such an occasion. Notwithstanding the defects of the bill, which were no secret to Ministers, he deemed it a salutary measure. It was true, that the prevailing distress was the cause of the measure, for that distress had laid the people open to the arts of designing men. It was impossible to hope that any measures could entirely remove that distress; but every exertion would be made with the hope of alleviating it.

Mr. Brougham explained.

Mr. Curwen said, that the country did expect much from the labours of the Committee; and nothing could be more improper than the temper and tone of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) on this occasion. He hoped something would be done, at least, to excite the hopes of the people, and to retrieve the character of the House, the loss of which, by improper pensions and jobs, had been immense.

Mr. Ponsonby, in explanation, was confident of the propriety of his own motives, and should treat the insinuations against them with perfect contempt, from whatever quarter they came.

Sir J. Newport argued no good from the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Canning) usual mode of putting words into the mouth of honourable gentlemen, and then drawing insinuations out of those very expressions. The language of the honourable gentleman was most dangerous, as being calculated to produce despondency, when the spirits of the people ought to be kept up. He (Sir J. N.) did agree that little had hitherto been done. He himself was as ready as any man to oppose turbulence and faction; but if ever there was a period where the people had exhibited the most patient endurance under every calamity, it was the present. If ever they deserved an alleviation of their sufferings, it was at this moment. Till that alleviation was effected, the least Ministers could do was to hold out an expectation that something would be effected by their efforts. Certain it was, that the distress of the nation would not be relieved by high-sounding words or coercive measures.

The question respecting the adjournment was then put and carried.

The Salt Bill was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Friday fortnight.

Monday, April 14.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.] This being the day to which the House stood adjourned, a considerable number of members assembled at the usual hour of meeting. Mr. Dyson and the other clerks took their seats at the table. At four o'clock, Mr. Dyson, addressing the members, said, he was very sorry to have to acquaint them, that in consequence of the inability of the Speaker to attend in his place, he had that morning received a letter from the right hon. gent., which, with the permission of the House, he would read. The letter, which was then read, was as follows:—

Kidbrook, April 13, 1817.

Sir,—I have to desire that you will acquaint the House, that it is with great concern I feel myself unable to attend their service to-morrow, and that I find, with the deepest regret, a postponement of the public business must, on my account, take place. But though, in my present situation, it might be hazardous for me immediately to return to resume the duties of my office, I have reason to expect, that by the end of the week my health will be so far re-established as to admit of my attending to the service of the House. I have but to add my request, that you will submit this in my name, with the expression my humble duty, to their consideration.

I am, &c.

C. ABBOTT.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose to discharge a duty—a painful duty, as it grew out of the circumstance referred to in the letter which had just been read, but at the same time it was not without satisfaction that he rose to address them on the present occasion, as he was sure there would, on such a subject, be but one feeling in the House—an anxious wish to afford a proof of their respectful attention to the health of their Speaker. They would not forget that his able and zealous exertions in the discharge of the duties of his important situation, had occasioned that loss of health, for which he now claimed their temporary indulgence; and remembering these, he was confident they would concur in the propriety of giving him a further respite from business, in the hope that this would contribute to his perfect restoration. Those who, like him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), had witnessed the whole course of the right hon. gentleman's brilliant career, would unquestionably be among those who felt most regret that such a mark of their high consideration should now be necessary. All knew how unwilling the Speaker was to avail himself of the kindness of the House; and there could be no man among them who did not recollect how he had distinguished himself, even when his health was much impaired, during the last week in which he had sat in the chair, by attention to their convenience, in making new arrangements for regulating the printing and future circulation of their votes. These things borne in mind, he was satisfied every one would sincerely sympathise with the right hon. gent., and be anxious to manifest his feeling on the present occasion, however desirous they might be to avoid interrupting the public business. The Speaker had told them in his letter, that he hoped, by the end of the week, to be able to attend to the service of the House. He thought, in his anxiety to come down at the earliest time possible, it was probable the right hon. gent. had named a period which would be too soon for him to resume the arduous duties of his situation; and, indeed, in a letter which he had written to him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), as a private friend, he had expressed an apprehension, that the adjournment would be of little importance to him, if it were not extended to Monday the 21st instant. As the sittings of the House must shortly be interrupted by an important Court occasion, he was of opinion the House would best consult its own interest by indulging the right hon. gent. with two or three days beyond the time mentioned in the Speaker's private letter, by adjourning over the day set apart for the occasion to which he had referred. Public business might be less interrupted if such a course were pursued, than it would probably be, if the Speaker were prematurely called upon to resume his duties. With this impression on his mind, he anticipated no opposition to the motion he was about to propose, which was, "That this House do now adjourn to Thursday se'nnight."

Mr. Ponsonby heartily concurred in the motion. He fully agreed with the right hon. gent. who had just sat down in his opinion respecting their excellent Speaker, and, indeed, there was but one sentiment in the House on that subject. (Hear, hear.) While he was sorry for the interruption which must necessarily occur in the public business, he could not but express his earnest wishes that the right hon. gent., whose present indisposition was matter of regret to them all, had not, from his great anxiety for discharging his duty to the House and the public, continued to sit in the chair when unable to do so from severe bodily distress. (Hear, hear.) The House had often seen him sitting, when it was obvious how painful it was for him to do so, and he (Mr. P.) had on more than one occasion told him of this. Anxious, however, to do his duty, that justly esteemed individual chose rather to sacrifice personal ease and comfort, than for one moment protract the business of the House. (Hear, hear.) To this anxiety his present illness might be traced, and the House were, therefore, bound, that nothing on their part should be wanting to afford him an opportunity of recovery. (Hear, hear.) This they were bound to, when they considered his unwearied attention to them, his integrity, impartiality, and abilities, and the numerous and invaluable services he had rendered to them. (Hear, hear.) He expressed his earnest and heartfelt wishes, that the health of the right hon. gent. might be re-established; and he thought that it was, therefore, proper, that the House should give him all the time they possibly could, as they might, by doing otherwise, hazard a relapse. It was in this way also they would most successfully accomplish the business before them during the session. He concluded by giving the motion his hearty support. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Grattan and Mr. Brougham entirely concurred in the propriety of the proposed adjournment.

The motion was then put, and unanimously carried.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, April 16.

The House met this day on the expiration of the Easter Recess.

LORD SIDMOUTH'S CIRCULAR LETTER.] Earl Grey called the attention of their lordships to a Circular Letter sent by Lord Sidmouth to the Lords-Lieutenants of the several counties, for the purpose of preventing, as it was stated, the circulation of blasphemous and seditious libels. He thought the document was of so strange as well as of so important a nature, that a copy of it ought to be laid on the table for the perusal and consideration of their lordships, especially as he had learned, that much doubt was entertained by high legal authorities respecting the force and validity of the document. There was another subject to which he likewise wished to call their attention, namely, a case which was said to have been prepared on the subject of the Circular Letter for the opinions of the law officers of the Crown, and which, it was stated, had obtained their sanction. He knew not how that fact really stood, and as the noble Secretary of State was not then in his place, he should content himself with barely adverting to it, with the notice that he should, at the first convenient opportunity after the House should meet again, bring the matter regularly before it. He should for the present only move, "That a copy of the Circular Letter sent by Lord Sidmouth to the several Lords Lieutenants of counties be laid before the House."—Ordered.

IRISH PEACE BILL.] The Earl of Liverpool moved the third reading of the Irish Peace Preservation Bill. This he considered as a measure fraught with the most salutary consequences to the maintenance of peace and good order in that country.

The Earl of Darnley, from what he knew of Ireland and the spirit of its inhabitants, was satisfied there could exist but little ground for apprehending the Irish nation would feel any material repugnance to the enactments of this bill. It must be much more satisfactory to be indebted for the preservation of the public peace to the exertions of the civil power alone, than to the now unconstitutional interference of the military, as had hitherto been too much the case in that country.

Lord Holland coincided with his noble friend in considering the bill entitled to favourable consideration, from the circumstance of its having adopted the more constitutional mode of maintaining order, and preserving the public tranquillity.

The bill was then read the third time.

Upon the motion of the Earl of Liverpool, the House adjourned until Monday next.

Monday, April 21.

LORD SIDMOUTH'S CIRCULAR LETTER. Lord Sidmouth laid on the table his Circular Letter to the Lords Lieutenants of counties in England and Wales, relative to the apprehension of persons selling seditious writings, moved for by Earl Grey on the 16th instant.

Lord Holland observed, that this letter alone was not sufficient for the purpose of bringing the whole case before their lordships. When his noble friend moved for this letter, he had stated that it was his intention to move also, on another occasion, for the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, referred to in that letter; and for the case laid before these officers, upon which the opinion was founded. His noble friend, he understood, most undoubtedly meant to make that motion; and he was anxious that the noble Secretary of State should now state whether he would have any objection to the production of these papers. The Circular Letter of the noble Secretary certainly gave rise to a most important question with respect to the administration of justice in this country; and he understood it was intended to bring the subject formally under discussion, unless, on the production of the case submitted to the law officers of the Crown, and the opinion of these officers upon it, it should appear that such discussion was unnecessary. The letter of the noble lord had been, as there was reason to believe, already productive of some consequences, which, probably, the noble secretary himself never intended. The noble lord, some time ago, supported a bill which had been brought into Parliament for the repeal of the only obnoxious clause which disgraced that glorious law, the Toleration Act; yet, since the passing of a late act (the Seditious Meeting Act), a person had been molested for preaching in a chapel or meeting-house, such doctrines as persons of his religious persuasion thought it their duty to teach, and which they had been permitted to teach for 30, or 40, or 50 years past. This transaction had taken place at Liverpool. It might indeed be said, that it would probably have happened though this Circular Letter had never been published: yet the person to whom he alluded had been held to bail; and this at least warranted a strong suspicion that the Circular in question was the cause of the proceeding. He did not mean to say, that the noble Secretary of State, or any of the persons concerned, were to blame: but it was a matter of very great importance that the subject should be discussed; and that, in order to bring before the House the requisite information for that discussion, the case and opinion should be laid on the table. The person who had been molested in the manner he had stated, was an Unitarian preacher, Mr. Wright, of Liverpool.

Lord Sidmouth.—Their lordships' order had been complied with, and the Circular Letter which he had thought it his duty to publish was now on their table. He would not now enter into the discussion of the subject, but he was most anxious that it should be discussed, and that an opportunity should be afforded to the Ministers of the Crown to justify the proceeding. When the discussion should be brought forward, he would be perfectly ready to state the reasons why he thought himself—he did not say justified, but—bound to publish this Circular Letter to the Lords Lieutenants of counties in England and Wales, under the peculiar circumstances of the present times. Certainly it was not his intention that persons should be disturbed in their religious worship. Of the case which the noble lord had mentioned, he had heard nothing, except what he had just heard from his lordship; but it was a case which would probably have occurred though no such Circular Letter had been published: and he did not see how it was particularly connected with that letter.

The Earl of Lauderdale.—The noble secretary had not stated whether he was willing to lay before the House the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and the case submitted to them upon which that opinion was given. It was utterly impossible to form a correct idea of the soundness of the opinion, unless the case were also produced. The noble lord on the woolsack must be aware that this was the fact, and, therefore, the House could not be properly informed for the discussion without the case as well as the opinion; he trusted that, as the noble secretary was so anxious for discussion, he would have no objection to supply the proper information for that purpose.

Lord Holland did not mean to say that the subject would certainly be brought into discussion by his noble friend, or any other noble lord. In the production of the case and opinion, it might possibly appear, that there was no ground for discussion; but at all events, it was very important that the opinion and the case should be laid before the House. With regard to the case of Mr. Wright, of Liverpool, he did not mean to say that the circumstances might not have happened though the Circular Letter had not been published; but Mr. Wright had been held to bail; and this circumstance warranted a strong suspicion, at least, that the proceeding was the consequence of the Circular Letter.

The Bishop of Chester.—It was not in consequence of preaching the Unitarian doctrines that Mr. Wright had met with any interruption or molestation. He had been charged on oath, by a most respectable gentleman, a merchant of Liverpool, with having preached, that the notion of the immortality of the soul was a mere delusion; and that the idea of a future state was an absurdity. This was the reason that he had been proceeded with in the manner mentioned by the noble lord.

Lord Holland.—The doctrines mentioned by the right reverend prelate were such as one would scarcely have expected to hear from a pulpit; but it was not to the doctrines that he referred, but to the manner in which the individual had been proceeded with, whatever the doctrines were.

The Earl of Rosslyn requested the noble Secretary of State to inform the House whether he had any objection to the production of the case laid before the law officers of the Crown, and their opinion upon it.

Lord Sidmouth replied, that there was no objection to produce the opinion, but that he would oppose the production of the case, and would state his reasons when the motion should be made for its production.

IRISH AGENS BILL.] The Earl of Liverpool moved the third reading of this Bill.

Lord Holland wished to call the attention of the House to the consequences of passing such unconstitutional measures. This bill, which was one of the greatest importance, had been suffered to pass the other House almost without notice, from its being a renewal of a former measure of the same nature. This shewed how cautious they ought to be in giving their sanction to bills of this kind. It had not been thought necessary to extend the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act to Ireland: but, however, he conceived that Ministers were pledged, even by the passing of this bill, to exert themselves the more strenuously to introduce such an effective system of civil police as would render the passing of such bills unnecessary. To that he trusted the Peace Preservation Bill, which had been introduced along with this, would powerfully contribute.

The Earl of Liverpool.—It was true that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act had not been extended to Ireland, because the ground of the disturbed state of Ireland was not disaffection to the Government. Ireland, however, required remedial measures, but measures of a different nature from that of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. The Government of this country, and that of Ireland, had been endeavouring to form a strong and effective system of civil police, in order to render the passing of such bills as this unnecessary. From the state of the Irish population they had, however, experienced great difficulty in then progress towards the accomplishment of this desirable object. The difficulties, however, had greatly diminished, and were daily diminishing. Until, however, such a system could be matured, a measure of this kind was necessary, and it was upon that ground of necessity that the Bill rested.

The Earl of Darnley said, he would not oppose the Bill under the present circumstances of Ireland. Every praise was due to the activity and efficiency of the Administration of the noble lord now at the head of the Irish Government.

Lord Holland moved, that the preamble to the Bill of Rights be read pro forma, which was done accordingly.

The Bill was then read a third time, and passed.

Thursday, April 24.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Earl Grey presented a Petition from Saltcoats, Ardrossan, and other places in that neighbourhood, stating the distresses of the country, and praying for Parliamentary Reform, by the suppression of the representation for decayed Boroughs, and by shortening the duration of Parliaments.—Laid on the table.

LORD SIDMOUTH'S CIRCULAR LETTER.] —Earl Grey moved, that Lord Sidmouth's Circular Letter, laid on the table on a former day, be printed; which was ordered.

The noble earl then stated, that he understood that it had been declared, on the day on which the Circular Letter was produced, that there would be no objection to lay before their lordships the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, mentioned in that Letter; but that there would be objections to the production of the case. What the objection could be to the production of a document so necessary to bring under their lordships' view, the nature of the doubt which had been entertained, and the circumstances of the case upon which the opinion of the Law Officers was founded, he could not conceive. He would, however, now move for the opinion of the Law Officer of the Crown, referred to in the Circular Letter; and when that should be laid on the table, he would then be enabled to judge whether he ought to move for the case, or bring the subject under discussion in a different form. He concluded by moving for the opinion of the Law Officers, which was ordered to be produced.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, April 24.

MR. SPEAKER'S THANKS.] At four o'clock Mr. Speaker rose and addressed the House to the following purport:—

"In returning to the Chair, I have to express to the House my most grateful acknowledgments for their indulgent consideration during my late indisposition. I beg leave to assure the House that I feel most deeply the favourable acceptance which my humble endeavours to discharge my duty in this Chair have experienced from them.

"With respect to the arrears of business which have been occasioned by the departure from the ordinary course of proceeding which arose out of the late unfortunate interruption, I have to propose to the House, first, that all Committees should be revived; and, secondly, to extend the time for receiving the reports of private Bills, from Monday the 12th of May to another week (if that should be the pleasure of the House), namely, to Monday the 19th of May.

"As to public business, the course will be, at the proper hour, for the Clerk to read over the dropped Orders and Notices; of which the House will dispose as it may suit their own convenience." (Hear, hear, hear.)

The question was then put that the time for receiving the Reports of Private Bills be extended to the 19th of May.—Agreed to. The dropped Orders and Notices were afterwards read over, and days appointed for taking them into consideration.

RETRENCHMENT.] Mr. Bennet presented a Petition from the Traders, Manufacturers, and Mechanics of Wolverhampton, praying for a diminution of the present enormous rate of Taxation, and a reduction of the Expenditure. It was signed by upwards of 5000, and stated that, in that district, many had been reduced to extreme poverty, and others had actually perished for want of food. Perhaps in no district of the country had the pressure of public calamity been more severely felt; for to such a miserable situation were the Petitioners reduced, that they actually implored the House to afford them the means of leaving the country, and finding employment in some more favourable realm, where they might find employment different from that suggested by a noble lord (Castlereagh), whom he did not now see in his place, viz. digging holes in the earth, and filling them up again.

Mr. E. Littleton concurred in the statement given by the hon. gentleman, so far as it regarded the distress of the district from which the Petition came; but he would not allow that it generally was the petition, or spoke the sentiments, of the people of Wolverhampton. It was manufactured at a distance from that town; it was brought there by strangers, and methods were taken to procure signatures. He allowed that it might speak the sentiments of those who signed it, but he denied that they were any considerable portion of the inhabitants of that district.

Mr. Bennet explained. He had never said that it spoke the sentiments of any but those who signed it.

The Petition was then read, and ordered to lie on the table.

RELIEF OF THE POOR.] The Hon. W. H. Lyttelton presented a petition from the parish of Old Swinford, in the town of Stourbridge, complaining of the pressure of the poor-rates, to which he wished particularly to call the attention of the House. The burdens of this parish were oppressive beyond the usual rate of imposition: the rate assessed on house-rent was 29s. in the pound; on the rent of land employed in farms

32s. in the pound; and on several kinds of land the rate amounted to the almost incredible sum of 61s. per acre. The population of the parish amounted to 4,381. Of these 1,868 received parish aid. The whole of this burden was laid on 158 individuals, who were the only persons able to contribute. The parish was formerly exemplary for morals and good conduct, and had been reduced to this state by circumstances over which the sufferers had no control. The hon. gentleman begged to press the consideration of this subject on his Majesty's Ministers. He would not move that the petition be referred to the committee on the poor laws, but that it be laid on the table for their consideration. He called upon them to come forward with some plan, and to acquaint the House, and the country generally, what were their intentions.

The petition was brought up and read. It stated that the support of the poor had already ruined many of the former contributors, and would ruin others, unless an immediate relief were obtained.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that though the gentlemen on the other side seldom gave long notice of their complaints or questions, he was not on the present occasion taken by surprise, as the subject had occupied much of his attention, and as he meant on an early day to submit a measure of relief to the House. Without entering into the details of this measure, much less into any justification of it, he would briefly explain its object, and state the time when he intended to bring it forward. On Monday next he would move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to take into consideration a proposition for enabling his Majesty to issue exchequer bills to a limited extent, for the purpose of supplying loans on proper securities, to give encouragement for the employment of the poor. These loans would be advanced to corporations, to parishes, or to associations of individuals who might be desirous to employ, in any public work, the poor in their neighbourhood, upon their giving security to the commissioners at whose disposal or under whose management the issue of bills should be placed, that they would be repaid. Security might in parishes be given for the poor-rate. He had conversed with many persons well acquainted with the situation and necessities of the county, and was disposed to believe that between one and two millions of bills would be sufficient to give the relief contemplated, and answer all the purposes of such a loan. He entered into this explanation concerning the limits of the sum, to prevent that alarm with regard to the magnitude of the issue that might be excited by the proposal of any indefinite means of relief from the public purse. He believed such a measure would not in any material degree affect the money market, which could afford all the issue without great deterioration. The right hon. gentleman concluded by giving notice, by command of the Prince Regent, that he would on Monday move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to consider the propriety of issuing exchequer bills to a limited extent, to afford loans upon security to be given for the local and temporary relief of the poor, by encouraging works for the employment of their industry.

The Hon. W. Lamb said, he would not enter into the details of the plan, as they were not yet before the House. He would not offer either his support or his opposition to the measure, nor would attempt to decide upon the effect that it would produce on the money-market: but there was one point of view in which it deserved the most serious consideration (hear); and that was, whether it was to be considered as a means of temporary relief, or a substitute for all those other measures which were rendered necessary for remedying the evils which had arisen out of the system under which we have been so long acting. In this sense, the proposed measure involved the consideration of a system which had been already productive of serious inconvenience, and threatened farther evils. He hoped, therefore, this plan of the right hon. gentleman was not the only one. He did not deny the propriety of this step, but he would protest against any reliance on its sufficiency. The subject was now pressed upon us by necessity: we saw the calamity under which the country laboured; we should not rest satisfied with palliatives, but should go at once to the root of the evil, and endeavour permanently to counteract its malignity, rather than apply temporary remedies, which might ultimately tend to increase its efficiency. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham professed himself desirous to abstain from all discussion of the measure. He wished, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take one thing into consideration before he attempted to carry it through the House. As far as he understood him, his object was to grant an issue of Exchequer bills to corporations or associations, for the relief of the poor on their securities, recommending them to employ the poor in public works. With respect to bodies corporate he would say nothing, nor would he give any opinion about the propriety of the advance to them. He, however, entreated the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider what would be the effect of offering such means of relief to the disposal of associations of private gentlemen, at the same time requiring from them such securities as may be necessary to protect the public interest. The measure would place those in the most delicate and embarrassing situation with regard to their poorer neighbours. As soon as any of the suffering poor began to reflect on their relation to the more wealthy, and saw that they procured no means of relief from them, what would they say? Would they not say, Government has placed the means of assistance within your reach, and we are starving, because you are so hard-hearted as to refuse your securities for advances that might relieve us, without injury to you. If they came forward on this remonstrance, they would render themselves liable to the process of extent: if they did not so expose their property, they would render every poor unemployed starving man their personal enemy. He (Mr. B.) did not deny that this objection might be answered; but he threw it out for the attentive consideration of the right hon. gentleman, and hoped it would have its due weight.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer.—I can only say, that in granting this relief, his Majesty's Ministers do not in the slightest manner wish it to be understood that they at all think it will afford permanent relief to the country. The great object they have in view, is to afford temporary relief, till those sources be again reopened, which have unfortunately been shut, but which there is every reason to believe will not long be the case. Nor is it meant to prevent any thing being done by Parliament, but on the contrary to do every thing in the mean time while Parliament is deliberating what can possibly be done. I have been fully understood by the hon. and learned gentleman opposite, and the hints he has thrown out will be a suitable subject for the House to direct their attention, when the question is submitted to their consideration. They will, without doubt, do every thing to prevent that disadvantage alluded to from taking place. The House, however, cannot but see the necessity of the public distress being relieved as soon as possible, and the great advantage which will result from no delay taking place in granting this relief. Every thing possible shall be attended to when the proposition is laid before the Committee of the whole House on Monday. When the sums granted to parishes are mentioned, it will be seen that the first security demanded will be on the parish rates, with security also being given by persons. I have only further to add, that I judged it proper both to the House and to the monied interest to give some explanation of the proposed grant, and shall conclude by expressing my confidence it will meet that attention from the Committee which its importance demands.

Mr. Brougham.—I see I have fully understood the plan of the right hon. gentleman, but I merely took the opportunity to throw out this hint for his consideration. It is proper, if money is advanced, that security be given, and wishing that every attention should be paid to the interests of all parties, I wished him to notice this. At present I shall not further anticipate what may then take place.

Mr. Littleton observed, that the execution of the plan proposed by the right hon. gentleman must necessarily be attended with considerable difficulties. He trusted that the relief would not be strictly confined to the quarters mentioned by the right hon. gentleman. With respect to the parish funds, loaded as they were, he thought they would be a very insufficient security for the money advanced. The subject was of infinite importance; and he strongly recommended to the right hon. gentleman to postpone the consideration of it beyond Monday, in order to give hon. members an opportunity of communicating with their constituents, and of arranging their own ideas with respect to it.

Mr. Ponsonby was not prepared to give an immediate opinion on the proposition; but urged the propriety of deferring for a few days the discussion on a subject of so much weight and importance.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed his anxiety to consult the wishes of honourable gentlemen on the subject. Would it be satisfactory, were he to confine himself to the statement of his plan on Monday, and to defer calling on the House for any opinion until a subsequent day?

Mr. Ponsonby said that would be very satisfactory.

The motion was then agreed to.

Friday, April 25.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS.—LICENCES.] The Earl of Darnley rose and observed, that the construction which had been put by certain magistrates, in a late instance, on the Seditious Meetings Act, was a matter which ought not to pass without animadversion. That construction was, that it had been the intention of the Legislature to prevent the discussion of all political topics whatever. If magistrates were to put such a construction on the Act, and to exercise their discretionary power in this way, their lordships ought to avail themselves of the clause which enabled them to reconsider the provisions of that Act in the present session, and to make such alterations as the circumstances might appear to call for. He regretted that the noble Secretary of State for the Home Department was not present, as he wished to put a question to him on this subject; but he would take the liberty to call their lordships' attention to the matter on Monday, and would reserve what he had farther to say upon it till that day.—Adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, April 25.

ATTORNEYS.] Mr. Casberd presented a petition from certain Solicitors and Attorneys, practitioners in his Majesty's courts at Westminster, praying that the Act of the 44th of the King, regarding conveyancers, might be reviewed for the purpose of being repealed or amended.—Laid on the table.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord A. Hamilton presented a petition from the Provost, &c. of Linlithgow, praying for Retrenchment and a Reform of Parliament.—Ordered to lie on the table.

LOTTERIES.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the House resolved itself into a Committee of Ways and Means.

The right hon. gentleman rose to propose resolutions for raising a supply to his Majesty by a lottery. As the subject of the lottery had been so lately discussed, he thought it superfluous to enter into any farther observations on the subject at present. He would merely, therefore, move, that the Committee resolve that the Commissioners of the Treasury be allowed to contract for a number of tickets, not exceeding 60,000, that 10*l.* be charged upon every ticket to Government, and that this sum be paid into the Exchequer, without any deduction whatever.

Mr. Lyttelton could not let this opportunity pass without entering into some general animadversion, and proposing certain clauses to qualify a measure, the principle of which, though obnoxious, he had no hopes of being able to explode. He would propose, as a clause, that the number of tickets should be reduced, which, he believed, would do no serious injury to the revenue, as the whole of the tickets were never sold. He had indeed heard that four-fifths was the utmost that were generally disposed of. The excessive multiplication of tickets, therefore, answered no other purpose than the disgraceful multiplication of those misrepresentations and fabrications called lottery puffs. It was in the discretion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce the number of tickets, as the act merely said that a number not exceeding 60,000 might be contracted for.—He would propose another clause, that the boys at Christ's Hospital should not be employed in drawing the tickets. This clause was now rendered less necessary, from the laudable resolution of the governors of this charity, by which they prohibited any of the boys from being employed in this office in future. He should not be surprised, however, to hear that the lottery-office people dressed out boys in masquerade to personate the boys of Christ-church. This would surprise him the less, when he recollected that all the newspaper editors, with one honourable exception, for the sake of the considerable profits that the lottery advertisements afforded them, admitted such gross and contemptible fabrications into their columns. The honourable exception to which he alluded was the editor of the Sheffield Iris, who refused to disgrace his paper by such trash; and who deserved the more credit, as he not only stood alone in this laudable resolution, but surrendered a considerable source of profit.

The resolutions were then agreed to, and the Report ordered to be received on Monday next.

TITHES.] On the motion for the second reading of the bill to authorize the granting leases of tithes,

Mr. F. Lewis, after some observations on the different acts empowering justices of the peace to levy the small tithes, and those not exceeding 10*l.* in amount, by warrant of distress, expressed a wish that it should be an instruction to the committee, to provide for amending such parts of the late act as referred to this branch of their authority (the 53*d* of the King, c. 127,) for the purpose of proposing a clause extending their power to the determination of complaints for recovery of tithes to the amount of 20*l.* The bill having been read a second time, this motion was put and carried, the committee being appointed for Friday next.

SALT DUTIES.] Mr. Gulcraft, on rising to bring forward the motion of which he had repeatedly given notice, and which the occurrence of untoward circumstances alone had so long delayed, felt some satisfaction in reflecting, that it would not be necessary for him to trespass for any great length of time on the attention of the House. As far as he had been able to learn the sentiments of individual members, he believed there was very little difference of opinion with regard to the principle of this question. All seemed to agree in considering the duties now imposed on salt as enormous in their amount, and grievous in their operation; but some of those by whom he apprehended that his motion for a committee to inquire into them would be opposed, represented the difficulties of discovering a fair and just commutation for this branch of the revenue as insurmountable. If he were to judge, however, of the interest taken by the public in the discussion of this subject by the extensive and well-informed correspondence in which it had engaged him, he should infer that there was none respecting which their expectations were more eager, or their conviction more complete. For this reason, as well as others, he regretted the postponement which had unavoidably taken place. He had indeed heard, that a considerable decrease had occurred in the receipt of the last quarter's duties on this article, and that this falling off in the revenue was attributed to his agitation of the question. Sorry as he should be to find himself the cause of such a circumstance generally, and to hear that the loss was already estimated at 80,000*l.* he was still disposed to rejoice that some change of policy was so confidently anticipated by the principal purchasers and dealers in that commodity. The motion which he was about to submit was founded upon the proceeding adopted in 1801, when a similar motion was made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of an administration of which the right hon. gentleman was an efficient member, and was unanimously agreed to.—Every individual knew and felt the enormous amount and severe pressure of this burden. The duty was no less than 15*s.* on the bushel of salt, the prime cost of which was but 6*d.* The duty, therefore, as compared with the original value of the article, was 3*s* thirty to one; in other words, a hundred pounds worth of salt paid 3000*l.* duty! Such a tax as this mixed itself with every thing connected with the price of labour and the subsistence of the poor. It fell with grievous weight on the prices of butter, bacon, fish, meat, and all the primary and indispensable articles of food among the lower classes. In this point of view its effects were as impolitic as they were unjust. It operated as an income tax on the wages of the poor; and he denied that, in the existing state of the country, the labourer could levy its amount on his employer, by procuring a proportionate advance on his wages. The price of labour was not now regulated by the price of food; a redundant population, and diminished trade, had left it dependent entirely on such competition for it as remained. (Hear, hear.) It was necessary, therefore, in the present circumstances of society, that the essential articles of subsistence should be exempted from taxation as far as was possible, consistently with the political safety of the country. The Report of the Committee which sat in 1801 appeared to him to be quite conclusive on the subject of the impolicy of these duties; and as this was the only documentary evidence to which he could now refer, he begged leave to trouble the House with reading a few extracts from it. [The substance of the passages here read by the hon. gentleman was, that the inquiries of the Committee had convinced them of the impossibility of reconciling the collection of this impost with the advantages to be derived from the free use of and trade in the commodity; that the fisheries laboured under restraints without a corresponding benefit to the revenue, the exemptions in their favour being clogged with conditions that induced the persons engaged in them to prefer the payment of the duties to the acceptance of the exemption (hear, hear); that a depôt established for the purpose of remedying this evil had entirely failed; and that the most beneficial consequences would probably result to the commerce and expenditure of the country, if a repeal of these duties could be accomplished.]—All he now desired was an inquiry. He expected to be told of the great importance of this article to the revenue—that it annually produced the sum of a million and a half; and he was ready to admit that it was impossible, in the existing circumstances of the country, to surrender such a sum without compensation. But the question was, whether the sacrifice would not be followed by an ample indemnification for the loss, in the benefits which it would be the means of extending to agriculture, manufactures, and the fisheries; opening new sources of commercial enterprise, and rewards to active industry? After the long period of suffering through which the middling and lower orders had passed, and the burdens under which they still laboured, they deserved some boon at the hands of Parliament, which might find its way to their cottages and their hearts. On the best of his information he believed, that no benefit more useful could be conferred, or would be more gratefully received.—Among the different authorities which he had consulted, in relation to this inquiry, was a pamphlet published by Mr. Burke, in 1769, in which he made it a matter of boast and congratulation, in comparing the situation of France and England, that we paid but 2½*d.* per pound, whilst in France the price of salt was 5*d.* He mentioned this, and reminded the House, that the price was now 5*d.* here, for the purpose of shewing how important a feature in the scale of national prosperity this object appeared to the luminous mind of that statesman.—This tax was first established in the reign of William and Mary; and, according to the prevailing practice, was introduced as a temporary measure, and to no greater amount than three-halfpence per gallon. In four years afterwards it was raised to threepence halfpenny; and by the 20th of Geo. II. was made perpetual. During the present reign, the statute-book would shew frequent and large additions, amounting, when Mr. Addington proposed his committee, to 10*s.* per bushel; to which Mr. Pitt had subsequently carried an additional duty of 5*s.* against the opposition of Sir W. Pulteney; and, as he believed, upon the assurance, that on the return of peace it would become matter of consideration.—The scientific part of this question was, perhaps, the most curious and interesting, although he felt that the House was not prepared to go into it. The free use of the article would, however, enable chymists to multiply their experiments, and create manufactured preparations that might ultimately be extremely productive to the revenue. On this part of the subject he would refer the House for farther information to an ingenious pamphlet published by Mr. Parkes. With regard to its use, as an article of manure, his own experience, which was very limited, had not yet pointed out to him that it could be of great utility as applied to arable lands, though this was a point of which he was not convinced; but on grass land it was of the utmost advantage, and particularly in rendering hay of bad quality, which otherwise cattle would not touch, at once palatable and nutritive. Its most important value, however, was undoubtedly in the fisheries; and it was extraordinary that we, a nation of islanders, should be so blind to the advantages of our maritime situation in supplying us with abundance of necessary food, that whilst our own fishermen, on account of the salt tax, either would not take the fishes, or threw them back again when taken, we were providing foreigners with salt to cure the fishes, which they caught upon our own coasts. (Hear, hear.) If the policy to be observed was, perish commerce, perish agriculture, let the revenue flourish! he would remind the House, that without agriculture and commerce there could no longer be any revenue.—The hon. member concluded by moving, that a select Committee be appointed to inquire into the laws relating to the Salt duties, and the means of remedying the inconveniencies arising therefrom; and to report the same with their opinion thereupon, from time to time, to the House.

Mr. Davenport said, the policy out of which these imposts sprung appeared to him to have been blind, narrow, and mistaken; they had probably precluded a degree of prosperity, against which the revenue they had yielded was as nothing in the balance. He was well aware of the difficulties by which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was embarrassed in providing for the necessities of the State; but he should support the proposition for a Committee: and was inclined to believe, that this branch of revenue was better managed in foreign countries than in our own, both in regard to the amount of duties and the importation of the article from abroad.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it necessary that this investigation should at least be delayed in the present circumstances of the country. It was incumbent on the hon. gent. to have shewn either the possibility of finding a commutation, or of our dispensing with a revenue of 1,500,000*l.* There was always considerable difficulty in the new arrangement of a financial system, even when its component parts had not been long put together; but this was a branch of revenue as old as the Revolution. In Queen Anne's reign, it amounted to 3*s.* 4*d.* per bushel; a considerable sum, when the different value of money at that period was considered. In the year 1730, it was felt to be so objectionable as to be greatly reduced; but was restored two years afterwards. The pamphlet of Mr. Burke, to which the hon. gent. had alluded, was written before the commencement of the American war. A bill was now under the consideration of the House for allowing the use of rock salt, duty free, for the purpose of curing fish, which, in his opinion, would answer all the purposes. At the same time, if the House would take the trouble to trace the progress of the salt laws, they would find, that for a long time all salt was subject to duties; and the use of salt now, at 5*d.* per pound, compared with what it was in Queen Anne's time, namely, 2½*d.* per pound, could not be said to be extravagantly purchased. Indulgences were now granted which, at that period, were not even thought of. With regard to the use of salt for the purposes of agriculture, great difference of opinion existed as to its utility and advantages in manure. He was not quite certain that some indulgence might not be given to salt used for cattle; but he apprehended that, even in that case, the increased consumption would not be very great. In short, there was no fact stated by the hon. gent. which was not included in the bill now under the consideration of the House. He would beg leave, however, to read to the House an extract from a paper signed by the proprietors of several extensive salt-works, in consequence of their having heard of the motion which the member for Rochester (Mr. Calcraft) intended to make. Those proprietors who resided principally in the county of Chester were decidedly of opinion that his motion would ultimately be injurious to their interests. (Hear, hear.) Under all these circumstances, the House would do well to postpone the consideration of this important matter until the bill in question had been fully discussed; and, upon these grounds, he felt it his duty to move the previous question.

Mr. Tremayne observed, that all the persons concerned in the fisheries in the west of England were of opinion, that the bill to which the right hon. gent. had alluded would be extremely detrimental to their interests. They thought that rock salt would be of no service to them whatever, and therefore he trusted that gentlemen would not make up their minds till the question had been discussed in a Committee. He should certainly give his support to the motion.

Mr. Curwen verily believed, that this unjust, oppressive, and impolitic tax, cutting up the very resources of the country by the roots, would not stand one moment before the body of evidence which would be brought before a committee. He was exceedingly glad to find, by the notice of the motion which the right hon. gent. gave last evening, that he was at length alive to the extent and consequences of the general distress that now prevailed—a distress so great and universal, that Ministers themselves were at last compelled to propose the adoption of a measure wholly unparalleled in the history of this country. Ought we not, then, to go into a view of our foreign commerce and domestic resources, and to see whether we could find employment for this unemployed portion of the community. The repeal of this tax would be the means not only of increasing our agriculture, but of enabling the labouring classes to purchase wholesome food at a cheap and easy rate. Two hundred years ago, it was said that the Dutch made of the fisheries above two millions; but we did not now make above one million and a half, and the Dutch made ten millions. In Holland every fifth man was a fisherman; whereas we had not above 60,000 fishermen. If at this time we were compelled to maintain a million of people from want, they must cost the nation five millions some way or other. A noble lord (Castlereagh), whom he did not then see in his place, said that if he could not employ the people otherwise, he would employ them in digging a hole and filling it up again. He was by no means prepared to go this length; but he would say, if you can employ 500,000 people, it would be worth while to give a bounty of four millions for the fisheries. He thought there was no probability that our manufacturers would ever be able again to manufacture to the amount they had done: a considerable alteration had taken place in the views and policy of foreign states, and they would now begin to manufacture for themselves. The great export from this country formerly was grain: it was the great source of our wealth, and the principal commodity on which we relied. Was it impossible, then, to recur to that species of merchandise? Was there, in fact, any other mode, under the altered state of the country, and of the nations of Europe, to which we could resort? It behoved us to set out upon a system which was likely to carry us through our difficulties, and not to embark upon uncertain speculations. Up to 1760, we exported from two to three millions in grain; but since that time nearly a million of persons had been transferred from agriculture to manufactures, which had occasioned a considerable increase in the consumption of the higher kind of food. The use of salt in the feeding of sheep and cattle, and for the purposes of manure, was of the utmost importance. He was quite sure, that in feeding of stock an immense saving might be made. Salt was also a very material article in the manufacturing of iron; it not only rendered it more malleable, but likewise infinitely a better quality. Lord Dundonald, to whom the country was under very great obligations, had discovered that it was extremely useful in making soap; and there could be no doubt but that it might be employed with considerable advantage in many other manufactures. The country had certainly experienced very great relief from the discontinuance of the income-tax and the malt-tax; but he heartily wished that the right hon. gentleman had kept the malt-tax, and given up the salt-tax. Nothing could tend more effectually to alleviate the distresses of the country, seeing how this unjust and impolitic tax presses upon the poor man. Every poor cottager, whose earnings amounted to 30*l.* a year, pays 30*s.* on five stone of salt. Compare this (said the hon. member) with the man of 10,000*l.* a-year, who pays but 10*l.* When we called upon the labouring classes to contribute to their own support, ought we not to give something out of which they could contribute to that support? In the present situation of the country, he was aware that the right hon. gentleman could not afford to diminish the revenue; but by repealing this tax we should be able to draw a greater revenue from agriculturists and manufacturers. He was firmly persuaded, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, even if he could have carried the renewal of the income tax, (than which a more oppressive and destructive tax never existed,) would not have been able to collect it. (Hear, hear.) If, however, the salt-tax were to be repealed, and, in lieu of it, the right hon. gent. were to lay a tax on the tenant, there was not a farmer that would not put money into his pocket from the benefit he would derive from it. A tenant of 100*l.* a year would save 20*l.* by the use of salt in this way. "It would be (said the hon. gent.) a saving to me of 200*l.* a year on 130 head of cattle and 500 sheep." If the right hon. gentleman were to put a duty of one per cent. on houses—if he were to put 5*s.* on each cottager now paying 30*s.* for salt, he would be putting 25*s.* into their pockets. There could exist no doubt whatever, but that substitutes for this tax might be found, though, certainly, commutations were not a very popular measure, since we often had the original tax re-imposed upon us. The right hon. gentleman and the House might look to the Committee on the Poor Laws; but it was in vain to look to them, unless some means could be devised to give vigour and activity to the great and overwhelming population now unemployed. Nothing was more likely to induce the lower orders to support their privations with fortitude and patience, than to see a disposition in the House to go into a Committee on this subject. He again declared, that he thought a substitute might be found by which the lower classes of the people, who ought to be relieved, might be relieved. He wished he could hear the right hon. gentleman get up and give that cheering hope, that we might see the population again employed. He (Mr. C.) thought that the repeal of this tax would employ many thousands of thousands, and therefore should give his hearty concurrence to the motion.

Mr. Robinson gave every credit to the hon. gentleman for the fairness of his motives, in bringing this subject before the House; and he hoped that he would also give him credit for impartiality, in the view which he took of the subject. There certainly was something extremely interesting to our feelings, in the pamphlet alluded to, which, no doubt, had led to the consideration of this matter; but the more he reflected upon it, the more he was convinced that the view which had been taken of the question, was founded on a very exaggerated idea of its advantages. Unless there was sufficient ground for supposing that the repeal would be attended with those advantages, the House should pause before they were fully satisfied as to the substitute they should adopt. The hon. mover had abstained from recommending any commutation for this tax; but the hon. gentleman who had just sat down, had departed from that example, and given the House his notion of a substitute. He (Mr. R.) had great doubt whether his proposition would not impose a more grievous burden than that which he proposed to take off. It was said, that it would vivify our manufactures; and would send to the fisheries all who were acquainted with a maritime life, in order to obtain a livelihood. These were the magnificent prospects they gave us; but he was afraid that we should not derive any of those benefits which they so fondly promised. With regard to the fisheries, he did not believe that the want of employment arose out of the duty on salt. Fish was at this moment sold at the lowest price at which it could be sold by the persons who caught it, at 2*d.* a pound; but the almost difference in price occasioned by the duty, would not amount to a fraction of a farthing, compared with the 2*d.* It was not the duty, therefore, which could prevent the consumption. The people who caught the fish did not complain of the duty on salt, but they said they wanted a market. But whatever impediment the salt duty might be to them, would be removed by the bill before the House. With respect to mineral alkali, he had to observe, that there was a particular spring in the North of England, which was supposed to be not a common brine spring, though he believed it was, and the persons to whom it belonged were enabled to manufacture salt and mineral alkali, without being subjected to duty or being liable to any of the regulations of the Salt Laws. But had any body purchased from them? No, and they had become bankrupts. One of the uses of mineral alkali was dyeing; but the difference occasioned by the Salt Duty on one yard of cotton or linen would not amount to the fraction of a farthing, and therefore, it could not prevent the cotton printer from selling cheap.—Mr. Parkes had enumerated a long list of articles in the manufacture of which great advantage would be derived from a repeal of duty; but if they looked to most of the articles, they would be found of inconsiderable consequence—sal-ammoniac for instance. Why, the whole used in the country did not exceed two hundred tons—the additional expense occasioned by the duty on the article on which it was employed, was but as a drop of water to the ocean. Mr. Parkes said it was used by ingenious chemists in making experiments in corrosive sublimes and calomels. Many members of that House might have occasionally experienced great benefit from a dose of calomel, but he really did not think that the Tax on the quantity of salt used in these articles could amount to much.—He certainly was obliged to Mr. Parkes for publishing the book—it gave him much information with respect to subjects with which he was before unacquainted; but he thought he had swelled his list with articles which could hardly be well taken into consideration in a question of this kind.—Lord Somerville, who was one of the best judges on these subjects, had calculated that one thousand sheep would require a ton of salt in the year. The expense of a ton of salt was 30*l.* So that the charge of this improvement in the treatment of sheep, which was to ameliorate their mutton, and even their wool, would not be more than 6*d.* or 7*d.* each sheep in the year. Was it possible then, that it was the expense of salt which had prevented its general use in this way? In manure also salt was said to be useful. It was applied either by sowing it on the land, or by mixing it in compost. But what was the quantity required for these purposes? About a bushel per acre. (Mr. Curwen said across the House six bushels.) He was surprised to hear a practical man say so—as he was convinced the use of salt in such proportion would entirely destroy vegetation. It was used on arable land to the amount of one, two, or three bushels an acre—but take the greatest of these quantities—it would not exceed 3*l.* an acre, which was cheaper than any other manure which could be applied. It was pretty evident, therefore, that the dearth of salt at present could not be an obstacle to the use of it. There might be many reasons against the use of salt in these ways—there might be prejudices against it, but it was evident, that it was not necessary to repeal the duty to enable the persons interested, to apply it to all the purposes of agriculture, if it were really beneficial. While it was obvious, that the reasons chiefly urged for the repeal of this tax were nugatory, it became the House, in the present state of the finances, gravely and seriously to consider before it consented to cut off 1,500,000*l.* from the revenue. In this instance, too, when it was proposed to repeal a tax of long standing, he thought it might fairly be urged, that the person who proposed to abolish the tax, should at the same time point out the means by which the deficiency thus created was to be filled up. As no such means had been pointed out, he could not think it expedient to acquiesce in the motion.

Mr. W. Smith was willing to take up the argument exactly where the hon. gentleman had left it. He had recommended the House to pause, and consider seriously before they adopted measures to cut off a source of revenue amounting to 1,500,000*l.* a year; but what were the measures his hon. friend had proposed?—what, but that the House should pause, and seriously consider the matter in a committee. He himself should object to such a measure without first going into a committee, in which alone the details of the subject could be thoroughly examined and sifted. But there was one point to which the hon. gentleman had very little attended: it was this, that by every committee that had sat on the subject, the abolition of the salt duty had been recommended. It was not rejected till it was debated in the House; they who had paused and considered the matter in a committee, had uniformly recommended the repeal. On such a subject, there was no necessity for asperity or party feeling; and he believed that the hon. gent. himself would think the repeal a proper measure, if any substitute for the revenue could be found. The loss of revenue was, indeed, a serious consideration; but he (Mr. S.) was persuaded that none would ensue; however, if it should, was there nothing to set off against such a loss in the advantages that would arise from the repeal of the duty? At present the poor man paid by far the greater proportion of the tax; and for this reason, as well as the others that had been adduced, he wished it to be repealed.

Lord Ebrington supported the motion for a committee. If the repeal of the duty caused any deficiency in the revenue, that ought to be made up by economy; but no tax was so injurious as that which operated on the lower orders.

Sir G. Pole objected to the continuation of the tax, and hoped it would be either repealed, or materially modified.

Sir J. Newport maintained, that the only practical means of trying all the bearings of this, or any other tax, was by examining the question before a committee; and the reasons urged by the hon. gentleman against going into a committee on this occasion, would go to preclude the House from entering into a committee on any tax whatever; but a committee had been appointed to inquire into the leather-tax last year, and a committee held on this very tax had strongly condemned it. Then the hon. gentleman had shewn a petition, the argument of which in effect was, “If you reduce the duty, a great many more will enter into the trade; and therefore we pray that our monopoly may not be disturbed.” But independently of the absurdity of this petition, he reprobated the practice of producing a pocket memorial fitted for the very occasion. Why were no memorials produced against the tax? Many had been addressed to Government by the fisheries and other bodies; but, at any rate, all the arguments adduced by the hon. gentleman, were in favour of going into a committee. It was doubtful, he said, whether salt could be usefully employed in agriculture—reason for going into a committee to inquire. It was possible that the revenue might incur a loss—reason for going into a committee to ascertain the amount. For his part, he believed that salt might be employed in agriculture to the greatest advantage; he had known part of a park laid down to grass, twenty-five years ago, with salt as manure; and so great had been the benefit, that though the rest of the park was dried up, sheep could still feed on the part where the salt had been applied. He thought Ministers would not discharge their duty to the community by little paltry temporizing expedients; but they would perform their duty, and the House would perform its duty, by going into a committee, and examining the whole question to the best of their power. It was not by assertion, not by pocket memorials, not by Exchequer bills, that the distress of the country could be relieved; it could be relieved only by economy, by examining into grievances, or by shewing at least, that inability to remove them afforded some extenuation for their continuance.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that not one memorial against the salt-tax had been presented to the Treasury, nor any petitions, except those which were made against taxes of every description.

Mr. Rose admitted that the salt-tax did bear heavily on the poorer classes, but then it was impossible to find any productive tax that did not. There was no necessity for a committee, because the House was already in possession of all that could be urged against the tax. It must be recollected, that a deficiency of 80,000*l.* had already been incurred, and a greater loss might be feared if the trade were given up by those now concerned in it. He did not believe that salt was ever much used in agriculture; and he had reason to know that the fisheries were not affected by the duty. With respect to the real burden on the poorer classes, it might be pretty accurately estimated, when it was considered that the consumption of salt for a man and his family, seldom exceeded 28*lb.* a year.

Sir T. Acland contended that this tax found its way into the poorest cottage. It prevented the preservation of meat, and especially of pig meat. The addition of 15*s.* on the pig which he killed at the end of the year, was a sum so great as now to preclude the poor man from profiting by almost the only opportunity he had of enjoying animal food.

Mr. Calcraft replied. No good reason had been shewn for refusing the motion. If the applications of interested individuals to the Treasury were to prevail against the general interests of the country, and against the opinions expressed in reports of committees of that House, he could not tell where such a system was to stop. If such was the course Ministers were determined to pursue, what hope could there be of any effectual remedy for the present difficulties of the country? The right hon. gentleman stated, that the revenue would suffer greatly if this tax was abandoned; and intimated, that those who proposed its repeal were bound to find a substitute. He, however, did not conceive that to be any part of his duty as a member of Parliament. He had pointed out a tax which was oppressive to the people, and injurious to the country; and on these grounds he thought it ought to be repealed, even though the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with all his ingenuity in the art of taxation, should be unable to find a substitute. He wished to remind the House of the opinion given in the Report of the Committee in 1801, on the subject of the salt duties. The right hon. gentleman himself was a member of that committee: and from his manner of treating the subject, from his opposing the motion without any reasonable argument against it, but relying on a paper which he produced from his pocket, it was probable that he still retained the same sentiments which he held at the time of that Report. The right hon. gentleman, it appeared, had been busily employed during the holidays, in endeavours to make out something like a case to defeat any application for the repeal of the salt duties, and he had of course collected every thing that could be said in their favour; but he hoped the House would not be influenced by the opinions of persons interested in the maintenance of monopolies. The right hon. gentleman regarded the various chymical articles, the extensive manufacture of which was prevented by the dearness of salt, as trifling; but these articles were no more trifles in commerce, than armorial bearings, hair-powder, &c. were trifles in taxation. It was the addition of trifles that produced millions of revenue. The fact had been proved, that sal-ammoniac, calomel, and many other articles, the composition of which salt entered in, might be brought into the market, if the common salt were reduced in price; and whatever the right hon. gentleman might think, this was a matter of no trifling consideration to the country. He should not detain the House longer, as the subject had now been sufficiently discussed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, April 28.

Lord Sidmouth laid on the table the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, referred to in his circular Letter.—Ordered to be printed.

DEBATING SOCIETIES.] The Earl of Darnley.—It would be in the recollection of their lordships, that when the Seditious Meetings Act was under discussion, there was no objection which had been so much insisted upon by those who opposed the bill as the discretionary powers given to the magistrates; but he believed that even those who had urged that objection most strongly, had never anticipated a case so extraordinary as that to which he had called their attention when the House last met. At that time he was not fully acquainted with the facts of the case, and the nature of the society to which the licence had been refused; but he had found, upon inquiry, that the account in the newspapers was substantially correct. This society had existed for twenty or thirty years, and consisted of most respectable persons, members of the universities and inns of court; and they intended, as he was informed, to present petitions to both Houses of Parliament, which would bring the subject before the House in a more regular and formal manner. He did not think it proper, therefore, at present to go more at large into the case of that particular society; but he could not suffer a day to pass without asking, whether this was the construction really put upon the act by the framers of it, or by the Legislature. He conceived it impossible that such could have been their meaning. Application was made to the magistrates in behalf of this society for a licence, and they were informed, that it was the practice of that society to discuss literary, historical, and political subjects. The magistrates insisted that no licence ought to be granted, unless the questions were previously laid before them: and ultimately refused the licence, giving as a reason for the refusal, that the object of the act was to prevent all political discussion whatever. It was not on account of this society in particular that he was now speaking, but on account of all the subjects of this country. They had been taught to believe, that they were living under a free Constitution; and though he had not concurred in the provisions of the act in their utmost extent, yet even after that act passed, he had conceived that some freedom had still been left to the people of England to discuss political subjects; and that it was not the object of the act to prevent all political discussion whatever. He did not believe that the noble Secretary of State had interfered in this business as he had done on a late occasion in another matter. He could not believe that the noble secretary could have sent instructions to the magistrates to act as they had done; but rather thought, that the noble secretary would feel under some obligation to him for giving him this opportunity to explain. But if it was possible that such a construction could be put on the act, unless the House was willing to forfeit every claim to the confidence of the country, it ought not to lose an hour without proceeding to a revision of the act, in order to amend it, so as to prevent the possibility of such a misconstruction.

Lord Sidmouth.—This was a most extraordinary appeal to him; but he had no objection to state that, according to his belief, neither the framers of the act, nor those who supported it, ever intended that the act in question should put an end to all political discussion. He would be ashamed to give any answer to the noble earl's insinuation, that he (Lord Sidmouth) had interfered in this business. He was too little acquainted with the case to give any opinion upon it even in a private room, far less to give any opinion upon it in their lordships' House. He did not know who the magistrates were, except by name. But the true question was, what was the meaning of the act? Their lordships might examine that act and every clause of it; and see whether there was any clause which could by possibility bear such a construction as that which, according to the noble earl's statement, had been put upon it. When the petition should be presented, their lordships would then have an opportunity of discussing that subject.

Earl of Darnley.—It was not in consequence of any suggestion from him that the petition was to be presented: the parties had resolved upon it before.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 28.

DEMISE OF THE CROWN.] The Bill for the continuance of offices, notwithstanding the Demise of the Crown, was read a second time.

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR LAW.] Sir S. Romilly said, he held in his hand a petition signed by 80 persons in the county of Gloucester, complaining of the difficulties, delay, and expense, experienced in the recovery of small debts, and praying for legislative relief. This was a very important subject, and the grievances under which creditors generally laboured in this respect called loudly for a remedy. He had in his possession a letter addressed by a London attorney to the prisoners for debt in a gaol in Gloucestershire, instructing them in various practices of chicanery and delay, in the use of sham pleas, and in suing out writs of error before the signing of final judgment. The latter proceeding, it was added, would cost the debtor four guineas, and the creditor 2*l.* 1*9s.*; but if the writ were made returnable in Parliament, the expense to the former would be but one guinea more, whilst it would cost the creditor 3*1l.* He wished not, in his situation, to reprobate the practice of the common law courts; for it was the duty of Government, as the general guardian of the subject's rights, and of the interests of justice, to adopt proceedings which should put an end to so manifest an evil. If he might be allowed to suggest any additional regulation, it would be, that no writ of error should be allowed without the certificate of two barristers.

Mr. Lyttelton made a few observations to a similar effect, when the petition was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Palmerston presented a petition from the University of Cambridge, against the bill for allowing leases of tithes.—Ordered to lie on the table.

CATHOLIC PETITIONS.] Sir J. Newport presented a petition from the Roman Catholics of Waterford, praying for relief from their present incapacity to hold certain civil and military offices.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Sir H. Parnell said, he held in his hand a petition from the great body of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, soliciting the attention of the House to the laws which imposed certain restraints upon them. The petitioners considering that the domestic nomination of their bishops was the principal security required, would willingly assent to some arrangement for that purpose; and in this disposition their prelates concurred. The hon. baronet conceived that this was a conciliatory proposal, couched in proper and respectful language. The outline of the plan consisted in this—that whereas the Pope had at present the ultimate appointment of bishops, by possessing the power of refusing to adopt the postulation of the electors, a power which in fact he never exercised; it was undertaken to procure a concordat from the Pope, agreeing that none but native-born subjects should ever be raised to the prelacy, and that the election should be exclusively in the hands of the native clergy. They further offered to bind themselves by an oath to attempt nothing against the safety of the State, or the present settlement of property. These provisions seemed to him to guard effectually against the only serious danger that could be apprehended, and he hoped would make a favourable impression on the consideration of the House, previous to the approaching decision which they would be called upon to pronounce. With regard to the veto, it was his duty to explain their views, and he was enabled to do it in a single sentence. Their objections remained, and were insuperable, because they arose from a firm persuasion that a Protestant nomination of Catholic bishops must inevitably end in the extirpation of the Catholic religion. This was their conscientious belief, and as such, was entitled to respect. He would say farther, that if this general outline should be thought capable of improvement, by additional regulations and provisions, they would be met in the same spirit of conciliatory adjustment by the petitioners. The hon. member then moved that the petition be brought up.

General Mathew expressed his happiness at the fair prospect which now presented itself of the final settlement of this question. The Catholic bishops, clergy, and people at large, were sincerely desirous of laying every information on this subject before the Legislature. Dr. Murray, titular archbishop of Dublin, and Dr. Everett, titular archbishop of Cashel, were perfectly prepared to furnish the most satisfactory explanations to both Houses of Parliament. He (General M.) had never heard any rational men declare, that Catholic emancipation should not be granted if proper securities were given; and he was authorized and empowered by these very bishops, who were now in this country, to say, that they were quite prepared to give every proper and reasonable security. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Webber observed, that he had lived in habits of intimacy with several most respectable Roman Catholics, and could bear testimony to the great merits of a very large proportion of the persons professing that faith. His objection to granting the Catholic claims could not, therefore, be supposed to arise from any considerations of private character; it emanated entirely from a view of the system itself. It was his firm belief, that the success of this measure could lead to nothing else than the entire subversion of the Protestant establishment in this country.

Mr. Blake was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman say, that the House, by granting the prayer of this petition, would subvert the Constitution. He begged to tell the hon. gentleman, that the journals of the House recorded, that the emancipation ought to be granted; but that they should deliberate on the nature of the securities to be given. The only question, therefore, now was, whether domestic nomination be sufficient. He did not rise to defend those persons who might be said to have agitated the kingdom of Ireland unnecessarily on this subject; but he trusted such measures would be speedily adopted as might prevent the eternal agitation of this question.

The petition was then brought up and read. On the question that it do lie on the table,

Sir J. Nichol rose, and desired to protest against the assertion of the hon. gentleman who had last spoken, that the question was now reduced to the mere nature of the securities to be given. Whenever the proper time arrived, he should enter into the subject without any feelings of religious antipathy; but he must now observe, that since the last discussion of this matter, the circumstances which had occurred in the United Kingdom, and in Europe, were not such as to place this question on a more favourable footing.

It was then ordered that the petition should lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. W. Smith presented a petition from the Roman Catholics of Warwickshire and Staffordshire, praying for relief from disabilities.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir R. Fergusson presented a petition from Dumferline and its vicinity, praying for Retrenchment and Reform. It stated, among other matters, that the Spencean doctrines were wholly unknown in that town; and particularly mentioned the state of the representation in Scotland, which the petitioners considered no representation at all.

DEBATING SOCIETIES.] Mr. Wilberforce presented a petition from a certain society, called the Academical Society, instituted for the purpose of literary, political, and philosophical discussion, and the promotion of general knowledge. He believed the members of this institution, and the whole conduct of the society, to be highly respectable; and yet they had been refused a licence (hear, hear, hear) by a gentleman who had shewn a total ignorance of the nature and objects of the bill that had lately passed the House for the prevention of seditious assemblies; they therefore prayed relief from the House.—The petition was then read. It stated the society to have originated at Oxford in the year 1793, and to have been established in London in the year 1798, for the purposes of literary, historical, and political disquisition; restricted, however, by the exclusion of controversial theology, and the discussion of any living character. The members were only such as had been at one of the Universities in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the college of Maynooth. At the passing of the former act against seditious assemblies, a licence had been granted them, and continued from time to time: but on the passing of the act in the present session, a licence had been applied for at the Justice-hall in the Old Bailey, on Tuesday, the 15th of April, and refused on Friday the 18th, by two of four magistrates present, because, as one of them said, it was the object of the act to prevent all political discussion whatever. The petitioners regretted that they were thus driven to intrude themselves on the notice of the House, but prayed that relief might be afforded them.

Mr Grant spoke to the general respectability and orderly conduct of the Academical Society.

Sir M. W. Ridley hoped, that some hon. gentleman on the other side would say that the intention of the law had been mistaken; if no such answer was made, he should give notice of a motion for leave to bring in a bill to amend the former act.

Mr B. Bathurst professed himself ignorant of the motives of the magistrates on the present occasion. On the allegation of the petitioners, it appeared that the magistrates had refused the licence, because they thought it was the intention of the Legislature to prohibit all political discussion—he must entirely disclaim any such intention on the part of the Legislature.

Lord Milton was as ignorant as the right hon. gentleman of the motives of the magistrates in the present instance; but he hoped, that some mode might be found of keeping the act operative as to its good purposes, and entirely suppressing the possibility of such abuses as the present.

Mr Brougham thought that the conduct of the magistrates could not be inquired into: the House having passed the law, and having vested great discretionary powers in the magistrates, could not, with consistency, reprimand the exercise of that discretion. But the present occurrence might lead them to consider how cautious they ought to be in passing such a law, and vesting such a power in magistrates at large. There might indeed be no danger in vesting these powers in the right hon. gentleman opposite, or the hon. member for Yorkshire; after the manly avowal they had made, all alarm must be removed, as to any intentions or wishes of theirs; but here, on the first alarm, on the report that some man had discovered that there did exist somewhere some society with an uncouth name, the House had passed a law, vesting these powers, not in such men as the right hon. gentleman, or the hon. member for Yorkshire, but in such men as Aldermen Domville and Joshua Jonathan Smith, (he mentioned them to their honour,) and he hoped, that when such men had thus decided in the manner they might think most agreeable to certain powers above them, it would be a warning to the House to pause before they granted such powers on any future occasion. The petition before the House was most moderate in its language, and very respectably signed, but it did not state the blunder of these magistrates in terms half strong enough; they had not only gone out of their way to prevent all political discussion, but had entered into seminaries instituted purely for the purposes of education and diffusion of knowledge. Nor had they alone done this: a seminary of a similar description had been put down, as it was called, by the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge: on what grounds he knew not; but he knew that this act afforded the pretext.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

DISTRESS, AND WANT OF EMPLOYMENT.]

Mr Brougham said, it had often been his painful duty to lay before the House the complaints of large portions of his Majesty's subjects, but he never performed this duty with feelings so distressing as at that moment, both because the evil was so much more extensive in its pressure than at any former period it had been, and because the prospect of relief compared with the urgency of the case, was faint and unsatisfactory. The petition which he had to present, was signed by nearly the whole of the labouring population of the great town of Birmingham. To prepare this petition, no public meeting had been held, not even any public notice had been given that the petition lay for signatures, but three copies having been laid in different parts of the town, and the fact having become known, in less than forty-eight hours, 11,000 names were affixed. At each of the places where the petition was placed, several persons of respectability attended to prevent any person from signing more than one name, and to exclude all those who were under 21. In a few days more the signatures amounted to 12,500, and to prevent a concourse of people from the neighbouring villages, it was deemed expedient not to suffer the petition to remain longer, lest tumults might be occasioned by the multitudes which would flock together. It was, therefore, from the town of Birmingham alone that the signatures were collected, which might be calculated to represent a population of fifty or sixty thousand souls, probably the whole of the poor population of that town. This petition proceeded on no theories whatever, it urged no arguments or views connected, however remotely, with party questions. It was a statement, in humble but earnest and impressive language, of the degree of misery, approaching nearly to despair, to which that once flourishing town was now reduced. Before he moved that the petition be read, he should state, that the misery which was felt was far from decreasing. There had, a short time ago, been a temporary influx of orders; but that was found to be temporary, and the distress was greater than ever. The statement which he had made on the 13th of March, he had found had been too much corroborated by the accounts from Birmingham. It was then clearly shewn that the misery, far from diminishing, was on the increase. The average assessment of the poor's rates during the last twelve months was nine shillings and four pence in the pound—the average of the last six months was at the rate of twelve shillings—of the last three months thirteen shillings—of the last week 14s. 4d.; and this average fell short of the sum actually expended in the same proportion as 14s. 4d. fell short of 17s. 8d. The expenditure had, for several weeks, been 4 or 500% above the sum actually raised by the rates, and 100% per week above the expenditure of any former period of distress, however great. These facts would be sufficient to awaken the attention of the House; but he should not deal fairly with the House or the petitioners, if he did not state his opinion that the distress was to a great degree beyond the power of the House to relieve. It was mere vanity, not to speak disrespectfully of the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for any one to expect, that a loan of a million, or a million and a half, could produce any sufficient relief. This was manifest by the fact, that to relieve the persons who had signed the petition in his hand, near half a million yearly would be required on a moderate calculation. How was it to be expected then that the sum would spread over not only the inhabitants of Birmingham and a population three times as great in its vicinity, but those districts which, though they suffered less, still suffered dreadfully? Greatly though he lamented the necessity and their want of power to relieve it, it was proper to state that no one immediate step could afford any tolerable prospect of permanent amelioration, except that general change of policy (harar) which was the only sort of relief which statesmen should consider, though not so immediate as that of which a vain and delusive semblance was now held forth. What relief that change of policy did afford, might be safely granted by Parliament, and beneficially received by the country—it would be deeply rooted and stable in its effects on the people at large, and even at this time, with a view to immediate relief, would not be altogether ineffectual.

The petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

RELIEF OF THE LABOURING POOR.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the whole House resolved itself into a Committee, to consider the propriety of a grant of Exchequer Bills, for the relief of the labouring classes of society.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose and said, that before he proceeded to explain the purpose of the proposition which he had to submit to the Committee, he should read the two Resolutions in which that proposition was comprised. The first Resolution was—

“That his Majesty be enabled to issue Exchequer Bills not exceeding 1,500,000*l.* to be distributed in Loans, by Commissioners appointed by Parliament, for the Employment of the Poor of Great Britain in Public Works, and the Relief of Manufactures, on condition of security for repayment.”

In the next Resolution, which related to Ireland, there was a difference as to form, both because there existed no parochial funds in that country, and on account of another circumstance which he should afterwards explain. This Resolution was—

“That the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland be empowered to advance out of the Consolidated Fund of that Kingdom, a sum not exceeding 250,000*l.* for the completion of Public Works, or the encouragement of Fisheries in Ireland, under condition of repayment in a time to be limited.”

On every former occasion when grants had been proposed to Parliament for any local purpose, a special Committee had been previously appointed, for the purpose of ascertaining the distress, and submitting to the House a specific plan for its relief. In the present case that course of proceeding was unnecessary, both from the notoriety of the general distress and the information from committees, by whom, in various shapes, accounts of that distress had been received. As to the sums which it was proposed to apply to public works, the grounds on which the grants would be recommended would differ from those on which Parliament had formerly been applied to for assistance in similar cases. The course in former instances had been to point out the benefits to the country in its commercial relations from the completion of the work, in favour of which an application was made. But the commissioners, who had the disposal of the money, would particularly consider the influence the prosecution of any public work would have on the employment of the present unemployed population. Their decision would be directed by the compound consideration of the utility of the work, and of the relief which would be afforded by the persons employed in it. There were a great variety of public works which had already received the sanction of Parliament, which languished on account of a deficiency of funds necessary to prosecute them. Of many, parts were already finished, which were useless until the whole was completed. Many urgent applications had been made to the Government in behalf of these works, to which it had been intended the attention of Parliament should have been called in a direct manner; but it was now considered that it would be more beneficial if the money was placed at the disposal of Commissioners quite unconnected with Government, and who would be named in the body of the bill. These Commissioners, he should propose, should be empowered to advance sums, by way of loan, to corporations and other bodies, for the purpose of making harbours or canals, or to trustees of roads, or to any persons engaged in public works now in progress, or about to undertake them. These advances were not to be confined to those undertakings which the Parliament had sanctioned; for instance, the laudable association for the encouragement of fisheries would be a very proper institution to receive aid. Works could thus be brought to completion without ultimate expense to the public, if, as he trusted it would prove, and as had happened on former occasions, the interest on the money advanced had defrayed the expense of the commission, and the other charges attending the loan. The transaction would in that case be not less advantageous to the public at large, than to the individuals immediately concerned. In Ireland it would not be practicable to nominate a similar commission, without such a delay as would defeat the purpose of the grant, which was urgent in its nature. It would be necessary to enter into a correspondence with that country, to know what gentleman would undertake a duty which would entail some trouble without any prospect of reward. To avoid that delay, the sum appropriated to that country would be placed at the disposal of the Lord Lieutenant, to be applied to the purposes he had mentioned. Having detailed that part of the plan which referred to the completion of public works, he felt much greater difficulty in entering on the subject of advances on the security of the Poor's Rates. He had never thought that any thing could be done towards the relief of the agricultural population, by the advance of any such sum as he then proposed to advance. The agricultural interest was to such an extent identified with the State, that he could not conceive any circumstance by which it could be so far separated from its prosperity or difficulties as to receive relief from any sum which Parliament could wisely advance to it. He was afraid also that loans to the agricultural districts, in aid of the Poor's Rates, would encourage the practice of curtailing the fair wages of labour, and of supplying the deficiency by assistance from the Poor's Rates. They might also be tempted to throw on the Poor's Rates of the present year those for whom they might otherwise find employment. On those accounts the relief of the agricultural distress did not form a part of the measure. When the Bill was before the House there would be found clauses which would guard against such an idea. The advance to be granted to parishes was never to exceed the half of the rate of the last year, and no advance was to be made to any parish except in cases in which the rate was double the average of the two preceding years. Though the measure did not embrace the relief of the agricultural districts, it was hoped to afford a temporary relief to that species of distress which had that night been brought under the notice of the House, and it was to communications from the place from which the petition that night had been presented (Birmingham) that the present measure was in part to be attributed. Undoubtedly that distress was lamentable, but he thought there were reasonable hopes of a speedier relief than the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham) seemed to anticipate.—By this grant, indeed, he was induced to calculate, that such an important impulse would be given to the industry of Birmingham, as probably would afford the means of permanent relief to that town, which had suffered so particularly in consequence of the transition from war to peace; that that transition had materially affected Birmingham, would be obvious from this fact, that during the war no less than three millions of small arms had been manufactured there for the use of the Allies, independently of those provided for our own supply; and of course the cessation of such a demand, in consequence of the restoration of peace, must produce a most material result. But it was in this respect only that the trade of Birmingham had suffered, for it appeared that the official returns of the Exports of Steel and Iron in the last three years were as follows:—

1816	-	-	-	1,074,000lbs.

Being in the last year nearly the same as in 1814. The Hardware and Cutlery, which formed a distinct article, were as follows:—

1816	-	-	-	790,000lbs.

Here it would be seen, the amount of exports under this head, had only fallen ten per cent. in the last year below what it was in 1815, while it fully doubled that of the exports of the preceding year. The money value of the steel and iron exports was as follows:—

In 1814	-	-	-	1,145,000 l .
1815	-	-	-	1,380,000 l .
1816	-	-	-	1,095,000 l .

The right hon. gentleman concluded from the whole that the manufactures of Birmingham had not fallen off, except in articles for the purposes of war, and, therefore, he was led to believe that the distress which afflicted that town was merely in consequence of the cessation of the demands of Government, while, with respect to foreign trade, that town had suffered no material diminution.—In this conclusion, indeed, he was confirmed by the information of those who were best acquainted with the trade of the country, and most competent to judge upon the subject. From such sources, he learned that the loan of 30 or 40,000*l.* to the manufacturers of Birmingham would be of material service under existing circumstances.—For the distress of Birmingham, as well as for that which affected other parts of the country, he felt the most lively interest, and therefore he rejoiced in the exercise of private benevolence to alleviate that distress. But he was always aware that private benevolence could not suffice to afford permanent relief. Yet while it was in activity, he was impressed with the conviction that it would not become Government to interfere. But the fact was, that the resources created by that benevolence were nearly, if not altogether, exhausted, and therefore it became the duty of Government to contribute its aid for the relief of the industrious poor, not only by every practicable economy in the public expenditure, but by an actual loan to those who had an opportunity of giving employment to industry. He felt indeed so strongly the peculiar situation of Birmingham, as described in the petition presented by a learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham), and so fairly animadverted upon by that learned gentleman, that he should have conceived himself bound to submit a distinct proposition with regard to that town, but upon consideration it was deemed more just and expedient to extend the means of relief to other places, which were also suffering by the pressure of the times.—That due provision would be made by the Commissioners to be appointed to guard against the misapplication of these means there was every reason to conclude, and as to the details of the plan to be pursued for this desirable purpose, he thought it better to leave those to be arranged by the wisdom of the House, while he should be ready to afford every explanation in his power with respect to the views of his Majesty's Ministers. What views might be entertained by other gentlemen, or what objection might be urged against the plan which he had submitted, he could not presume to anticipate; but that plan was liable to revision, and it would, he trusted, be put in the most perfect, practicable shape, by the consideration and judgment of the House. His proposition at present was, that the Resolutions which he held in his hand should be adopted, and, when printed, submitted to further consideration on Friday next, or on any other day which might appear most convenient to the House. But he begged leave to observe, that dispatch was of the utmost importance in a question of this nature, and that no delay in the arrangements proposed should be allowed that could possibly be avoided. The right hon. gentleman concluded with proposing the first Resolution, That his Majesty be enabled to issue Exchequer Bills, not exceeding 1,500,000*l.* to be distributed in loans by Commissioners appointed by Parliament, for the employment of the Poor of Great Britain in Public Works, and for the relief of Manufactures, on condition that due security be taken for the repayment of these loans.

Mr. Ponsonby rose, not to make any captious objection to the right hon. gentleman's plan, which he did not yet correctly understand, but to observe that the right hon. gentleman had not stated the mode in which the repayment of the proposed loans was to be secured; this was certainly an omission which it was desirable to supply. The omission was, perhaps, casual, but it was one of such importance, that he hoped the right hon. gentleman would favour the House with some explanation as to the manner in which, and the time when, it was proposed that these advances should be repaid.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, in reply, that it was his intention to leave the details as to the execution of his plan to be considered and adjusted by the House. He had, however, no objection to present an outline of his views with respect to the repayment alluded to by the right hon. gentleman. In the first place, he proposed that the Exchequer bills to be issued should be payable in three years, that is, in 1820; and that security should be taken for the repayment of the several advances by instalments, so that the whole should be repaid to the commissioners by the time when the Exchequer bills became payable by the State. But that, in case it should be expedient for the completion of public works to allow a further time, the commissioners should be empowered to extend it for six or seven years from the period of making the loan. It was also proposed that the several loans should bear an interest of five per cent. while the Exchequer bills should be issued at their present rate of 34 per cent. and the difference would of course be for the advantage of the public. The securities to be taken for the proposed advances would be naturally had from those persons who were interested in the manufactures or public works, to which those advances would be made, probably from the proprietors, and would be for the commissioners to look to the adequacy of those securities. None would, of course, offer security for the loans, who were not fully convinced of the utility of the public works or manufactures, for whose benefit those loans were to be made, and of the competency of such establishments to provide an adequate indemnity, or of their inadequacy if left in an imperfect state.

Mr. Blake said, it was with much diffidence he obtruded himself again upon the attention of the House, but as it was upon a question of so much importance as the present, it might be possible for the most humble individual to suggest something which might turn out to be useful. He trusted the House and the right hon. gentleman would excuse him upon the present occasion. The principle of the proposed plan he took to be an advance of money for the relief of the labouring classes, usually employed in agriculture only. [Here the Chancellor of the Exchequer corrected Mr. Blake's mistake, and stated, that the relief proposed was not intended exclusively for the agriculturist.] Mr. Blake said, he regretted to find he was in a mistake. He regretted doubly his having been so, because he thought the landed interest ought now, especially that it is comparatively so depressed, to meet a larger share of the attention of the House than the commercial interest. It was plain the plan was not to operate as a substitute for the poor laws further than as its effect would be to diminish the number of persons who would otherwise be obliged to resort to their aid. He submitted, that on the proper application of the funds, which it was proposed to raise, depended the success of the plan; for if a beginning should be made by giving direct assistance to those who usually laboured in the arts and manufactures—they would be enabled, it was true, to continue their usual avocations, but in the end Parliament would increase their stock on hand, and thereby remove their prospect of a market. (Hear, hear, hear.) The only effectual relief, he said, which could be found for the manufacturer was a market. If a market were found for the manufacturer, you at once supply him with money, and a market will always ensure a supply more than equal to the demand. (Hear, hear.) He was sorry to hear that it was intended to expend so much money in public works; this would depress further the price of land. Land was the grand source of our commercial prosperity—it was the source of our revenue. Public works were generally understood to mean works of ornament rather than of productive utility, and the money expended on them should be repaid by a taxation on land; but if the money should be expended in the enclosure and cultivation of waste lands, and in the extending and improvement of the inland navigation of the country, the very produce of this expenditure would not only repay the sum borrowed, but it would also leave a considerable surplus to the owners of the soil, and at the same time create a circulation of money, which would open a market for the manufacturer, and thus would relieve every class of the population. But if this effect was to be looked for in England, how much greater and more beneficial must it be in Ireland! In England, improvement might be said to have arrived almost at perfection, but in Ireland nature had done more than in England, yet there she was totally unassisted by art—(hear,)—nay, in some instances, artificial canals were made, upon a plan of magnificence which would lead one to suppose that it was intended to subdue rather than assist the natural advantages of the country. The Irish, ardent to imitate England, did so upon a plan of magnificence utterly inconsistent with the hope of remuneration by trade, and thence the derangement of their canal speculations—but if, instead of imitating the English, whose country is suited to such undertakings, the Irish did only connect their numerous navigable lakes with each other, and with the sea, the experiment would produce, in a very short time, a noble accession of wealth to themselves, and increased strength and prosperity to the general interests of the empire. It was under this view of the subject he conceived it to be his duty to suggest to the right hon. gentleman, that the funds intended for Ireland would be best applied to works of the description to which he had just adverted.

Mr. Phillips declared his inability to comprehend the nature of the security alluded to by the right hon. gentleman. Did the right hon. gentleman mean to confine the proposed loans to public works actually begun? ["No, no," from the Treasury Bench, "they are to extend to works to be begun."] As these loans were to be granted for the construction of public roads, how, he would ask, were the parochial rates to be relieved by pledging these rates to the persons who should become security for the repayment of these loans? Such a plan would, in his opinion, rather tend to augment the rates, and to aggravate the evil so loudly complained of. Then as to manufactures, it was a delusion to conceive that this plan would afford any relief. For to his knowledge the manufacturing towns did not want capital to give employment to labour, but a market for the sale of their productions. (Hear, hear, hear.) It was, therefore, a mockery to suppose that the proposed advance would be productive of any advantage to the manufacturers of the country, and it was equally delusive to say that the distress of the country was (with the exception of the harvest) only of a temporary nature; for the fact was, that they were broken down by the pressure of taxation.—(Hear.) This was the great evil, that by taxing every article of export rendered us unable to sell our produce or manufacture on reasonable terms, especially to foreigners. Again, as to the system of securities proposed by the right hon. gentleman, it was obvious that the establishment of such a system must interfere most injuriously with the transfer of property. For who could calculate that under such a system any property purchased might not most unexpectedly be swept away by an Exchequer extent, or an extent in aid?—(Hear, hear.) The whole system of the right hon. gentleman was indeed pregnant with difficulty and delusion, while the only effectual way of relieving the distress of the country was to reduce our public establishments, and to introduce a rigid economy into every branch of the public expenditure, to which he feared neither the right hon. gentleman nor his colleagues were in any degree disposed.

Mr. Grenfell expressed a wish to know in what way it was intended to advance the proposed loans, whether in specie or in bank-note—whether the Exchequer bills were to be put into the hands of the Bank, there to remain with interest accumulating upon them for three years, or lent at once to the parties from whom they required securities to be taken? He also desired to know whether it was intended to issue Exchequer bills of 100*l.* or 50*l.* each, and so to render them a part of the circulating medium of the country?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that the intention was to issue Exchequer bills, as in former cases, at 100*l.* or perhaps at 50*l.* each, to the parties giving the required securities, and thus from the regulation of interest, they might be taken at par, and so become a part of the circulating medium of the country. But he should enter further into the details on a future occasion. With respect to the observations of an hon. member (Mr. Phillips,) he had no hesitation in stating, that he was completely of opinion, the distress of the country was only temporary. Indeed, if such was not his opinion, he must regard not only the present, but any plan that human wisdom could devise, as a mere delusion, and insufficient to remove the evils complained of. But the object and calculation of the project which he had submitted was to relieve the distress of an unfavourable season, which he hoped very unlikely now to occur; and in so doing, it was proposed to follow the examples of 1793 and 1811, neither of which had been found productive of inconvenience.

To a question from Lord A. Hamilton, the Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that personal security would be required for parishes, where, as in Scotland, there were no Poors' Rates.

The Hon. Mr. Lamb expressed a hope that it should go forth to the country, that the object of the right hon. gentleman's plan was not to afford what was called relief, but to provide employment for the poor. He was most anxious that this should be distinctly understood, and that no delusion should prevail, lest an idea should arise that it was meant to give away the public money, for the purpose of encouraging idleness or prodigality. As to the security to be taken, he trusted that adequate provision would be made to guard against the evil of allowing the occupier of land to mortgage that land, without the consent of the proprietors, for otherwise great confusion must ensue, and the landlords would ultimately suffer considerable injustice, especially where any material rise at present existed in the Poors' Rates.

Lord Cochrane disapproved of the plan under consideration, unless inasmuch as it might be considered as the repayment of some part of the money which had been unjustly taken from the people. In any other view, it appeared to his mind to be a complete delusion, for the great evil consisting in the burden of taxation, no effectual relief could be afforded, but by the reduction of that burden. This was the evil which bore down our manufactures, and which destroyed our trade. For it was nonsense to say, that the prohibitory decrees of foreign Governments could prevent the sale of our commodities, if the manufacturers could afford to sell them at a reasonable rate. It was notorious, that all the navy of England could not guard against smuggling into this country, and it was a mockery to pretend that any foreign Government could prevent the introduction of our manufactures, if foreigners were not able to undersell us, through the weight of taxation to which these manufactures were subjected. That was indeed the great obstacle to our commerce, which the superiority of our machinery and the industry of our artists were totally insufficient to overcome. The funds and the taxes were then the principal enemies of our trade, and while they existed in their present state, it was idle to pretend that trade could be restored, or that the country could be relieved by a plan like that of the right hon. gentleman, which proposed to advance a sum which was not, in fact, equal to the amount of the Poors' Rates for three months. For our Poors' Rates were known at present to exceed 12 millions per annum. The noble lord here endeavoured to shew that if a sponge were at once applied to the public debt, no injury whatever would arise to the nation, and that common justice demonstrated the necessity of reducing the interest of that debt, in order that the fundholders should bear their due share of the public burdens, from the pressure of which they were at present exempted, through the enhancement of that circulating medium which was so materially depreciated when they lent their money.

Mr. Pensonby conceived, that any benefit that could be derived from the plan under discussion, could be derived only by bringing it quickly into effect. He would therefore anxiously avoid throwing any obstacle in its way. The plan would undoubtedly be useful; it would be of use to interpose in any shape for the relief of the present distress; it was gratifying to every humane feeling to alleviate, even in the smallest degree, the suffering that prevailed throughout the country. Any objections he might have to the measure he would postpone till the bill was brought in. At present let the resolutions be passed, or a report be made of the progress of the Committee, and let the bill be brought in as soon as possible. When the details of the measure were thus laid before them, he would enter freely into the discussion; he would use every possible means of preparing himself to consider it in all its aspects; and he would most willingly offer every assistance in his power to render it as useful as possible. At the same time he would not be bound by having given his assent to the Resolutions, or to the Report, from making such objections, or offering such alterations, as he might think necessary or proper.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed the highest satisfaction at the candid and liberal view the right hon. gentleman had taken of the subject. Nothing was more improper than to enter into the details of the measure in the present stage. He therefore reserved several explanations he had to give till the proper opportunity for offering them. As to the remarks made by a noble lord (Lord Cochrane), he thought them altogether unworthy of examination or reply.

Mr. Ponsonby, in consequence of the last observation that fell from the right hon. gentleman, rose to say, that to oppose the measure was, in his opinion, inexcusable. Objections might be stated to several parts of it, and he would in due time offer some objections; but he thought it very wrong to oppose the measure itself.

Lord Milton would fain have the measure proposed to be precisely understood. Its first and immediate object was to furnish employment; its ultimate object was to afford relief.—Now he had some doubts whether such a measure was at all practicable. In the first place, it was not want of employment that caused the distress, but want of markets, and want of funds for contributing to the Poor Rates; and from this last circumstance arose the principal objection he had to mention. It was proposed, that when the Rates rose to a certain ratio, money should be lent by the Government upon the security of those very Rates, that is, when the Rates became bankrupt, money should be lent, for which those same bankrupt Rates should be the security. He would beg leave to suggest the dividing of the resolution into two resolutions: one regarding employment where that was possible, the other, security upon the Poor Rates. To the most material parts of the plan he meant to make no opposition.

Sir B. Brydges said, he should rejoice if the assistance given by Government could be greater than was proposed. It was the only mode of relieving the people, for labour was the foundation of wealth; without labour the people could not be happy, or the State prosperous.

Sir J. Newport adverted to the influence of the apprehension of becoming liable to a Crown process. If extents of the Crown were so formidable to persons who became debtors of the Crown for objects of their own, was it likely that many would be found willing to incur such a liability for purposes of a merely charitable nature? He was afraid that consideration would prove greatly detrimental to the operation of the measure, unless some means were adopted to guard against it. With regard to public works, such as canals for instance, he believed that any loan advanced by the Crown would be reluctantly received, for it might operate to the injury of the private creditor of such works, and to the injury of his security, in case of the Crown coming in as a creditor, upon the ultimate failure of the design. He owned, he did not see at present how the proposed plan could have any advantageous operation; at the same time he was far from feeling any disposition to oppose a scheme for relieving the distresses of the country, if it had but the slightest probability of being feasible.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that it would be a provision in the bill, that the Crown should not have priority over any other creditor, except with the consent of the creditors themselves.

Mr. Babington felt much difficulty to understand how the money was to be applied. Were manufactures to be encouraged by it in the country? If so, the consequences would be most injurious; no other manufactures could come into competition with those supported by such means, and consequently they would cease; so much capital would be thrown out of circulation, so many hands would be deprived of employment. He had occasion, in his part of the country, to see instances of this evil. Where bounty was bestowed, five times as many were deprived of work as were employed through such forced means; wages, too, were increased in consequence of such application. The evils altogether arising from creating manufactures by means of a bounty from Government appeared to him insuperable. To roads he saw no such objection; he believed that to be a highly proper mode of giving employment.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he must abstain at present from entering into the details of the various modes in which the money was to be employed; he would postpone that to a future and more suitable opportunity. Work in any shape was the object in view; any species of work that might not prove injurious was the thing proposed. He agreed entirely with the hon. gentleman as to manufactures. It was not by any means manufactures in such circumstances that were to be attempted. Any public work that would give employment to the idle, and not injure any other interest, would be encouraged.

Mr. Lyttelton was anxious to prevent unfounded expectations from this measure. It assumed two points that were not warranted by the state of the country. It assumed a want of capital; and this assumption was unwarranted, for the great complaint was want of employment for capital. It assumed, that if capital be wanting loans can supply its place. This too was false; for what produce are we to derive from these loans? They are to be employed in public works; what works are these? Unless they be immediately productive, they are of no benefit in the view now under consideration. Roads, canals, bridges, are to be made. If those who now carry on these works are unable of themselves to go on with them, or to carry them to a greater extent, any others must become losers by attempting them. What use or benefit can be proposed by forcing forward such works beyond the demands and interests of the country? The fisheries he waived for the present; he believed some encouragement might be given to them with advantage. It was proposed to give relief to the distressed parishes. When the rates came to a certain ratio; when they became very nearly bankrupt, then some relief was offered; but these bankrupts must find security. It would have been generous to afford them some eleemosynary aid when they came to this ruined state; but still they must give security. He would wish to be informed what was meant by personal security. If there be any real property it must be in the first instance attached; the Exchequer will lay hold of that, and then the person is seized and thrown into gaol. The whole plan was perfectly illusory. The only means of relief must be found in protecting agriculture, in restoring activity of our various manufactures, and in improving our commerce. These things the Exchequer can never create; it is by other means they can be re-established.

Mr. C. Grant, Jun.—The great object is to afford relief, to give succour to the starving. It is better to do so by labour than by mere bounty. Industry, moral habits, and contentment, are thus promoted. The objections to manufactures set up by money from the Government are equally applicable to agriculture. They are applicable to any productive employment. When the excess of capital has produced stagnation, and stagnation excess of capital, any forced stimulus must be injurious; but by employing the poor on roads, bridges, and canals, they are immediately relieved, and their labour is hereafter useful.

Sir M. W. Ridley inquired, whether in lending money to parishes, personal security would be required, in addition to the security of the poor rates' fund; and whether the commissioners to be appointed were to act gratuitously?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that personal security would certainly be demanded. With respect to the commissioners, he hoped that as, on former occasions, persons of respectability had been found willing to lend their services gratuitously for the benefit of the poor, there would not be less liberality manifested on the present.

Mr. Brougham said, he agreed with what had fallen from his hon. friend below him (Mr. Ponsonby), and that it would be most painful to his feelings if he should find himself compelled to interpose any obstacles in the way of the present measure. It would be arrogance in him, however, imperfectly as he yet understood its nature, to argue upon its general character; and he could only express a hope that it might be found practicable, and calculated to overcome many of the objections to which it at first appeared liable. At the same time he wished to take that opportunity of expressing one or two doubts that prevailed in his own mind. In the first place, as to the manner in which the money was to be employed. It was evident, that it would be chiefly, if not entirely, applied to the promotion of public works. As to the idea of parish officers becoming manufacturers, it was so preposterous, that its absurdity hardly required to be illustrated. It was impossible they should be able to carry on any branch of manufacture, either with benefit to the community or comfort to themselves. The idea was equally absurd, also, as applicable to agricultural pursuits. Public works, therefore, of some kind or other, would be the objects to which the money must be applied. But then a difficulty immediately occurred. What now kept public works from going on? Was it the want of capital solely? He was afraid not.—He was afraid it was the want of a demand for public works, and that canals, bridges, and roads, were not now wanted, for the same reasons that other productions of labour were not wanted. If they were found no longer to answer the views of private adventurers, it was not likely they would ever tempt persons to become debtors of the Crown for the sake of carrying them on. If, on the other hand, they were desirable speculations, would not the money that was necessary be borrowed in the usual way? For it would have this advantage, that no Exchequer process could be issued against the borrower, and it appeared that the usual Crown process was to be employed in recovery of whatever sums might be lent. With respect to canals, he believed there was nothing which had been more overdone in this country than that description of improvement. Besides, the assistance in that way must necessarily be very limited, for he understood it was not unusual to expend half a million of money in the completion of a single canal. Then, as to roads and bridges, he believed there was no slowness even in the present distressed state of the country, in making roads where they were wanted. The advantage was so evident, and the benefit so immediate, that capital to undertake them was seldom deficient. Perhaps application might be made for assistance to finish a bridge or two, but even there his own hopes were not very sanguine. With regard to parochial relief, he doubted whether any great advantage would be derived from that part of the plan. He would take Birmingham for example, from which place he had that night presented a petition, signed by upwards of 12,000 persons out of employ. He might fairly, however, estimate the male population of that town and its neighbourhood, who were capable of work, at 25,000. According to the proposed plan, by which the relief afforded to a parish was to be in the proportion of one half of what it annually paid in poor rates within a certain period, Birmingham would be entitled to receive only 50,000*l.* having paid for some time past at the rate of 60,000*l.* a year for the relief of its poor. But suppose to that were added 50,000*l.* for a canal, a road, or a bridge.

The whole relief which that sum would afford, at 10 shillings a week for labour, would only be to employ 2000 out of the 25,000 for one year, and upon such wages as were hardly sufficient for the support of life. He entertained considerable doubt as to the probability of finding respectable persons willing to accept any such loans, under the obligation of entering into recognizances, or of being subjected to extents in aid. Let the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) be as rigorous as he pleased in looking out for good securities, but at the same time let the money be advanced to those securities on the same terms as any capitalist in the city of London would afford the loan. Unless that course was adopted, corporations perhaps, with a view to the jobbing of favoured individuals, may accept the terms; but he was confident individuals, or associated bodies of persons, would be extremely slow in committing themselves to obligations so severe in their operation. He was also solicitous to be informed how the distribution of these funds was to be managed. He was not disposed to indulge so harsh an opinion, that any undue influence in the application was intended, but he was confident that every thing depended on satisfying that House and the country that none will or could take place. He trusted, therefore, that such a selection of commissioners was intended, and as the service was to be gratuitous, a selection could be well made of the most respectable and independent characters, such as would give confidence to the expectations of the people. Before it were possible to give effect to the decision of Parliament, that was, probably at the end of three or four months, the exercise of any improper influence, or even the suspicion of it in the distribution of this loan, in the event of a general election, might produce the most injurious and reprehensible effects. Before he sat down he could not help throwing out for the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in place of the intended issue, the propriety of remitting the arrears of the property tax for two or three years, or he would say altogether. Such an alleviation at this moment would be attended with the most effectual assistance to a most suffering class, while the fair dealer met no greater impediment to his claims than what arose from the severity with which those arrears were collected. He had felt it his duty to make these few general observations, reserving to himself the right of entering fully into the discussion of the subject when it was again submitted to the consideration of the House.

Mr. Butterworth recommended that a portion of these funds should be applied to the erection of parochial school-houses.

The first resolution was then put and carried.

On the second resolution, for voting the sum of 250,000*l.* to be applied to the use of the public works and fisheries of Ireland,

Sir F. Flood mentioned, that he could not let the present opportunity slip without making a few observations. He expressed his surprise at the short measure of relief meted out for his native country, considering her merits and sufferings. Ireland had a claim over every other part of the empire. What had her conduct been? She had been patient under suffering, while here they had been meeting in Spitalfields to subvert the laws of the land. (A laugh.) Yet that patient, meritorious island, the right hand of England, was in a state of almost absolute starvation. He had travelled over five counties of it lately, and found the poor had nothing to subsist upon but their half-boiled potatoes and their prayers. (A laugh.) Let the people of Ireland have justice done them. They had contributed more than their share to the victorious war that terminated in a glorious peace; and they did not, like the inhabitants of England, desert their country, and emigrate abroad to spend their money. The number of rich emigrants, who gave to foreigners the bread of their own countrymen, was a serious evil. They were now leaving the country like shoals of herrings. (A laugh.) People of all ranks, nobles and commoners, earls and lords, were removing to distant lands. They ought to be made responsible for the money they draw from home, and the people whom they impoverish. They profess to have the object of amusement for their emigration; but if they want amusement out of their own country, "let them come (said the hon. baronet) among us." (A laugh.) Instead of that they run to Dover, from Dover to Calais, from Calais to Boulogne, and from Boulogne to France. (A laugh.) He wished 20 per cent. was laid on all absentees who emigrated beyond their own country. He would allow none to be abroad for more than two or three months, unless they could produce the certificate of a physician that their health required a change of climate. (A laugh.) He mentioned those things to shew how different the people of Ireland were from the other parts of the empire, and to prove that they deserved a greater measure of liberality on this occasion. "Let the Chancellor of the Exchequer (said the hon. baronet) give us the money without looking at repayment? (a laugh) for we want nothing but capital to be the rival of any nation on the face of the earth."

The resolution was then agreed to. The House resumed, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, April 29.

The Royal assent was given by commission to the Irish Arms and Irish Peace Preservation Bills, and some other public and private bills.

Tuesday, April 29.

SALT DUTIES.] Mr. Lushington moved the second reading of the Salt Duties Excise Bill. He observed, that the object of the bill had been misconceived: it was intended not to oppress but to relieve the fisheries, by giving them the liberty to use rock salt, and thus bring to a certainty those experiments which had been successfully made in several instances. The bill was not founded on the representations of commissioners of excise, but on the evidence of persons interested both in the salt trade and in the fisheries. The trials which had been made led to a sanguine belief that rock salt was perfectly applicable to the purposes of curing and preserving fish. He thought it absurd that the law should be suffered to remain as it was at present, depriving the fisherman, even if he were inclined, of the right to use rock salt in his business. The use of it for this purpose had been already found productive of the greatest benefit in the Isle of Man.

Mr. Galcraft declared, that being perfectly satisfied with the impression which the agitation of this question had produced on both sides of the House, it was not his intention to trouble them with any additional observations during this session. In the next session, however, he hoped to be able, with the assistance of those hon. members who concurred with his sentiments on this subject, to relieve the public from this grievous, unjust, and impolitic tax.—He could not sit down, without disclaiming the intention of recommending any commutation for this tax; and, least of all, that any additional burden should be imposed on the article of beer. (Hear.)

The bill was then read a second time.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Mr. Peel moved, that the estimates for the miscellaneous services of Ireland should be referred to the Committee of Finance.

Mr. Tierney observed, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer having declared that it was not his intention to propose any loan, or issue of Exchequer bills, for the service of this year, it was highly important to know what his system of finance would be.

Mr. D. Gilbert said, that direction had been given to the different offices to furnish all the necessary information to the Committee. It was in the contemplation of the Committee to direct their attention to the income and expenditure of the present and the succeeding year.

Mr. Tierney thought that the House ought to be informed of the actual amount of Exchequer-bills which had been purchased by the Bank.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that while a particular subject was before the Committee, they could not be expected to report generally on all the matters referred to their consideration.

Mr. Tierney desired the House to remember how he was scouted by the opposite side when he recommended the appointment of two committees. (Hear, hear.) It was now obvious, from what the right hon. gentleman had said, that if his proposition had been acceded to, this inconvenient delay would not have arisen; but now he feared that the final Report of the Committee would not be laid before them till the month of June.

THIRD SECRETARY OF STATE.] Mr. Tierney, in rising to call the attention of the House to the office of a third Secretary of State, first begged leave to recal to their recollection the motion which he made on this subject last session, in which, unfortunately, he did not succeed. That motion was, "That a humble address should be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, to represent that his faithful Commons, relying on the disposition expressed in the speech from the throne, to concur in measures of economy, humbly prayed that the division of State-offices, which took place in 1794, by which the business transacted by the Home Department was transferred to a new office, created for the War Department, be revised, and the business of those offices restored to the footing in which they stood in the year 1798." His intention was now, not to renew that motion, but to vary its form. He did not mean to move that the office of third Secretary of State should be abolished, but to move, that a committee should be appointed to consider of that subject. In bringing this question under the consideration of the House, he acted from a thorough conviction, that he had no chance of success but from inquiry. His object in making this motion was, to save to the public the expense of a third Secretary of State: and this he thought might be done consistently with the public service and the good of the country. There was now an additional inducement for him to move for a committee to inquire how far a third Secretary of State was necessary, since the Lords of the Treasury themselves appointed a committee last year for purposes to which this subject particularly related. That committee, by a Treasury minute of the 5th of April, 1816, was required to examine and report what offices had been created since the year 1793; but they confined their inquiry to offices established since the war, considering, no doubt, that former offices were of too sacred a nature to be touched. Now, it was precisely the spirit of that appointment which he meant to adopt. The office of third Secretary of State was created since the commencement of the war; it arose entirely out of the war, and how it escaped the notice of the three persons named on that committee, was to him perfectly unintelligible. In calling upon the House, therefore, to adopt his proposition that night, he merely called upon them to do that which the Treasury had sanctioned: he merely required of them to do that which the commissioners to whom he had alluded, (Mr. Ryder, Lord Binning, and Mr. Sturges Bourne), even upon the shewing of Ministers themselves, ought to have done.—He declared most solemnly, that he would not vote for the abolition of one office from which he would not also exclude his own friends, if they were ever placed in the way of making such appointments: if they considered them necessary, he would not hesitate to assert that they ought not to come into office. (Hear, hear, hear.) It might be said that he himself had no chance of ever becoming first, second, or third Secretary of State; but if he had, he would not fill one of those offices unless he believed them absolutely necessary. But he maintained, that if there were a transfer of business, and a consolidation of offices, the service required might be equally well performed. A great part of his Majesty's Ministers had nothing to do. There was the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (an ancient office indeed), but he had nothing to do: there was the Lord Privy Seal, he had nothing to do. It might be proper to retain some of these ancient officers, but still those only ought to be retained who had some employment; and at all events the performance of labour should be the only claim for salary. (Hear, hear.) But if there must be a Secretary for the Colonies, why should not that Secretary be the President of the Board of Control; or why not the individual who now filled the office of under secretary? He was aware that the reason urged last year against appointing the President of the Board of Control to this duty was, that not being a King's Secretary, he could not take the King's pleasure. He (Mr. T.) doubted whether the thing were so; but at all events this was no more than a gross pretence, and there was in reality no more necessity for a third Secretary of State than for a third archbishop. (A laugh.) Though he was certain that the noble Lord (Bathurst) in the department of third Secretary of State could not impute any motives of personal hostility to him; yet he felt it exceedingly unpleasant to be thus attacking a particular office year after year, and to offer to throw such a load on Lord Sidmouth as might perhaps kill him. (A laugh.) He did hope therefore that Ministers would for once come forward themselves, and spare an individual so disagreeable a duty. Unless they did this, all temporary expedients were but vain: they might suspend the Habeas Corpus, but they could not suspend the spirit of inquiry and discussion that now pervaded every class of the community: they could not by any other means lessen the burdens or alleviate the distress of the country. They might have recourse to coercive measures; they might, for a season, silence the loud expression of public opinion; but by no other means than economy could they tranquillize the spirit of the people, or persuade them that there was any wish to correct the abuses they complained of. He should therefore move, "That a Committee be appointed to take into consideration the business now remaining to be executed by the Secretary of State for the War and Colonial Department, and to report their opinion, whether the continuance of the same be any longer necessary; and whether the duties performed by the said Department may, without inconvenience to the public service, be transferred to any other offices, and with what diminution of charge."

Mr. Goulburn said, it was indispensable that there should be a responsible Minister through whom the colonies might make known their wants; and who, by devoting himself solely to their service, might be competent to explain and support their respective interests. The right hon. gentleman had said, that he (Mr. G.) was competent to this; he felt flattered by the right hon. gentleman's good opinion, but was convinced that such an arrangement would be impracticable: there was no other office to which the proposal, if feasible at all, was not equally applicable; and yet the right hon. gentleman could hardly contend for its application to the other great offices of State. But the right hon. gentleman would do well to consider the necessity of having a competent Minister in this as well as in the other great departments; and if he looked to the relief from expense, he should also see whether there were not disadvantages to counterbalance the saving that might be effected. The great excellence of the British system of government was, the freedom of discussion in that House, and the advantage of having a Cabinet Minister competent to give information on every question; there was the additional security, that no act of the Crown could take place without the consideration of these Cabinet Ministers; but the proposal of the right hon. gentleman would go to withdraw this security from one great branch of our empire and resources. The colonies, too, had a peculiar claim to the care of responsible Ministers, exclusively devoted to their interests. All other parts of the empire had their own representatives, who could speak to and defend their local interests: it was not so with the colonies; and if they could not be heard by their Minister, they must run the hazard of being neglected or sacrificed to the interests of others. The colonies were more numerous now than at any former period; they were hourly becoming of greater importance, the business resulting from them had materially increased, and he could not think so ill of the country as to believe it would sacrifice the welfare and happiness of thousands for a saving of 12,000*l.* We were not to consider these colonies merely as the appurtenances of grandeur and the gratification of national vanity, but to weigh the rights of the people, and their individual claims to protection. The abolition of the office in question would tend only to the mismanagement of the colonies, and the sum saved to the nation would be lost in the diminution of the happiness of the colonists. To those who thought that the colonies were only an incumbrance on the country, it might be that these reasons would not carry any weight with them; but with those who, like himself, considered them one of the great sources of our glory, and one of the great supports of our power, affording resources in war, and increasing our commerce in peace; with those who thought them important under every consideration, it would not be doubted that they had a right to due attention, and that that attention could only be bestowed on them by a Minister exclusively attached to their interests.

Mr. Marryat concurred entirely with the motion. From all circumstances, political and commercial, the question was proper for consideration.

Mr. Broune thought that the removal of a Secretary of State might tend to destroy the satisfaction and confidence of the colonies. In one island, great jealousy had recently existed, on account of the policy adopted at home; but all parties were reconciled by the conciliatory manner and tone of Lord Bathurst.

Mr. Barham spoke in terms of praise of Lord Bathurst's conduct, which had given additional confidence to the colonies; but their confidence did not depend on any individual: they trusted chiefly to the wisdom of that House. All they expected was a reasonable and just attention. The question was not about Lord Bathurst or Lord Sidmouth, but whether the colonial business could not be transacted in one office as well as in another. He saw no necessity of losing the services of his hon. friend opposite. His wish was, that the colonies should not be burdensome unnecessarily to the mother state. Some objects the colonies desired, and others they deprecated; but they had never expressed a desire for the establishment of any particular office. He did not think therefore that the House could forbear to go into the proposed committee.

Sir M. W. Ridley observed, that what had been said about the great increase of business might certainly be a fair argument for keeping up a number of clerks, for making entries and doing other matters, but not for the continuance of the third Secretary of State. It was necessary to make retrenchments; and he thought the abolition of the sinecures in the way proposed visionary as to any speedy effects. His hon. friend never meant to cut off communications with the Secretary of State's office; yet a saving might be effected of 12,000*l.* a year. Every reasonable and proper reduction of expenditure should now be made, on a system of economy, to be forced on Ministers, if they declined to adopt it, in order to relieve the country; and there never was a time in which the House could do so with more grace than the present.

Mr. Wilberforce felt with others much obliged for a proposition to save 12,000*l.* a year; but it was indispensable that we should find a good Government and Administration for our colonies. Such a saving might, therefore, prove an improvident and unjust purchase. He did not think that the business could be beneficially conducted by another department. We seemed bound in justice to the colonies to provide a separate, efficient, and dignified department for purposes so important.

Mr. Smyth observed, that before 1768 the business was done by one Secretary, and that the creation of the new office was unfortunate, as it was accompanied by the signals of rebellion. It did not appear that two Secretaries might not do all the business. Mr. Burke proposed this in 1782, by arrangements of the departments. He admitted that the duties of the office of his hon. friend opposite were very laborious, but he thought that a consolidation would diminish them.

Lord Milton remarked, that Ministers professed economy and voted for prodigality. All who knew his hon. friend (Mr. Wilberforce) must know his sincerity; but he seemed to make some mistake in his usual discrimination, between governing well and governing much. He seemed to attribute too much importance to the bustle of an office. Whoever considered the public affairs in the American war, or in the war to 1801, might see that the same necessity, if any, for the office, did not now exist. He was anxious that the House should review our colonial expenditure, as he thought great prodigality existed in it. Some of their committees were so unfortunately composed, that they were not much disposed to inquire into these things. He then alluded to the Report, in which no notice whatever was taken of the third Secretary of State. As the question had been previously agitated in the House, he thought it was the duty of the committee to consider and to report upon it. Had the committee said that the office was necessary, it might have been a work of supererogation to bring it again before the House; but as the matter stood, he thought it a gross dereliction of duty in the finance committee to make no examination into this particular office.

Mr. Protheroe spoke in opposition to the motion.

Mr. Porsonby had heard the necessity of this office of third Secretary supported by an argument of a nature so extraordinary, that he could not suffer it to pass unobserved. It was an argument that, if good for any thing at all, was excellent proof of the necessity of a fourth Secretary of State. The duties of this office were of such a superior kind, that they required the undivided attention of a Secretary of State. What then became of those duties during the whole of the war? Another argument was, that the third Secretary had written a most conciliatory letter, at a time when considerable agitation existed in one of our colonies. Though no reason could be assigned for continuing this office, yet such was the humility of temper, such the mildness of disposition, such the benevolence of nature, attributed to him who held it, that it must be continued for the sake of conciliating the colonies: but he would yield to no such argument. It was not to the character of any individual that the colonies must look; it was not from any individual they expected conciliation, but from the good sense of that House; it was not from the pleasure of a Secretary they would receive laws, but from the wisdom of Parliament: it was not to proclamations, and other deeds of that nature, they were to attend, but to their own assemblies. What was it that the House were invited to do? It was not to save one, two, or three thousand pounds; but they were requested to inquire whether 12,000*l.* could be saved; and he was convinced they could not be justified in refusing such an inquiry. The reasons for continuing or abolishing the office would appear before the committee. Last night a proposal was made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the relief of the distressed; he (Mr. P.) had declined entering into the details of that proposal, and would still reserve to himself the liberty of remarking freely upon its merits: but the proposal was an acknowledgment of the great distress of the country, and of the necessity of stepping forward in support of the distressed. In such a state of things, the smallest saving was of importance. By this plan of relief they rendered it necessary to collect additional revenue from the people to pay the interest of the loan. When they applied to them for this purpose, might it not be objected, "You claim from us a few thousands for the relief you afforded us, but you refused to inquire whether 12,000*l.* of the public money could be saved."

Mr. B. Bathurst said, the duties of the office could be executed by only a single individual; an individual of address and attention, who should take a particular interest in that province, and attend to its duties with undivided assiduity. All expressed themselves satisfied with the manner in which the present secretary had discharged his duties. This was gratifying to him; but the question was, whether the business of this office could be administered in conjunction with any other department. The debate of last night had no reference to this subject. They (his Majesty's Ministers) were animated with the strongest desire to alleviate the distresses of the country. He would challenge any gentleman to point out one instance in which they had not attended to Retrenchment, and promoted economy to the utmost of their power. Gentlemen who had had opportunities of thoroughly knowing the nature of the duties to be performed in this department did not consider its existence unnecessary. The occupation of mind it called for rendered it of the greatest importance. In a different state of the country it might perhaps be dispensed with. When all the effects and immediate consequences of the war were at an end, it might perhaps find its way to the sinecures: but while the country remained in its present state, it was indispensable. He must, therefore, object to the motion.

The House then divided, when there appeared—

For the motion 87—Against it 190—Majority 103.

DEBATING SOCIETIES.] Sir M. W. Ridley, in rising to move for a copy of the petition of the Academical Society, in Chancery-lane, to the Quarter Sessions of London, for a license to hold their meetings according to the provisions of the late act, said, that it would not be necessary for him, after the conversation that occurred last night, to trouble the House with many observations. The question would be discussed more at large on a subsequent occasion; for he now understood that the case of the Academical Society was not the only instance in which an unwarrantable and oppressive construction had been given to the act. There was another society called the Philosophical Society, nearly in similar circumstances, on whose application to the magistrates for a licence he intended to give notice of a motion. The City Philosophical Society was established in 1808, for the discussion of political and philosophical subjects. It of course came under the regulations for checking seditious meetings, and was under the necessity of applying for a licence, which it did at the Quarter Sessions of London, on the 14th of April. The House would be surprised to hear that the bench of magistrates had not complied with the application. The licence was refused, but on grounds different from those assigned for resisting the petition of the Academical Society. The magistrates did not require it to abstain from any topic of discussion, as a condition for licensing its meetings, but required a list of the subjects it was to discuss, and a definition of what its title or constitution would allow it to introduce. The society refused to comply with this condition. Its meetings were in consequence suspended, and he was sure he should astonish the House, when he mentioned, that the Recorder of London was present, and concurred in the views of the Bench, as one of the magistrates. If the magistrates of London, who were accustomed to expound the law, and to hear it expounded, who were men of education and information, with a learned judge at their head, were thus ignorant of the true construction of the late act, what would be the consequence of leaving its provisions to be interpreted by other magistrates, not so well informed, with a less vigilance public to watch them, and with fewer facilities of legal correction? (Hear, hear.) The extent to which the zeal or the ignorance of such men might carry them might easily be conjectured; and the danger to the liberties of the people from their conduct might easily be admitted, when he mentioned, that in one part of the country a Mineralogical Society had been refused a licence, because the magistrates were of opinion that the study of mineralogy had a blasphemous tendency. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) The hon. baronet said, he was far from accusing the magistrates of London of any evil intention; he merely wished to state that they had mistaken the proper construction of the act. The right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. B. Bathurst), and the noble Viscount, (Secretary for the Home Department), had admitted the misinterpretation; they had admitted that neither the framers of the late bill, nor the Legislature, could intend to understand by its clauses regarding philosophical societies, what the magistrates in the cases alluded to had understood by them; but nothing had been done in consequence, and if Parliament did not interfere, all freedom of debate or discussion was at an end. (Hear.) If the noble Secretary could find time to write circulars to abridge the liberties of the subject, it might have been expected that he would have made some exertion to explain to magistrates in so essential a point the meaning of the law, and instruct them in a more judicious discharge of their duty. (Hear, hear, hear.) The hon. baronet concluded by moving for a copy of the petition to the magistrates of London, by the Academical Society that meets in Chancery-lane, for a licence, on the 18th of April.

Mr. B. Bathurst had no objection to the motion, and would have abstained from any observation at present, had he not been called up by the allusion, which the hon. baronet had travelled out of his way to make, to a noble relative at the head of the Home Department. It had been said, that the noble Secretary might be better employed in writing letters to instruct the magistrates in the interpretation of the law, than in writing circulars to abridge the public liberty. The hon. baronet had assumed here two things which remained to be proved, and which he, when the proper opportunity offered, might shew to be unfounded—namely, that the circular alluded to was contrary to law; and that the Secretary of State was bound to instruct magistrates in the proper construction of the late act. Till the former of those points were proved, the noble Secretary could not be accused of abridging the liberties of the subject. He had acted on the best advice, and what he had done would be found conformable to law and justice. With regard to the second point, he denied that it was the duty of the Secretary of State to instruct the magistrates in the interpretation of acts of Parliament. (Loud cries of hear, hear.) Such was the doctrine held by an hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham) who had said that magistrates were to exercise their own discretion and judgment in applying and understanding the laws, untrammelled by the instructions of a Minister. The question with regard to the circular was, whether it was according to law—a point which might be argued on a future occasion. With regard to the case of the Mineralogical Society, the construction of the act was so absurd, that any law, however easily understood, might be perverted to any purpose by persons who could so far transgress the common rules of interpretation, as had been done in that case.

Mr. Brougham allowed, that the right hon. gentleman (Mr. B. Bathurst) was right in quoting his observation, that it was not the duty of Ministers to instruct the magistrates in the performance of their duty; and he (Mr. B.) found fault with Lord Sidmouth's circular, because it directed magistrates how to fulfil their functions and execute the law. (Hear, hear.) His hon. friend (Sir M. Ridley) had not chalked out this line of duty for the noble Secretary, nor approved of his writing circulars of one kind or another. He had merely said, that, instead of instructing the magistrates to abridge the liberties of the subject, Lord Sidmouth would have been more laudably employed in explaining an oppressive law in their favour. He had not required from him an explanatory letter in one case or another, but merely stated the preference that should have been given to an endeavour to interfere in favour of liberty, than against it. Without delivering any opinion, whether or not the doctrines in the circular were conformable to law, he (Mr. B.) thought the great question with regard to Lord Sidmouth's conduct, was to be decided on other principles—namely, whether a Secretary of State could expound the law to magistrates, and tell them authoritatively how to perform their duty. The only expounder of the law that the Constitution allowed was Parliament. (Hear, hear.) Upon whose authority did Lord Sidmouth proceed in expounding the law?—Upon the opinion of two individuals, two servants of the Crown—the Attorney and Solicitor-General. Upon the legal, professional, hired, and paid for dicta of two officers, the Secretary of State had directed the magistrates of England what class of men they were to punish, and how they were to proceed in executing the law; and had thus been guilty of one of the most unconstitutional acts that ever a Minister committed in the exercise, or rather the transgression, of his duty. (Cries of hear.) He hoped the notice taken of the late acts, and the disgraceful conduct to which they gave rise, or for which they furnished the pretext, would operate as a warning and caution to magistrates. An extraordinary zeal seemed to prevail, and descended to all the gradations of office, even lower than on former occasions. He alluded to the conduct of the town-clerk of Liverpool on a late occasion, which had filled the country with indignation from one end to the other. (Hear, hear.) the subjects to be discussed by the Philosophical Society.

Mr. Tierney said, the society called their subjects of discussion philosophical, and asked what definition the worthy alderman himself would give of philosophy?

Mr. Alderman Atkins confessed himself puzzled.

Wednesday, April 30.

[LORD SIDMOUTH'S CIRCULAR LETTER.] Earl Grey stated, that in the opinion of the law-officers of the Crown, there was a reference to an opinion given by their predecessors, in 1801, in the cases of Thomas Spence and Alexander Hogg; and as he trusted there would be no objection to the production of that document, he would now move for it. The subject was one of as great magnitude and importance as any that ever was brought under their lordships' consideration; and it was of the highest consequence that every possible information respecting it should be produced. The doctrines now promulgated in the circular letter of the Secretary of State, upon the authority of the law-officers of the Crown, certainly involved a most important novelty in the practice of the Constitution, and a violation of the law, according to the best opinions. He would, however, say nothing farther on the subject at present, but move for the opinion given by the law-officers of the Crown in 1801, referred to in the opinion now laid on the table.

The Earl of Liverpool had not sufficient official knowledge to enable him to say whether there was any such opinion in the office. It might turn out, that the law officers in 1801 had acted upon their own opinion on the subject in the cases of Spence and Hogg; and that there was no opinion upon a case laid before them by the Secretary of State. He hoped, therefore, the noble earl would postpone the motion till the proper inquiries should be made, in order to ascertain whether there was any such opinion in the office.

The Lord Chancellor was not at present acquainted with the cases referred to; but if the noble lord would postpone his motion, he would take care to inform himself.

Earl Grey agreed to postpone the motion till Friday or Monday, expressing his doubt whether the cases referred to would be found to bear at all upon the subject of holding to bail by justices of the peace, on account of such alleged offences as those stated in the circular letter.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, April 30.

[CLERGY REGULATION BILL.] Mr. Manners Sutton rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to amend and consolidate the different acts for regulating the residence of the clergy.—In the first place, he begged leave shortly to state what the course hitherto pursued by Parliament had been toward the accomplishment of that end, viz. the enforcement of residence on the benefices held by spiritual persons. The act of Henry VIII., whatever had been its merits originally, or its ultimate practical inconvenience, remained in full force till the 43d of the present King. This act, which was then substituted for the former statute, was prepared by his right hon. and learned friend, the member for the University of Oxford, (Sir W. Scott,) and gave certain powers to common informers, which had been perverted a few years ago into an instrument of grievous injustice and oppression. To such an extent had the system of persecution been carried, that Parliament felt itself bound to interfere by the extraordinary step of enacting, that all the existing prosecutions under the statute should be suspended, and the temporary act of the 54th of the King was passed. The clause by which it was made temporary, was not founded upon the consideration that the evil also was of a temporary nature, but for the purpose of affording a future opportunity of bringing the whole subject in the form of some general and digested measure before the attention of the House. This was expedient, both for the defence of the clergy, and for the due performance of their duties to the public. The act of the 54th was on the eve of expiring, the consequence of which would be the revival, in all its parts, of the act of the 43d, and the exposure of the clergy to all those hardships and inconveniences from which it had been judged necessary to relieve them on a former occasion by a very unusual proceeding. Assuming, therefore, that it was not proper to leave the law in its present state, or to throw the benefited clergy headlong into the grasp of common informers, he apprehended that it was still advisable to recur to the general principle and leading provisions of the 43d of the King. Many of its enactments were excellent, and the country at large was under the highest obligations to his right hon. and learned friend for the success with which he had executed a stupendous undertaking. The measure which he was proposing to introduce fell very far short indeed of the labour employed in the preparation of that act, which was the production of deep research, and of distinguished talents. Its author had undoubtedly been assisted in the execution of the task by possessing the entire confidence of that House, of the clergy, and the public; and thirteen years' experience of its beneficial effects had shewn that this confidence had not been misplaced. All the real inconvenience had arisen, not out of the act itself, but of an extravagant abuse of the powers vested by it for a necessary purpose in the common informer. He considered that, by checking the liability to the repetition of that abuse, he should be furthering the end of the act itself, and carrying into effect the intentions of the Legislature. (Hear, hear.) If he could flatter himself that he had now laid a foundation for the adoption of some new proceeding, it appeared to him that there were in this view but two courses to be pursued—either to revise the temporary act of the 54th of the King, or to pass the bill which it was his desire to introduce. The first was open to all the objections that applied to temporary laws; and if, upon the general principle, such a system was deemed vicious, it was calculated in this instance to produce particular disadvantages. It left the minds of the great body of the clergy, who were men of retired habits, and living at a distance from the capital, in an unsettled understanding of the existing law, and under constant apprehensions that every session of Parliament would bring some new alteration. This change and uncertainty tended likewise to cast odium on their character, and create prejudices in the public mind, from the opinion that new laws were perpetually required to coerce the clergy, as if they were less zealous in the discharge of their duties, less correct in their habits, and, in one word, less professional than they were formerly. Although in his conscience he believed the fact to be directly the reverse, yet, when once this impression was received, it opened a wide door to slander, and led to a disposition in many to hold up some particular individual as a fair example of the whole body. He hoped, therefore, that his bill would at least be examined and discussed, before the House resolved again to have recourse to a temporary enactment; conceiving, as he did, that, if possible, such a measure ought to be avoided. The bill had been prepared in a quarter which must necessarily possess the respect and confidence of the clergy; he meant, that it had been framed by the bench of bishops, and he need hardly add, with that care and industry which might be expected from their stations, their responsibility, and, as he should say, from their peculiar fitness for the undertaking. It contained not any new code of laws, although its object was not confined simply to the enforcement of residence, but extended also so far to the regulation of curacies as to embody in one act all the statutory penalties affecting either the benefited or the stipendiary clergy. The act of Anne, for regulating the stipends of curates, had been amended by the 56th of the King, which had been since amended in all its parts by the act of the 53d. All the provisions of this latter statute were substantially introduced into his bill for the convenience of bringing the two subjects together, and not for the purpose of legislating anew respecting them. He hoped he had now said enough to shew the general spirit of the combined measure he had in contemplation. Its great principle was, as far as possible, to promote residence. So long, however, as pluralities continued, and men were subject to sickness or infirmity, some exceptions must be allowed; and one of the regulations of the bill provided in such cases, that an absence thus occasioned should be supplied by a licensed curate, with a remuneration adequate to the labours he performed, and the responsibility he incurred. There were also some additional regulations with regard to the occupation of farms by the clergy, the law of which had remained in its present inconvenient state since the Revolution. Upon the whole, he trusted that, whilst the measure would effectually secure the clergy from oppression, it would, at the same time, provide for the just rights and interests of the public, and that it would appear especially, that whatever could tend to lower or degrade the character of the former had been studiously avoided. If he should obtain leave to bring in the bill, it was his intention to move that it be read a first and second time, for the purpose of then leaving the blanks open, and printing it for the use of members, till a day should be appointed for taking it into consideration. He believed there would be no objection to this proceeding, and should therefore now move for leave to bring in a bill "to consolidate and amend the laws relating to spiritual persons holding of farms, and for enforcing the residence of spiritual persons on their benefices, and for the support and maintenance of stipendiary curates in England." (Hear, hear.)

General Thornton signified his assent to the motion, but trusted that the laity were still to retain the power of interfering in the discipline of the church whenever it should appear to be neglected.

Mr. Babington wished to know, as the subject was of great importance, what were the principal amendments of the existing law which the hon. and learned gentleman intended to submit.

Mr. Manners Sutton felt some difficulty in at once answering the question of the hon. gentleman, as the alterations were of a nature to be best understood when examined in the bill itself. With regard to the 53d of the King, the clauses providing for the support of stipendiary curates were differently arranged, but the principle remained substantially the same.

Mr. Brougham did not desire that the hon. gentleman should go through all the clauses in detail; but if there were any substantial difference, it would be better to communicate it to the House, as it was proposed that the bill should pass through two stages without discussion.

Mr. Manners Sutton replied, that the bill would follow the course pointed out by the act of the 43d of the King, and conclude by re-enacting the provisions of the act of the 53d, with regard to the allowances to curates; and as to the subject of farming, would allow the clergy to take a farm to the extent of 20 acres, with licence from the bishop, not merely with a view to the sustenance of their families, but of enabling them to add to the convenience of their glebe land. The regulations for enforcing residence had been abused by the former, not upon their substance, but their letter; and with a view of remedying any intermediate inconvenience, the bill would provide for suspending all prosecutions for six months farther, after the expiration of the act of the 54th. For the purpose of guarding against any possible trap which might be left open, the ecclesiastical year was made to begin on the 1st of January, and end on the 31st of December; and it was enacted, that all licences for non-residence should in future be limited to two years, always ending on the 31st of December. By this means, the bishops, being always aware of the expiration of these licences, would enjoy a security which it was not easy for them to possess, whilst every separate licence had a particular duration. On the stipendiary clergy, the alterations consisted in little more than in what might be called a dislocation of the clauses in the former act.

Lord Ebrington observed, that the expectation of this measure had excited much apprehension in the clergy generally, as it was believed that it contained some regulation for enlarging the power of the bishops, at the expense of the parochial clergy. This was one reason for not pressing the bill over two stages without inquiry. He wished to know whether there was any clause enabling the bishop to appoint a curate, wherever he thought the duty was not adequately performed by the incumbent.

Mr. Manners Sutton said, there certainly was a clause of that description, but it conferred no new power whatever; it merely provided a shorter process of executing what was already law.

The bill was brought in, read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

[SALT DUTIES.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that a select committee be appointed to "consider of the use of Rock Salt in the fisheries; of the regulations respecting the use and storing of refined salt, and of the allowances of salt duty free for the Fisheries; of the duties on Foreign Salt imported, and of the state of the duties upon mineral and other alkali; and to report their opinion thereupon to the House."

After a few words from Lord Lascelles and Mr. Curwen, the motion was agreed to, and the Committee named.

[POOR RATES.] Lord Lascelles rose, pursuant to notice, to move for leave to bring in a bill to make lead mines chargeable to the Poor Rates. His lordship observed, that it would not be proper to subject the adventurer to these rates, inasmuch as the mines were matters of great risk: all he wished was, to render the proprietors chargeable to the relief of the poor. An opinion had gone abroad, that he intended to charge the adventurer; but this he did not mean to do. If the House should permit him to bring in the bill, he would merely move to have it read a first time, and that the second reading should stand over till the 19th of May. In the interval, the House would have an opportunity of considering how far leases would be affected by the stipulations in existing leases for the payment of all Government and parochial taxes.

Lord Milton seconded the motion, and observed, that though this bill would establish a new law, it would not enact any new practice, as he had received information that, for upwards of twenty years past, the proprietors of these mines had been rated towards the relief of the poor.

Mr. D. Gilbert gave his hearty concurrence to this measure.

Mr. Gurwen said, that the proprietors ought to bear some part of the burden of relieving the poor; and he trusted there would be no objection to the introduction of the bill.

Sir C. Monck, Lord Lascelles, and another Member, said a few words, when the motion was agreed to, and the bill was brought in and read a first time.

POOR EMPLOYMENT BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in a bill to enable the Commissioners of the Treasury to issue 1,500,000*l.* in Exchequer bills, under certain limitations, for the furtherance of public works of utility, the encouragement of the fisheries, and the employment of the poor, for a limited time, securities being given for the repayment.—Read a first time and ordered to be printed.

The Window Duty Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Lushington brought in the State Lottery Bill, which was read a first time.

Thursday, May 1.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS.] Earl Spencer presented a petition from the Academical Society, in Chancery Lane, similar to the one presented from the same body to the Commons. (See page 748.) His lordship did not intend to propose any farther proceeding than that the petition should be laid on the table; he ther believed that no redress could be given.

The Earl of Darnley could not help saying, that the petitioners had very serious cause of complaint. There was nothing in the act that could bear the construction which had been put upon it; but when their lordships saw that magistrates for the county of Middlesex had so misconstrued it, they would consider how liable it was to be misconstrued by magistrates for other places, who might be presumed to be less enlightened. It was well worth while, therefore, to consider, for the sake of the public, whether some steps ought not to be taken with a view to amend the act, so as to prevent the possibility of misconstruction; though he did not pledge himself to propose such a measure.

The petition was laid on the table.

The Window Duty Bill was brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

Thursday, May 1.

WOOL TRADE.] Mr. Burrell said, he held in his hand a petition relating to a very important subject, viz. to the laws which regulated the growth, trade, and manufacture of wool. The petitioners, who consisted of a number of respectable wool growers in the neighbourhood of Bighthelmstone and Shoreham, in the county of Sussex, considered themselves much aggrieved, that there should be so little restraint on the importation of foreign wool, whilst the prohibitions on the export trade gave the manufacturer a monopoly of all wool of British growth. He would remind the House, that the price of this article had lately fallen 50 per cent. or from 3*s.* to 1*s.* 6*d.* per lb.; and yet he believed that few gentlemen perceived any alteration in the price of clothes. The petitioners, in order to prove to the House the great reduction in the value of Wool grown in the United Kingdom, caused by a prohibition of export, and their being prevented seeking a better market, when their own is overloaded with foreign wool, referred to a work published many years since, by the Rev. John Smith, intitled "Memoirs of Wool," and from which extracts are made in Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations." They prayed the House to protect them from a ruinous foreign competition, ruinous, because arising from countries in which the occupiers of land are not subject to Poors' Rates and other charges; or if this prayer should not be granted, they at least asked permission to seek a remunerating price elsewhere, when their home market is glutted with Wool imported duty free; and on the strongest principles of equity, if they were still to remain subject to a free and unrestricted import, they respectfully claimed at the hands of the House, as free and as unrestricted export.

Mr. Weston had a similar petition to offer to the House, signed by six hundred respectable wool in the county of Essex, praying that the House would take this subject into its serious consideration. The distresses under which the agriculture of the country laboured, had been recognized in the last session of Parliament, and a committee appointed to inquire into the best means of relieving them. Whilst the manufacturers however had been heard, no opportunity of stating their case had been afforded to the wool growers.

Lord Lascelles observed, that at the appointment of the committee alluded to, it was found impossible to investigate the whole subject; and the consequence was, a resolution to limit the inquiry in the first instance to the state of the wool trade. The result was, that it appeared that wool had borne a sufficient price up to that period, and had not therefore affected the agricultural interest. The committee sat before Easter, so that there was ample time for hearing the evidence of the wool growers, but not one attended to make any communication. With regard to the general question of policy, he must oppose the prayer of these petitions at all times, but he thought the distress of the manufacturing interests an unanswerable objection to it at the present period.

Mr. D. Gilbert had a similar petition from certain growers of wool at Lewes and Eastbourne; and although he agreed generally with the principle of the noble lord, he thought some alteration might take place in the laws affecting importation without any injury to the wool trade.

Mr. F. Lewis was strongly of opinion, that it was the duty of the House to go into a full inquiry upon this subject. The whole system of these laws was a reproach to the country, and presented an anomaly more pregnant with absurdity than any part of what was called the commercial system.

Mr. Curran urged the necessity of an inquiry on the subject: but admitted that it would lead to a very wide and important investigation, comprehending not merely our domestic interests, but our foreign policy.

Mr. Shiffner remarked, that all the petitioners required was, such a duty on imported wool as would secure to them a fair remunerating price for that of their own growth.

The petitions were then presented, and ordered to lie upon the table.

CATHOLICS.] Mr. Grattan said, he had a petition from the corporation of Dublin, the presenting of which by himself, he trusted, would not be held, any more than on a former occasion, to derogate from the ancient privilege of that city, of presenting its petitions to the House in the person of its mayor. The prayer of this petition was, that the House would make no concessions to the claims of the Roman Catholics. As the member for that city, he deemed it his duty to present it, although he totally and entirely differed from the opinion of the petitioners; but he owed too much respect to those who had done him the honor to elect him for their representative, to pass any observation or criticism upon it, and he should move that it be read, hoping only that he might be allowed to lament what he would not presume to condemn.

The petition was read, and ordered to lie upon the table.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir F. Burdett presented a petition from the freeholders and other inhabitants of the town of St. Ives, in Huntingdonshire, praying for a Reform in Parliament.—Convinced as he was, and as the petitioners appeared to be, that every political evil under which they laboured, was in some way or other connected with the notorious corruptions of that House, he hoped they would persevere in firmly demanding their constitutional rights, and felt great satisfaction in presenting this petition.—Ordered to lie on the table.

WELCH JUDGES.]—Mr. Ponsonby, in rising to call the attention of the House to the propriety of suffering the Welch Judges to sit in Parliament, said, that the great number of communications which had been made to him on the administration of justice in Wales, induced him to alter the shape of the motion of which he had given notice. (See page 643.) He could assure the House, that he had not spoken to one gentleman who approved of the mode of administering the laws in that part of the kingdom. He should therefore feel it his duty to move, instead of his original notice, that a select committee be appointed to “inquire into and report to the House their opinion touching the laws relating to the administration of justice in Wales.”

Sir W. W. Wynn seconded the motion; and observed, that this subject deserved the most serious investigation.

Lord Castlereagh had no difficulty in concurring with the motion; but wished it to be recollected, that the mode of administering justice in Wales was distinguished from that which pervaded the other parts of the country.

Mr. Ponsonby was desirous of having it understood, that he did not mean to cast a slur on any particular parties: he complained generally of the mode in which justice was administered in Wales.

The Attorney-General said, if the question which was fixed for to-night had been brought on, he should have thought it his duty to have explained some matters which related more particularly to himself in his judicial capacity. He was extremely anxious to have an opportunity, which indeed now presented itself, of speaking on that subject. (The hon. and learned gentleman here defended himself against a charge of having postponed the Chester circuit for a week on account of a special retainer which he had received to go to Launceston in Cornwall. He denied that he had neglected the claims of public justice for the sake of private lucre. The cause at Launceston was tried on a Friday, and he was at Welchpool the first assize town, even before the sheriff was ready to go to church.)

Sir M. W. Ridley said, he had received information on which he could rely, that induced him to suppose that the Chester circuit was delayed beyond the usual period. He did not know whether the Attorney-General could take special retainers. In his opinion, and according to his information, there had been great inconvenience on the part of the gentlemen of the bar, from having the circuit postponed: and he trusted that the observations which had been thrown out would prevent the recurrence of this circumstance. (Hear, hear.)

The Attorney-general would only say, upon his word of honour, that he did not think the delay had been attended with any inconvenience to the bar. When Lord Ellenborough was Attorney-General, he took special retainers to the last.

Mr. C. W. Wynne said, that he had been that circuit for 7 years, and the Chief Justice had always thought himself at liberty to make very great deviations in fixing the time of the assize. In the present instance he did not think that any inconvenience had been occasioned by delay. With respect to the motion then before the House, for appointing a committee to inquire into the administration of justice in Wales, he thought it extremely wise and proper, and gave it his entire assent.

Mr. Abercromby by no means wished to prolong the conversation on this subject, as he did not think this sort of discussion was calculated to raise the character of the professor which was not too popular already within the walls of that House. (Hear, hear.) Considering the matter in the most favourable point of view, he had every reason to believe that the assize was not held by two days later than it ought to have been. The gentlemen of the bar certainly complained of it as a great inconvenience.

After a few words from Mr. Hall, Mr. Barham, Sir J. Nicholl, and Mr. Davenport, who all concurred in the motion,

Mr. Macdonald rose and expressed a hope that this would be the last time that these two offices (of Attorney-General and Chief Justice of Chester) would be vested in the same person. (Hear, hear.) Very considerable inconvenience must always arise from this union, and he trusted the Committee would direct their attention particularly to this subject. (Hear, hear.)

The motion was then agreed to, and the Committee was named, consisting of Mr. Ponsonby, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Attorney-General, Mr. Wynn, Sir A. Pigott, and others.

USURY LAWS.]—Mr. Sergeant Onslow, in moving for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the laws that regulate the rate of interest, did not propose to go into the subject at length, as it had been fully discussed on a former occasion; he must, however, remind the House, that these laws were not only attended with no good effects, but were productive of the most pernicious consequences; and though they had now existed for a great length of time, and derived some sanction from their antiquity, it was a most mistaken notion as to the views of the first framers, which had supported the sanction they enjoyed, and the prejudices which prolonged their existence. These laws had originated in a wish to open, not to limit, the rate of interest. Before their enactment it had been forbidden to take any interest at all on the loan of money. Every profit, even the smallest, derived from such a loan, was branded with the name of usury; and it was with a view not so much to limit the rate of interest, as to protect those who took any, that the laws in question were framed. He had last year proposed a repeal of these laws, but was advised by the friends of that measure to delay for a short period, and he was glad he did; for in the interval the republication of Mr. Bentham's admirable work on the subject had served very generally to enlighten the public mind. The unanswerable arguments and clear statements of that gentleman had fully shewn the inexpediency and mischief of these laws; and it was, therefore, the less necessary for him to enter at length into the arguments against them. It was perfectly clear, that the more restraints were laid on money transactions, the higher always was the amount of interest actually paid on loans; and the effect of these regulations had only been to oppress and ruin the sinking tradesman; who, but for them, might have saved his credit by obtaining a temporary assistance at the fair market rate of the commodity. He had been told, on a former occasion, that all this might be true, but that the repeal of these laws would have an ill effect in the contracts made for loans on the credit of the public funds, which being regulated by the legal rate of interest, the public at least was a gainer by borrowing money at that rate. The fact, however, was the very reverse of this; and the loans contracted for by the public were, in reality, never affected by the legal rate of interest, but regulated, like all other money transactions, by the relative state of demand and supply, the credit of the borrower, and the opportunities of the lender. It was true that, at the time that argument had been used, some circumstances then affecting the price of stocks gave it the appearance of having weight; but those stocks had now risen 10 per cent.; the rate of interest paid by Government had lowered in just the same proportion as in every other quarter, and the argument could no longer have any force. Other objections that had been urged, were the apprehension of detriment to the landed interest, and loss to those who had borrowed money on mortgage. It was proved, that the fluctuations which the rate of interest might experience, in consequence of the repeal of the usury laws, would induce the lenders of money on mortgage security, frequently and suddenly to call in their principal, and expose the borrower to the danger of a foreclosure, or to the expense and trouble of repeated conveyances and reconveyances: but that inconvenience had been felt, and was daily felt, under the existing system to a much greater degree than it possibly could under any other. Nothing was more common than for a lender to call for a repayment of his principal at a time when the market rate of interest, being 6 or 7 per cent., it was impossible for the mortgagor to prevent a foreclosure, except on the most ruinous terms: either he was driven to sell his land at a time of sudden depression, when half its value could not be obtained, or (as he was precluded by law from raising money on the usual security at 6 or 7 per cent. if that happened to be the market rate) he was compelled to borrow by granting annuities at the most exorbitant rate. The common mode of late years had been, to grant annuities for a term of ninety-nine years, determinable on three lives, at fifteen per cent. : or determinable on four lives, at fourteen per cent. He knew an instance of an honourable member, a most respectable man, who, being called on to repay money he had borrowed on mortgage for the improvement of his estate, could only meet the demand by borrowing at this ruinous rate. It was owing to this that estates had been sold for nothing in the very worst times ; for, though Courts set their faces as much as possible against foreclosures, yet they could not be altogether prevented. It had farther been objected, that the repeal of these laws would be hurtful to the monied interest, who would be tempted to loss by lending their money at high rates to speculators and projectors. He left it to the good sense of the House to determine, whether so circumspect a body as monied men were in general, would be likely to lose much from a neglect to exact sufficient security on their loans. It was absurd to conceive them incapable of directing their own affairs, and unjust as well as impolitic to intermeddle. Adam Smith had said, with great truth, that they were always more likely to lend to the thrifty than to the improvident. Besides, the word "projectors" was an unmeaning and idle word, conveying an indefinite interpretation, on an indefinite class of men. For himself, he deemed it impossible to draw any line, and say who were projectors and speculators ; and certain it was, that the most successful schemes, as well as the ordinary progress of improvement, must, in the outset, have been no other than projects, and the production of projectors. He was fully persuaded, that every part of the empire suffered from these laws ; but if any part suffered more than another, it was Ireland. Ireland had a fertile soil, a great population, a favourable climate ; it was deficient only in capital ; it was the want of that which repressed the national energy, and prevented any increase in the stock of national happiness. He should only add, that in moving for leave to bring in the bill he should not propose to fill up the blanks under a period of several years. The learned sergeant then moved for leave to bring in a bill for the repeal of the laws which regulate or restrain the rate of interest.

Sir F. Flood said, the measure had his cordial approbation, and he was convinced the good effects of it would be felt all over the country, and through Ireland in particular. Aristotle had said that all money was in its nature barren, but that was a mistake ; let it once take its own way, let it once follow its own course, and its effects would be truly beneficial. Ireland wanted only capital and a resident gentry ; if it had those advantages, it would vie with any country in Europe ; but without money no country could prosper.

On the question being put, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he did not intend to oppose the bill, with the reasons and principles of which he perfectly coincided ; at the same time some difficulties must be anticipated when it was proposed to alter a system of laws which had been so long established, and which were almost interwoven with every mercantile transaction. He had some doubts, too, whether the public mind were yet sufficiently prepared, and ancient prejudices sufficiently smoothed away, for the introduction of so great an alteration in our economical system. The state of public credit, however, was such, that the question might perhaps be now safely entertained. He was quite aware of the great disadvantages the landed interest had laboured under in the procuring of money, and he should give his opinion more fully on another occasion.

Mr. Lockhart objected to the measure, that it would place the monied interest in a state of fluctuation ; and if so, they who had borrowed money on mortgage would be in a perpetual state of change, and subject to the enormous expense of frequent conveyance and reconveyance.

Sir J. Newport contended, that those fluctuations were experienced at present, and the bill proposed could not possibly augment them. The effect of the present law (forbidding the loan of money at a higher rate than 5 per cent.) was so severe and ruinous, that the Legislature itself was obliged to open a door through which the law might be evaded. In truth, if they would have a fixed rate of interest, they ought to have enforced it ; but they had established a rate, and had not enforced it, and the lender was obliged to make up the risk he ran by augmenting the price of his commodity. The high rate of annuities, too, was, in some measure, owing to the necessity of the lender being paid for engaging in a transaction which was supposed to reflect more or less disgrace on all who were concerned. It was a notorious fact, that in every country where there was no law against usury, in Holland, in Flanders, in Switzerland, money was always at a lower rate than in those countries where there were legal restraints ; and that in countries where there were restraints upon the money market, the rate was high in proportion to the strictness of the law ; in all cases those laws were invariably broken through ; and in Great Britain the breach was sanctioned by the annuity act.

Mr. Martin expressed his conviction that the repeal of the usury laws would lower the rate of interest.

Leave was then given, and Mr. Sergeant Onslow, Sir J. Newport, Mr. Brougham, Mr. Abercromby and Sir F. Flood were appointed to bring in the bill.

Friday, May 2.

[SALT DUTIES.] Lord Holland presented a petition from certain salt manufacturers in and about Chesterfield, relative to the Salt Duties. Nothing, he observed, could more tend to the relief of the country from the present general distress than a repeal of these duties. A measure, which it was irregular to mention, was in progress in another place, having for its object to afford some relief to the nation, and alleviate the pressure of the general distress; but a repeal of the Salt Duties would be a much more effectual remedy, without any departure from the ordinary course of Government. It was but justice, however, to the petitioners to state, that they did not pray for a repeal, but only for some regulation of these duties, which they thought would be beneficial.

The petition was laid on the table.

LORD SIDMOUTH'S LETTER.] The Lord Chancellor stated, that upon inquiry he had found, that in 1801 no case had been laid before the law officers of the Crown for their opinion; and formerly no opinion was given as to the power of magistrates to hold to bail for libels. The cases, however, which were referred to in the opinion of the present law officers of the Crown, he believed he could now state pretty correctly. On the 13th of April, 1801, a person of the name of Seale was charged on oath before Mr. Ford, a magistrate, with the publication of a libel, entitled "Society restored to its Natural State." The magistrate issued his warrant to apprehend him, and held him to bail to appear on the first day of the next term in the King's Bench, to answer to an information for the libel. He was called on his recognizance, and appeared, and no farther proceeding took place. That was the case referred to as the case of Spence. As to the case of Alexander Hogg, he was, in 1801, charged on oath before the Lord Mayor of London, with the publication of a libel, entitled "Trials for Adultery." The Lord Mayor granted his warrant for the apprehension of Hogg, who was apprehended accordingly, and held to bail to appear to an information in the King's Bench on the first day of the next term. The recognizance, he was informed, was prepared by the then Attorney-General, the late Mr. Perceval. Hogg was called on his recognizance, and appeared, but no farther proceeding took place.

Earl Grey.—From the statement of these cases by the noble lord, he did not understand that the power of the magistrate to hold to bail for libel was there called in question. They were acts of the magistrates which had passed without question. Whether Mr. Perceval, in preparing the recognizance, acted merely as a private counsel, or as the Crown officer, did not appear. At all events, the question had not been agitated; and these instances were not to be regarded as the solemn decision of a court of justice, or the solemn opinion of the law officers of the Crown upon a case formally submitted to them by the Secretary of State. He was very far, indeed, from being satisfied that the law was in this particular such as it was stated to be by the law officers of the Crown. In point of practice, as he understood, and he had taken very considerable pains to procure accurate information, this mode of proceeding was altogether novel, and it was a doctrine and practice most dangerous to the Constitution. The Circular Letter, too, sent by the Secretary of State to the magistrates on this subject, was, in his opinion, a most unconstitutional interference by a Minister of the Crown with the ordinary administration of justice. He felt it his duty, therefore, to call for the case laid before the law officers of the Crown by the Secretary of State, and to bring the whole subject under discussion in their lordships' House; it was a subject which well deserved their lordships' most serious consideration. He would move for the case on Monday week, and proposed that the Lords be summoned for that day.—Ordered accordingly.

The New Street Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Friday, May 2.

POLICE COMMITTEE.] Mr. Bennet brought up the Report of the Committee on the Police of the Metropolis; and, in moving that it be printed, observed, that the attention of the Committee had been particularly drawn to the present system of licensing public-houses; to supply the deficiencies of which, it was his intention shortly to submit a measure to the House.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.] Mr. Bennet said, it was with great concern that he felt it to be his duty, as Chairman of the Committee appointed to inquire into the State of the Police of the Metropolis, to bring under the consideration of the House a Breach of Privilege contained in a book recently published, and which had been sent to the Committee by the author, purporting to be "A Vindication of the Magistrates acting in and for the Tower Division, from the Charges contained in a printed Work, entitled 'The Report of the Committee on the State of the Police of the Metropolis; together with the Minutes of Evidence taken before the Committee of the House of Commons,' by Thomas Thirlwall, M.A., Rector of Bowers Gifford, Essex; and Magistrate for the counties of Middlesex and Essex." Without making any comment on the general tone of the work, which was by no means respectful towards the Committee, he would only observe, that several passages were so extremely offensive to their feelings, and hostile to their privileges, that it was thought fit to summon Mr. Thirlwall before them, to require some explanation of his conduct. When Mr. Thirlwall appeared before the Committee, he avowed himself to be the author of the work in question. But before he (Mr. Bennet) proceeded to state what had taken place on that occasion, he would request the clerk to read from the book the passages which were the subject of complaint.

"I have inquired into the constitution of these Committees of the House of Commons, and the mode of their proceedings, and I have no doubt others will be surprised as well as myself at the description. My impression was, that a Committee is composed of a number of members who personally attend, that the evidence of every witness, and the whole entire evidence of each witness, are entered in the Minutes, literatim et verbatim, and printed for the use of the House.

"My information, however, has taught me, that my impression is most erroneous, and that this was not the mode at least pursued in the examination of witnesses, upon the charges against the magistrates of the Tower Division. During the examination of several of the witnesses, the Chairman only was present; Mr. Calvert is the only member I could learn who did assist him occasionally, particularly when the house of Hanbury was in question. This honourable member very much wished Mr. Fox, of Shadwell, to give his evidence, but the private explanation of that gentleman induced him not to insist upon it.

"A considerable part of the evidence given in was not entered on the Minutes, and a very material part that was offered was not accepted. I have not the smallest knowledge of the Chairman, other than by his occasional speeches as an Opposition member, by the name of Captain Bennet, from which I infer he has not dedicated much of his time to the profession of the law, and directed his studies to the nature of legal evidence.

"It is pretty well known my loyalty to my King and attachment to the Constitution; and I had almost said enthusiastic admiration of its forms. I have contributed my part in the worst of times to its safety. I hope, therefore, that my observations will not be tortured into any intentional disrespect to the Committee. I acknowledge its authority, and bow to its decisions. But when I make this declaration, it does not follow that I am bound against my conscience to admit either candour or impartiality in the proceedings, or that if the body of magistrates are to be tried, I should not prefer Mr. Beaumont bringing his charges before my Lord Ellenborough, rather than before a Committee of the House of Commons, with even Captain Bennet in the chair. I am not partial to the Committees in the time of Cromwell, nor to the Committees in France in the time of the Revolution. I do not wish to be tried by Committees. I protest against a trial by Committees, Inquisitions, or Star Chambers."

Mr. Bennet proceeded to state, that when Mr. Thirlwall appeared before the Committee, some explanation was required from him of the passages which had been read by the clerk. He would pass over that part of the explanation which related to himself personally, and confine himself to that which regarded the last paragraph which had been read by the clerk, beginning with, "It is well known my loyalty to my King, and attachment to the Constitution," and ending with, "I protest against a trial by Committees, Inquisitions, or Star Chambers." The Committee observed to Mr. Thirlwall that this passage contained an innuendo strongly pointed against them, and proceeded to ask for explanation on the subject. The honourable member proceeded to read the interrogations and replies, which were to the following effect:—

Q. What grounds had you for accusing the Committee of want of candour and impartiality?
—I deny doing so.

Q. Do you wish that to stand as your reply?
—Yes.

Q. How do you reconcile that denial with the comparison of a trial by the Committee, and a trial before my Lord Ellenborough?—I merely stated that I preferred the one to the other.

Q. Did you not, in the passage just read, mean to insinuate that the Committee had neither candour nor impartiality?—I object to any question tending to criminate myself.

Q. Having stated, that you prefer a trial by jury to a trial by a Committee, you add, "I am not partial to the Committees in the time of Cromwell, nor to the Committees in France in the time of the Revolution. I do not wish to be tried by Committees. I protest against a trial by Committees, Inquisitions, or Star Chambers." What was your meaning in that passage?—I meant that which I stated.

Q. Did you mean to assimilate the present Committee to Inquisitions or Star Chambers?—No. No such thing. I had no idea of the kind.

Q. What then did you mean?—I meant to fill up a period.

Q. It is likely that this subject will be brought before the House of Commons. Do you mean to stand by the answers which you have just made?—I do.

Q. Have you any thing to add to what you have stated?—No.

The Committee endeavoured in this examination to induce the reverend gentleman to make such an explanation and apology as might render it unnecessary to submit the matter to the consideration of the House, but in vain. He must say also, that Mr. Thirlwall's manner and tone on the occasion were the very opposite of what might have been expected. That morning, however, he had tendered to the Committee an explanation of the obnoxious passages, and of some of the replies in his examination. With respect to the insinuation that the Committee had neither candour nor impartiality, to the question on which he had answered that he objected to any question tending to criminate himself, he now expressed his contrition for the passage. With respect to his answer to the question relative to the Inquisitions or Star-chambers, that he meant to fill up a period, he now corrected it by stating, that it was a rhetorical figure of speech; and that he had no intention of instituting a comparison between the Committee and the Inquisition, or the Star-chamber. He added, that perceiving the publication had given offence to the Committee, he had directed his publisher to stop the sale of it. Taking, however, the whole nature and circumstances of the transaction into their consideration, the Committee deemed them to be of such importance as to require that they should be laid before the House. He wished to be entirely guided by the House with respect to the farther proceeding which it might be advisable to adopt on the subject, his only anxiety being that the privileges of Parliament should not be compromised on the occasion. The first step, however, would be to require the attendance of Mr. Thirlwall in the House. As the reverend gentleman lived at some distance from town, and as he had his clerical duty to perform on Sunday, it might, perhaps, be inconvenient to him to attend on Monday, on which day he should otherwise move for his attendance. He would therefore move

Sir O. Moseley, as a member of the Police Committee, corroborated in every respect the statement which had just been made by the honourable Chairman of that Committee. As he was not a member of that Committee at the time when the reverend gentleman published his book, he was not open to the charge of being influenced by any personal feelings in giving his opinion, that as the passage in question was, in his apprehension, a libel on the Committees and the House, it ought not to be passed over without due reprehension. He must add, that if any thing could exceed the impropriety of the reverend gentleman's evidence, on being called before the Committee to explain his statements, it was the general indecorum of his conduct while before them.

Mr. Lockhart observed, that the House would have ample opportunities of considering whether the work, from which the hon. gentleman had read extracts, was a breach of privilege or not. He was totally unacquainted with the parties in the case; but he could not refrain from noticing the peculiarity of the proceedings in the Committee. They were at least unusual, and indeed, he believed, without precedent. The Committee had entered into the consideration of a breach of privilege. Now he always thought that it was the duty of a Committee of that House, or of an individual member of it, under such circumstances, to make an immediate complaint of the breach of privilege to the House, and to the House alone. He always understood that a Committee of that House could never go beyond its instructions. The Committee in question was instituted to inquire into the Police of the metropolis, and not into the nature of any breach of privilege. Instead of complaining to the House of the breach of privilege committed with respect to them, they called a witness before them, and entered into an investigation of the breach of privilege themselves.

They put questions to this witness not tending to promote the inquiry which they had been appointed to pursue; but to draw from him a confession or a denial of his guilt. He apprehended that Committees of that House were not entrusted with inquisitorial powers of that nature. To him it appeared that it would be extremely dangerous, indeed, if Committees, instead of coming at once to the House, should enter on such investigations. He might be wrong; but he was not aware of any instance on record of such a proceeding. If, as he apprehended, it was contrary to the practice of Parliament, it behoved the House to pause before they agreed to the motion made by the hon. gentleman. He wished also to ask, with what view the hon. gentleman had read the explanation which had been given by the witness of the obnoxious passages in the work? Did he intend to lay it on the table of the House or not? If he did, it came in the shape of evidence heard by a set of gentlemen in a Committee, which had no right to enter into any such examination; to which the House and the House alone was competent. He hoped that some hon. member, more experienced in the usages of Parliament, would favour the House with his opinion on this, to say the least of it, doubtful point.

The Speaker said, he apprehended, that the present was the time at which the House should pronounce, whether the passage in the work adverted to, was or was not a breach of privilege. If not, the author ought not to be called on to attend at the Bar. From what had fallen from the hon. Chairman of the Committee, he did not collect that the Committee had inquired into the actual guilt in that respect of the author of the work. All that the Committee had done, which was not unreasonable, was to ascertain before they complained to the House, whether the party advisedly persisted in the expressions that he used, or whether he was disposed by explanation to do away that which, if unexplained, might be considered by the House a breach of privilege. As matters stood, therefore, it was for the House to determine, aye or no, if there was a prima facie breach of privilege in the reflections which had been cast on the Committee. If the House determined in the affirmative on that proposition, they would order the attendance of the party at the bar; if in the negative, they would proceed no further in the business.

Mr. Calvert observed, that he had very regularly attended his duty as a member of the Police Committee, and that it gave him great satisfaction to witness the attention and ability of the honourable Chairman. It was not a fact that the Chairman sometimes examined witnesses alone. The Committee was in general very fully attended. He (Mr. Calvert) vindicated himself from the passage in Mr. Thirlwall's publication, ascribing to him a wish to have the evidence of Mr. Fox, of Shadwell, on which the private explanation of that gentleman induced him not to insist. The simple fact was, that he asked Mr. Fox whether he came to the Committee to give evidence, to which he replied in the negative.

Mr. Wrottesley merely wished to ask, if it would be improper to defer the motion before them until the alleged libel should be laid on the table, and printed for the consideration of the House?

The Speaker apprehended, that a complaint of breach of privilege must in all cases be disposed of at once. Those who were conversant with parliamentary usages, knew that any publication (generally speaking), reflecting on the proceedings of the House, or of any of its Committees, was a high breach of privilege. The only question for the House to determine was, whether or not the extract, which had been read by the hon. Chairman of the Police Committee, contained such a reflection.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was of opinion, that the motion of the hon. Chairman ought to be acceded to by the House. When the reverend gentleman should attend, it would be for the House to take into consideration any circumstances of extenuation which he might submit to them. All that the Committee had done was, not to extort from the party any improper declaration, but merely to afford him the opportunity of making such an explanation as might induce them to forbear their complaint to the House.

Mr. Wynn contended, that on the very face of the transaction, the House had no discretion to exercise. With respect to any apology that might have been made by the individual in question, the House could take no cognizance of it, for it was not officially before them. It could not consider the explanation of the party, either as an extenuation, or as an aggravation of his conduct, unless that part of the evidence were reported to them by the Committee. There was but one course to pursue, namely to agree to the motion.

Mr. S. Lefevre bore testimony to the temperate, impartial, and judicious manner in which the proceedings of the Committee had been conducted by the hon. Chairman.

Mr. Broderic contended, that the Committee, in the course which they pursued with respect to the subject in question, had not exceeded their authority.

The Speaker suggested to the hon. Chairman of the Committee, that after the present motion should be disposed of, it would be his duty to move, that there be laid before the House so much of the Minutes of Evidence as related to the explanation given in the Committee. The House being in possession of that explanation, and hearing any thing further that the party might have to state at the bar, would then be enabled to come to an ulterior decision on the subject. At present, the only question before them related to the attendance of the party.

The motion for the attendance of Mr. Thriwall on Wednesday was then agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. Bennet it was then ordered, that there be laid before the House a copy of so much of the Minutes of Evidence taken before the Committee as related to the matter complained of.

Mr. Bennet immediately brought up that portion of the Minutes, which was ordered to be printed.

IRISH GRAND JURY PRESENTMENT BILL.]

On the motion of Mr. Cooper, and after a few observations from Mr. Abercrombie, Mr. Prittie, Mr. Ponsonby, Mr. Peel, Mr. V. Fitzgerald, and Sir F. Flood, this bill was ordered to be committed on this day six months. At the same time, Mr. Cooper expressed his intention of bringing on, before the close of the session, some measure to give effect to the material provisions contained in the present bill.

LONDON TITHE BILL.] Sir W. Curtis moved the second reading of a bill which had been introduced for the purpose of providing specific annual stipends, in lieu of tithes, to be raised by rates, in such parishes within the city of London as were not destroyed by the great fire in 1666.—Several petitions had been presented against the bill, which were ordered to lie on the table till it came to be read a second time.

Dr. Phillimore now rose, and objected to the bill, as being repugnant to every principle of sound policy and justice. He recalled to the recollection of the House, that, in the 32d of Henry VIII, an act was passed, entitled "An Act for Tithes for London," the preamble of which expressly stated, that it was "for appeasing the contentions, strifes, and variances, which had risen and grown within the city of London, and the liberties of the same, between the parsons, vicars, and curates of the said city, and the citizens and inhabitants of the same, for and concerning the payment of tithes, oblations, and other duties, within the said city and liberties." The act then stated, that as well the said parsons, vicars, and curates, as the said citizens and inhabitants, had compromised, and put themselves to stand to such order and decree, touching the premises, as should be made by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor of England, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President of the Council, the Chief Justice of England, the Chief Justice of the Common Bench, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and the other persons therein named, "for a final end and conclusion to be had and made touching the premises for ever." "And to the intent to have a full peace and perfect end between the said parties, their heirs and successors, touching the said tithes, oblations, and other duties for ever," it was enacted, "That such end, order, and direction, as should be made, decreed, and concluded by the forenamed archbishop, lords, and knights, or any six of them, before the first day of March then next ensuing, of, for, and concerning the payments of the tithes, oblations, and other duties within the said city, and the liberties of the same, and enrolled in the King's High Court of Chancery of record, shall stand, remain, and be as an act of Parliament, and should bind as well all citizens and inhabitants of the said city and liberties for the time being, as the said parsons, vicars, curates, and their successors for ever, according to the effect, purport, and intent of the said order and decree so to be made and enrolled." In pursuance of this act, a decree was made on the 24th day of February, 1545, that the citizens and inhabitants of the said city of London, and liberties of the same, for the time being, should yearly, without fraud or covin, for ever, pay their tithes to the parsons, vicars, and curates of the said city, and their successors for the time being, after the rate following:—Of every 10s. rent by the year, of all and every house and houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, stables, and every of them within the said city and liberties of the same, 16½d.: and of every 20s. rent by the year, 2s. 9d., and so above the rent of 20s. by the year, ascending from 10s. to 10s., according to the rate aforesaid. And it was also decreed, (among other matters,) that if any variance, controversy, or strife, should thereafter arise in the said city for non-payment of any tithes: or if any variance or doubt arose upon the true knowledge or division of any rent or tithes, within the liberties of the said city, or of any extent or assessment thereof, or if any doubt arose upon any other thing contained within that decree; then, upon complaint made by the party grieved, to the Mayor of the city of London for the time being, the said Mayor, by the advice of counsel, should call the parties before him, and make a final end in the same, with costs to be awarded by the discretion of the said Mayor and his assistants, according to the intent and purport of the said decree. And if the said Mayor should not make an end thereof within two months after complaint, then the Lord Chancellor of England for the time being, upon complaint to him made within three months then next following, should make an end of the same, with such costs to be awarded as should be thought convenient, according to the purport of the said decree. This decree was afterwards enrolled in the High Court of Chancery. What, then, did the motion of the hon. baronet (Sir W. Curtis) go to? It went to repeal a law which had been the established law for nearly three centuries past. After the fire of the city of London, that is to say, in the 22d and 23d Charles II, an act was made, entitled "An Act for the better settlement of the maintenance of the parsons, vicars, and curates, in the parishes of the city of London, burnt by the late dreadful fire there;" the preamble of which states, that "whereas the tithes in the city of London were levied and paid with great inequality, and are, since the late dreadful fire there, in the rebuilding of the same, by taking away of some houses, altering the foundations of many, and the new erecting of others, so disordered, that in case they should not for the time to come be reduced to a certainty, many controversies and suits of law might thence arise." It was therefore enacted, that the tithes of the several parishes, or sums of money in lieu of tithes, should be according to the several sums set against the respective parishes, whose churches had been demolished, or in part consumed; and it was also enacted, that if any variance or doubt should happen to arise about any sum so assessed as aforesaid, then, upon complaint made by the party aggrieved to the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen of the said city, within fourteen days after notice given to the party assessed, of such assessment made, the said Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen, summoning as well the party aggrieved, as the others that made the assessment, should hear and determine the same in a summary way, and the judgment by them given should be final and without appeal: and in any parish or parishes where any impropriations were, the impropriators should pay and allow what really and bonâ fide they had used, and ought to pay to the respective incumbents at any time before the fire; and the same should be esteemed and computed as part of the maintenance of such incumbent, notwithstanding that act, or any clause, matter, or thing therein contained. This act, therefore, was a particular act, growing out of necessity, and was limited to that necessity. The former act, and the decree made thereupon, had settled all disputes between the clergy of London and their respective parishioners. This decree, he repeated, had been duly enrolled, and courts of justice had ever since governed their decisions according to its purport. For these reasons, he should certainly feel it his duty to move, that the bill be read a second time on this day six months.

Sir J. Shaw observed, that there had been nothing but disputes between the clergy and their parishioners from time immemorial. He entered into the hardship suffered by some of the citizens of London under the existing law; and contended that the present bill would prevent the recurrence of such disputes.

Sir W. Scott said, that the present bill was at variance with every principle of law and justice. The decision of the arbitrators appointed agreeably to the statute of Henry the 8th, had been duly enrolled and acted on from that time to the present. The law was formed on the express application of the parties concerned. The property now attempted to be called in question was guarded and fenced by as strong security as there could be around any property whatever. Part of it was in the hands of lay impropriators, and could not be considered as differing from any other property. The present bill was neither more nor less than telling the lay impropriators and incumbents, that they were in future to be shut out from all courts of justice, and to be entirely at the mercy of the magistrates of the city of London, persons for whom he had the greatest respect, but who would be acting as judges in their own cause.

Mr. Alderman Atkins instanced the case of one parish, the half of which was in Middlesex and paid only 130*l.* a year, whereas the other half, in the city of London, paid upwards of 4,000*l.* a year. He contended that this was not the first time Parliament had interfered between the clergy of London and their parishioners. In many of the parishes the citizens were labouring under the severest privations.

Sir J. Graham opposed the bill, and said, that the payment in lieu of tithes was not a tax, but an undivided seventh part of the property. The fact was, that at present the lay impropriators and incumbents did not exact the full amount of their rights, for instead of receiving 2*s.* 9*d.* which they were entitled to, they did not receive more on the average than 10*d.* in the pound. They would, however, be very much in the wrong, after what had passed, if they did not levy the uttermost farthing. The most vexatious opposition had been made to the fair claims for tithes, and many persons in the city had entered into long suits with the tithe-holders, at the same time boasting that they supported the expenses out of the interest of the arrears which they withheld.

Mr. Butterworth had heard it remarked, that property in London had been purchased under the contemplation of the payment of 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound. The contrary was the fact. He had some years ago purchased freehold property in the city of London, and he then paid a small commutation in lieu of tithes;—a short time after, the churchwarden purchased the impropriation for 4,000*l.* and demanded a rate, which if it had been paid, would have produced 4,000*l.* a year. He should support the bill, hoping the House would not allow an obsolete act to be revived, which would operate so unjustly towards a large class of persons.

Mr. W. Smith said, that so far from its being true that property had been purchased in contemplation of the payment of the high rate now demanded by the tithe-holders, he believed it could be proved, that in no one instance had this advanced rate ever been paid. Many persons had indeed purchased property in contemplation of the former rate, which had continued about the same from time immemorial. It was quite consistent with the ordinary practice of the Legislature to restrain extravagant rights which might be set up to the annoyance of the public. By the 49*d.* of Eliz. Lords of Manors were restrained from taking fines, amounting to more than two years' purchase, who had previously a right to fines uncertain. He should therefore vote for a committee to inquire into the merits of the case.

Mr. Gordon said, if persons had purchased tenements without inquiring into the claims for tithes which might be made upon them, that neglect should not operate to destroy the right of the tithe-holder. This was not like the act of the 42 Eliz. a measure affecting the whole of the kingdom, but a local bill, which might be drawn into precedent to the injury of other holders of tithes. If a modus was pretended to be established, or if the registration of the award under the statute of Henry VIII. were disputed, those were questions to be settled in a court of law. It was remarkable that two parishes were omitted in the schedule of the bill, one of which, he understood, was the property of the city of London. (Hear.)

Sir W. Curtis explained. The two parishes omitted in the schedule, were not the property of the City, but of Christ's and Bartholomew's Hospitals. The reason they were omitted was, that they exacted only 2½*d.* instead of 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound.

SCOTCH MADHOUSE BILL.] Lord Binning said, that owing to some objections to this bill, he wished it to be read a second time, to be printed, and to stand over.

The bill was read a second time, and committed for the 23*d.* of May.

FINANCE REPORT.] The House having resolved itself into a Committee to consider the First Report of the Committee of Finance,

Mr. D. Gilbert rose and said, that he had always been adverse to the existence of those blemishes in our system to which this Report referred, and, therefore he had voted for their abolition upon both the Bills brought forward by his hon. friend (Mr. Banks). He disapproved not only of the existence of sinecures, but of the arrangement of those offices from which, while they were entirely executed by deputy, the principals derived considerable salaries. His disapprobation of sinecures rested upon what he conceived good grounds—they were originally instituted through caprice, and when they fell in they were too often disposed of without any consideration for public services. They were also frequently granted in reversion, and thus a great abuse appeared to him to take place not only in burthening the public but in supporting a system of favouritism. But another and a material objection to sinecures arose out of the general understanding that the country was decidedly hostile to their existence, and this hostility was known not to have been engendered by the circumstances of the present crisis, but to be of long, very long, duration. This hostility too, it must be recollected, was sanctioned by the decisions of that House upon the Bills brought forward by his hon. friend and both those bills were carried almost unanimously.—Recollecting, then, those decisions, and considering the principles upon which they were grounded, he did not expect that any serious opposition would be made to the Report which he held in his hand. He was, however, given to understand, that some gentlemen disapproved altogether of the recommendation of the Report, while others thought that some additional offices should be abolished. With regard to the former, he concurred with their opinion as to the respect due to the principle of vested rights, but yet he could not admit that that principle applied to offices which, although originally of small amount, had afterwards from some casualty become productive of large salaries or emoluments; nor was there any deviation from this principle proposed in the Report, which was meant to operate when the vested rights ceased to exist. Therefore the principle of vested rights was religiously preserved by this Report. But the Committee, in recommending the abolition of sinecures, felt it their duty to propose some such substitute as should secure the means of a due reward for public services, by a system of pensions, which he did not think it necessary to detail, as the Report had been so long printed, and in the hands of every member. As to the course which he meant to pursue with a view to carry the purposes of the Report into execution, he was led, upon consulting those who were best competent to judge, to propose several bills, rather than attempt to consolidate all the objects in one bill. Such a consolidation would indeed, as he understood, be impracticable, in consequence of the different nature of the several offices referred to. For instance, the offices of the two Chief Justices in Eyre were quite sinecures; but some duties were attached to the office of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, as well as to that of Governor of the Isle of Wight, which duties, however, were performed by deputies. The former, therefore, should be abolished altogether, while, with respect to the two latter, it would be right to make some provision for the discharge of the duties annexed to them. The arrangement which the Report had in view would, he had no doubt, give general satisfaction to the country, although he was aware that no immediate saving could be effected. But although no immediate reduction of the public burthens would result from the measures which the Report proposed, yet, the adoption of these measures would afford a good earnest of the disposition of Parliament to satisfy the public mind, and to make every practicable effort for the reduction of the public expense; and if those measures were objected to, because their adoption would produce no immediate saving, he would say to those who made the objection, that they might on the same principle object to the system of the Sinking Fund, because it did not immediately reduce the public burthens, although it had a natural and inevitable tendency to produce that benefit.—The hon. member concluded with proposing that the Chairman should be instructed to move for leave to bring in a bill for the “Abolition of the offices of Justices in Eyre.”

Mr. Boswell said, that, as an humble but zealous individual, he implored the House to proceed with anxious and trembling steps in these measures. He had read the Report throughout, and felt constrained to imagine only two grounds for it: one was, the supposed great influence of the Crown; the other, that the state of the finances required some strong measure like this to indicate the disposition of Parliament to economy. He believed, and would openly declare it, that the influence of the Crown was not too great. At no period of our history had it been less. It had gradually diminished ever since 1782. He was satisfied there never was within those walls, a more independent, or, to use an expression commonly applied to that subject, a more unmanageable House of Commons, (Laughter); and they were so, notwithstanding all the usual influence, and even the adventitious circumstances of a state of war, which had affected their election: any change should, therefore, be contemplated with much caution and considerable suspicion. Our political establishment was an intricate and complicated machine, which must not be wantonly touched or rashly altered. To the proposed measure he objected farther, that it substituted pensions for offices. He would submit, that a pension was by no means so gratifying to the feelings of any honourable man as an office hallowed by long custom. The saving proposed was remote and insignificant; half a generation must pass away before any saving could revert to the public, and then it might, perhaps, amount to some such sum as 2,000/; while, on the other hand, pensions were to be granted after a long period of service had been gone through. This was a very unsuitable mode of bestowing rewards. Surely there were better ways of ascertaining merit than time of service. Brilliant talents and splendid exertions deserved and claimed reward independently of length of time in which they were displayed. Gentlemen who would thus restrict rewards did themselves great wrong. He would suppose, with reference to the hon. gentlemen on the other side, who so strenuously and perseveringly exerted their great talents to promote the welfare of their country, that the Prince's eyes were suddenly opened (Laughter) to perceive the justice of their principles, and the meritoriousness of their conduct; and would it not be extremely hard that his Royal Highness should be restrained for five years from bestowing any reward upon such merit? The tendency of this measure, so far as corruption was supposed to affect men's minds, would be to increase that corruption. It would influence them to cling to office, since the power of rewarding them was so much restricted. The effect of the measure, besides, in increasing the pension list, was most seriously objectionable. (The hon. gentleman here proceeded into a calculation, that when 27,000*l.* was reduced in sinecures, 160,000*l.* would be added to the pension list; but objections having been made by those near him to the accuracy of the calculation, he dropt that view of the subject.) He objected to the abolition of Warden of the Cinque-Ports, because that office was suited to the dignity of gentlemen who had eminently served their country, and because he held a general control and superintendence in the district of the Cinque-Ports. But there was one office proposed to be abolished, which he, as a Scotchman, felt himself bound to support and maintain. It was that of Lord Justice-General. This office was founded on statutes and principles that could not be challenged. The act of Car. II. sec. 2. cap. 18. empowered the Lord Justice Clerk (that is, the clerk of the Lord Justice-General) and the other lords of justiciary, to judge in all matters criminal, and this superseded the necessity of the Lord Justice-General's presence on all occasions. And the articles of the Union explicitly recognized that office as one of the offices in Scotland that were to be continued. He was confident that every Scotchman would feel pride and satisfaction in the continuance of those offices that connected themselves with the independence of his country. He could not, therefore, consent to the proposed regulations of this high office; for they, in fact, would make the Lord Justice-General walk into the Civil Court, which was just as absurd as if they had ordered Lord Ellenborough to go from the King's Bench into the Court of Common Pleas. But he would not object to ordering the noble duke (the Duke of Montrose) who held that office, to preside in the court; let that be done, if it was thought necessary: his objection was to the abolition of the office; he would contend, that they were precluded by the articles of the Union from abrogating any office of that nature in Scotland.—He concluded by observing, that, humble as he was, he would most strenuously oppose the measure in every stage.

Lord Castlereagh commenced by saying, that though he had on a former occasion, when a bill somewhat similar to the one now proposed went through the House, stated his objections to the principle and object of the measure, he was willing to give his support to the bill now before them. He was one of those that distinguished between the old system of administration and the state of things that arose from the war. The power of the Crown, he would admit, had increased since the war began, but on the return of peace, when the war establishments were reduced, though things could not be restored to the state in which they were before 1792, the power of the Crown had been more than proportionably diminished. He denied that the patronage of the Crown was excessive. It was not increased so much as the concurrent circumstances in the frame and action of society required. It was for this reason that he would give his support to the present measure, because it did not bear upon the influence of the Crown; and it was on the same principle that he did not agree with the bill brought in by an hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Banks.) That bill went to augment the burdens of the country. According to the general scope and principles of that bill, whenever 27,000*l.* were reduced of sinecures, 130,000*l.* were added to the burdens of the people. The proposed measure was not liable to any such objections. It reduced sinecures on the death of their present holders, and thus recognized vested property; a principle which was always to be held inviolable. It gave to the Crown power of immediate operation; for when 2,000*l.* fell in, it was then allowed to grant rewards to those who should be found entitled to them. The hon. gentleman behind him (Mr. Boswell) had objected, that the pension-list would be increased by this mode. This would not be the case. By no possibility of construction could it be contended that the pensions would amount to a sum approaching to the sum reduced. When 42,000*l.* were withdrawn, it could not by any possibility be found that more than 39,000*l.* should be given away in pensions. These 39,000*l.* had also to be reduced according to the number of persons who may have died in the mean time, and also according to the number of persons who may return again to office; so that a large portion of this sum must always be, as it were, in abeyance. Upon viewing all the aspects of this branch of the subject, the presumption was, that above 30,000*l.* would never be bestowed in pensions according to this plan. Beyond this part the hon. gentleman did not seem to have read the Report. The pensions were to be in a progressive scale in point of time; so that in 12 years, only the sixth part of the money that was to fall in would be given in pensions, as none could be bestowed till two years had elapsed. Upon these grounds, he thought one objection he had entertained against the bill formerly introduced upon this subject was removed, as the amount of pensions was brought under some regulation, and a minor scale of pensions was adopted, while the lapse of time after leaving office was greater. Another great objection he had felt to the measure, as proposed by the hon. gentleman opposite, (Mr. Burke,) was the false notion it seemed to countenance, that any material relief could be afforded to the public by the abolition of sinecures. A gross delusion had been most industriously propagated on this subject. He was sure the hon. gentleman had not contributed to that delusion: but it was studiously inculcated, that sinecures were the source of great burdens to the public. Now the whole amount of sinecures did not exceed 100'000*l.* Suppose all these were swept away, and those most essential branches of administration connected with this support were abolished, it could not bear essentially upon the state of the country, or relieve the burdens of the people. What amount could really be reduced by the present measure he could not estimate; but it was not liable to the same objections, inasmuch as it did not profess to relieve pressing burdens by the abolition of sinecures. With respect to the patronage of the Crown, it would indeed be a strong objection to the measure if it were adverse to the influence of the Crown, and proposed any effectual restriction upon it. It would be a strong objection, if it merely went to abolish sinecures; for then the public would be deprived of a most powerful means of exciting and stimulating great and beneficial exertions. But since he formerly opposed a similar measure, motives had grown up which induced him to give his support to the abolition of sinecures. Industrious and corrupt exertions were made to delude the public upon this subject, and they were made to suppose, that if sinecures were abolished, distress would instantly vanish, and relief would be effectually obtained. There was a general impression and delusion, that certain offices occasioned all the distress and difficulty of the country. This delusion was connected only with the ultimate and insulated effects of a principle most sound and just in itself: but the delusive impression was by no means regulated by or made commensurate with the extent of its pretended cause. Certain offices had, indeed, through long continuance and change of circumstances, become overgrown. The principle was good, but long continuance produced circumstances that required some reform. There were two, or at most, three of this kind. These he had alluded to at the beginning of the session; and the voluntary resignation of an honourable and disinterested nobleman had relieved this question of difficulties that could not easily be removed. He, therefore, congratulated the gentleman opposite upon the success of his measures, and the abolition of all sinecures. At any rate, there was such a distaste for sinecures, that the abolition was salutary, and would go to destroy the rooted objections of many, and the delusion of the public; and it would gratify a portion of virtuous feeling in the nation, since feeling gentlemen had entertained a distaste (a laugh) for sinecures. It was very desirable to correct the false expectations spread respecting this subject, and the present measure would have that effect. It would not be a great saving; but, sinecures being bad in principle, it would operate as a cure to the impression and delusion that had gone abroad. Upon those grounds the measure would have his best and most effectual support. With respect to economy, the measure could not effect much in that view; but it would afford a satisfactory pledge that every thing practicable was done for the relief of public burdens. If the House of Parliament supported and sanctioned this measure, it would dispel the wide-spread and mischievous delusions that prevailed. This was the great and decisive recommendation of the measure. As to time being made the criterion of services to be rewarded with pensions, he thought that time prevented the operation of favour and the suspicion of its operation. Eminent services were entitled to reward independently of time of service, yet even these could not often be ascertained without a considerable space of time for their display. In services of a ministerial nature, time was necessary to entitle them to reward; the qualifications were to be estimated either by time or at discretion. It was far better to make time of service the criterion, than to leave it to discretion. He was ready to admit that there was nothing to be deprecated more than a system of pensions; but he could not believe that there could exist any species of suspicion that honourable and cultivated minds, that had risen to office through the most arduous course of labour and duty, would be swayed by the prospect of any little reward they might be judged entitled to when they quitted office. The most eminent public services were not thus rewarded at once. Two years was the shortest period of service that could be found entitled to a pension. Under all the difficulties—for he felt that, from the sentimental tone of mind (a laugh) of gentlemen upon this subject, there were difficulties attending it; yet upon the whole he would give it his best support. The measure was judiciously framed as to the amount and distribution of the money. There was liberality towards the Crown in affording means of rewarding services. There was economy towards the public as it abolished sinecure offices. He would assure the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Banks) that his bill was carefully consulted in drawing up the present bills, and adopted so far as the objections he had already mentioned permitted; he, therefore, again congratulated the hon. gentleman on his success. He most anxiously hoped, and he would say for all his hon. colleagues, that they most anxiously hoped, that this measure would meet with the approbation and support of that House. The great objects to be attained were, the regulation of pensions by the sanction of the Legislature, the purification of public opinion from the poison infused into it by artful and mischievous misrepresentations: the Legislature, by its authority, would protect the public mind from the insidious delusion which was practised upon it. He was aware that the original impression was not easily effaced, yet the interposition of Parliament, by such a measure as the present, would affect the public mind, and counteract the progress of the poison with which it was infected. Upon these grounds the measure would have every support in his power.

Mr. J. P. Grant had heard the hon. chairman, he had heard another hon. gentleman, and he had heard the noble lord, with every attention in his power; but he entertained a widely different opinion from them all on this subject. He must give the noble lord credit for good fortune, in having got the measure reduced into such a convenient form; but he could not congratulate the hon. gentleman near him, in the success of his bill; far less could he congratulate him on the satisfaction this measure would give to the country. It would afford no degree of satisfaction to any independent mind in that House, or to any intelligent individual in the nation. Least of all could he congratulate the House or the country upon the reasons by which the noble lord supported the measure, and the degree of support he gave to it. Its recommendations were, that it did not in the slightest degree affect the influence of the Crown; that it effected no economy, though that was the most important consideration at the present period. What then were the motives that induced the noble lord to give it his support? Why, because the measure was adapted to the poisoned public mind. It was not by reason, by argument, by conviction, or any such means, that the poisoned mind of the public was to be cured. The noble lord went willingly along with prejudices which he represented as pernicious, and gladly availed himself of the poisoned feeling that existed in the nation. He must therefore congratulate the noble lord; he was the only person in the nation entitled to congratulation. He was the more decidedly of this opinion, when he recollected the purposes for which the committee had been appointed. It was, if he had not misconceived the object, (for he had not been in the House at the time), to ascertain the state of our income and expenditure, in order to recommend the best measures to be adopted in the frightful situation into which the country had fallen. At the first part of the session the noble lord hurried forward, so that he superseded on the occasion the gentleman who was naturally expected to take the lead, to institute a committee to inquire into the circumstances of our situation, and to devise some mode of relief. The estimates of the year were last session found inadequate to the permanent establishment proposed. He had himself, after a minute calculation, found the deficiency to be upwards of 18 millions. This statement the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not venture to contradict; he did not venture to express any opinion of the incorrectness of such a representation. Now, then, came the investigation into the difficulties and resources of the country. Three months, wanting three days, had the committee been occupied with this subject, and the result of their long and painful investigation was this report! Here was their first-born, after a long period of gestation and many throes! What, he would ask, had they a right to expect after so long an investigation? First of all, a balance of our income and expenditure; so that we might be informed of our real situation, and be enabled to judge what reductions were indispensably necessary. Instead of that, we had a recommendation of the reduction of small sinecure offices, and, together with that, the army estimates. He supposed in the next Report we should have the ordnance estimates, and, in a third Report, the navy estimates. Was it this that the country, was it this that Parliament, was it this that any reasonable person expected? Was the expectation of any one satisfied with this Report? He would appeal to the noble lord if this was the measure proposed at the beginning of the session, at least the measure he led the House to expect as the result of the investigation. He would ask the noble lord if the committee were not appointed to inquire into the income and expenditure of the country, and not to spend their time in the way that they had done? They had been going over the ground that other committees had trod before them; and recommending paltry savings instead of executing the business intrusted to them. He (Mr. G.) could not forget that other committees had been appointed for the purpose, and nearly in the words of the appointment of this committee; but the course they pursued was very different, and much more praiseworthy. They took into their consideration the whole state of our financial affairs, they made extensive inquiries and luminous reports, and brought the situation of the country fully before the House. There was a committee appointed, he believed, in 1786, that produced a Report in the course of a fortnight; and another in 1791, that brought the first-fruits of its inquiries before the House in a month. How different was the conduct and character of the present committee! It had now sat for three months, and all the evidence that it had given of its activity and usefulness was this paltry Report. What were the objects that it professed to have in view, and how had it executed them? In comparing its conduct with its instructions, it was remarkable that it began at the latter end of its commission. It was appointed, in the words of the order, to "inquire into and to state the income and expenditure of the United Kingdom, for the year ending the 5th of January, 1817, and also to consider and state the probable income and expenditure for the years ending the 5th of January, 1818 and 1819, and to report the same, together with their observations; and also to consider what farther measures may be adopted for the relief of the country from any part of the said expenditure." Forgetting that the former part of its instruction was the most important, this committee began with recommending the abolition of a few sinecures, which had already been inquired into by former commissions and embraced in a former bill of abolition. He would not go into observations on all the offices mentioned in the Report, but he could not help alluding to a few, and the reasons stated for dealing with them as the committee had done. The first two sinecures that attracted notice were the two Chief Justiceships in Eyre, north and south of the Trent; and the ground on which their abolition was recommended was very remarkable. The committee did not condescend to give a reason for their opinion and advice: they merely said, that the view which the committee have taken of those offices is, that they may be abolished. (A laugh.) Conceiving that this absence of all reasons was a very good reason for abolishing the Justiceships in Eyre, the committee proceeded to the Exchequer, and report that reasons of a like nature exist for abolishing the office of the auditor and the four tellers. It had been before stated in Parliamentary Reports, that the Auditorship of the Exchequer was an important office, for discharging the duties of which it might be necessary to provide in some other way, if the office was abolished; but this committee did not hesitate about the matter. They decided that the Justiceships in Eyre ought to be abolished without assigning a reason for the measure; and then reported that, for the same reason, the office of Auditor of the Exchequer ought not longer to remain. (A laugh.) The Wardenship of the Cinque-ports, and the Governorship of the Isle of Wight, next came under the review of the committee, and were recommended to be abolished for the same reasons—that is, the view of the committee was that they were to be abolished: this view composed the reason why the Exchequer offices were to be abolished, and then this reason again became a rule for the rest. (Hear, and a laugh.) The committee in their investigations then proceeded to the second joint Paymaster of the Army, and recommended its abolition, because “it was wholly inefficient and useless with regard to all the duties belonging to the army.” Here at last there was something like a satisfactory reason given for the recommendation of the committee. The inutility to the public service of a place of emolument seemed to be sufficient grounds for its discontinuance. Having found out a reason at last, however, they carried it too far, and recommended, as a matter of course, the abolition of the Deputy Paymaster-general. This did not by any means follow, for a right hon. friend of his (Mr. Tierney) had lately recommended the abolition of a principal office, (third Secretary), though he had no objections to the continuance of the deputy or acting officer. The committee had recommended the abolition of one of the joint Paymasters-general of the Army, because to one of them there was no duty to be performed; but they afterwards relaxed in the application of this principle, and retained two joint postmasters-general for England and Ireland; for this good reason, because this office did not appear to your committee to come under the general description of those offices which form the subject of this Report. (A laugh.) Surely the same reason which made it inexpedient to continue two joint paymasters-general of the army, applied equally to the abolition of one of the postmasters-general, where a greater saving might be effected with as slight a detriment to the public service.—The hon. gentleman next adverted to the offices recommended to be abolished in Scotland. The office of Keeper of the Privy Seal was to be continued at a salary of 1,000*l.*; but no reason was stated for this recommendation, except the pleasure of the committee. There could be no ground given why this useless and expensive sinecure should be retained. Whatever reasons existed for abolishing the rest applied equally to this. He then came to the office of Lord Justice-general of Scotland, to the abolition of which an hon. gentleman (Mr. Boswell) had strongly objected; but he (Mr. G.) saw no reasons for his alarm, as the dignity was not to be lost, but united with its rank, title, and privileges to the office of President of the Court of Session. In going to Ireland he could not but admire the manner in which the sinecures there were disposed of. The offices of no less than four officers, namely, of the Surveyor-General of Crown Lands, of the Keeper of the Records of Birmingham Town, of the Keeper of the Records of Parliament, and of the Clerk of the Paper-office, were to be executed by a public building. (Hear, and a laugh.) “These offices (says the Report) may be transferred to the building which has been constructed for the custody of the public records of Ireland.” The building was here to supersede the sinecureists, (a laugh.), by the recommendation of this economical committee.—The hon. gentleman then stated the sums that might be saved by carrying into effect the abolitions recommended by the committee, as compared with the expenditure to be incurred by the pensions to be created by the recommendation of the same committee. The whole savings, making allowance for the payment of deputies in offices where the deputy was to be continued, would amount to only 51,171*l.*; and in lieu of this means of rewarding public service, if it were taken away, the committee recommended the substitution of a pension list, which would cost 42,000*l.* Out of this small saving of 9,000*l.*, how much, he would ask, would remain to the public after the remunerations that would be given by the Treasury? Nothing would, in fact, be effected but a small saving in Ireland, and that would only take place after the death of 120 persons. Thus the public would be benefitted by the measure advised by the committee 40,000*l.*, at the expiration of the existing interests of 120 individuals; allowing that they died out in 40 years. At the arrival of that period our situation would be so much bettered; but, in the mean time, at the end of the two first years, 9,000*l.* might be given in pensions; at the end of four years, 18,000*l.*; and so on till we arrived at 12 years from this, when the system would be in full operation, and when, consequently, 39,000*l.* or 41,000*l.* would be given away in pensions. (Hear, hear.) He would leave the country to judge of this species of economy. (Hear, hear.)—Adverting to the question of the influence of the Crown, the hon. gentleman could not but say, that it had increased, and ought to be diminished. Its activity had been strikingly manifested within these few years. He was desirous not to see it farther extended. It was unfortunately not now confined to Parliament, but was diffused over all parts of the country. (Hear, hear.) He was not desirous of currying favour with the people, flattering their prejudices, or pretending to yield to their unreasonable demands, when their minds were poisoned, as had been the avowed object of a noble lord to night; but he would say, and he said it with perfect conviction, that he believed them generally right when no means were employed to delude them; and that their conclusions might be relied on as those of truth and justice, so far as their knowledge of facts extended. They had called for economy and retrenchment; and their voice ought to be attended to. They should be undeceived as to their situation and the arts employed to mislead them. They should be told that an incapable government, which had brought the country to the verge of national bankruptcy, did not deserve to regain their lost confidence and esteem by pretending to yield to their prayers, and instead of substantial, universal, and rigorous economy, claiming their praise for a paltry saving of a few thousands. (Hear, hear.) Instead of entitling the Administration to any credit, the present measure was, in his opinion, sufficient to excite a prejudice against it. (Hear, hear.) Any man who looked at the finances of the country would see sufficient cause of alarm, which this paltry measure would do nothing to remove. He knew that there were reductions proposed; he knew that the estimates were curtailed, but still there was a great defalcation in the revenue to meet the expenditure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had last year taken, in the ways and means, the surplus of the consolidated fund at three millions; but instead of realizing this surplus, there was this year a deficit of more than three millions and a half. The only disposable revenue for the service of the year was the land and malt tax, and other items, that would not amount to more than six millions. He need scarcely say any thing more to shew the deplorable state of our finances, than that the whole of the national income was not much more than sufficient to pay the interest of our debt, without leaving any thing for the support of our establishment, or the payment of civil services; that our taxes could not be increased with any kind of exertion; and that the people were scarcely able to support their present burdens. (Hear, hear.) Was he asking too much, therefore, when he besought them to pause and consider what they were doing?—when he asked the House not to intrust the examination of the public accounts with a committee who had yet proceeded not a step in their duty, and would only delude the country by bringing in bills at the end of the session, when the House was thin, and the measures could not be deliberately examined. He was not disposed to despair of the country if its Government were in abler hands. (Loud cries of hear on the Opposition benches.) This incapable Government should know, that there have existed examples of a Government successful in its foreign measures, and apparently prosperous, which had yet the canker of decay in its vitals, and was fast hastening to ruin. (Hear, hear.) A Government whose expenditure was so disproportioned to its income as ours was at present, was in a state of great danger, and could only be freed from it by a radical change of measures.—The hon. gentleman begged pardon of the House for extending his observations to such a length, and thanked it for the indulgence with which he was heard. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh explained. The honourable gentleman seemed to have misunderstood him, both with regard to what he said on the influence of the Crown, and the extent of the saving that would be effected by the measures recommended by the Committee.

Mr. Huskisson was at a loss to see, how those who supported the former sinecure bills could oppose this. (Hear.) He thought the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Grant), whose speech was so cheered by his friends on the other side, and who now, for the first time after the Easter recess, came to attend his duty in Parliament, was not just the person who would have come forward to accuse the committee of slowness in their motions, or negligence in their functions. (Hear, hear, on the Ministerial benches.) It was, however, probably a wise policy to put the hon. and learned gentleman in the front rank on this occasion; it was not probably convenient for his friends, who were present on former discussions, to occupy the ground which he now assumed. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. H.) remembered when a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Tierney), whom he did not now see in his place, recommended the very thing which his hon. and learned friend had now reprobated; and expressed a fear that that would be done which his hon. friend now censured the committee for not doing. (Hear.) He recollected when that right hon. gentleman said, that a finance committee on such an occasion would be of no use—it would merely attend to some matters of figures, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would come to it with papers and accounts in his pockets, which would not fail to receive its sanction. That right hon. gentleman therefore recommended the committee to begin with useless offices (hear, hear); to look into them and abolish them first. He had not only done so, but he had been seconded by the voice of the country. Some hundreds of petitions were laid on the table of the House, the burden of whose complaint was sinecures. To them were traced all the calamities which the country endured, and all the corruption which the petitioners reprobated. (Hear, hear, hear, from the Ministerial benches.) He would only refer the hon. and learned gentleman to the petitions that had been laid on the table of the House, as he was not present himself to hear them read. The public mind had been poisoned on the subject of sinecures. The committee, therefore, to counteract this delusion, began with sinecures. They did not enter into all the details of office, because former committees had by their reports rendered this unnecessary. They did not consider the history of those places, for instance, what were their former duties, why the duties had fallen off, or the emoluments become disproportioned to the payment of the labour they enjoined. The learned gentleman had criticised the Report in a style of pleasantry which he thought entirely misapplied, from an inadvertence to this circumstance. The hon. and learned gentleman shewed that he had not much studied the reports to which he referred, otherwise he would have seen the irrelevancy of his observations. Had the honourable and learned gentleman quoted the Report fairly, some of his criticisms would have been spared. Instead of stopping at the words, "the view that your committee have taken of the offices of Chief Justice in Eyre is, that they may be abolished," he should have read on, and he would have found it added, "without detriment to the public service." (A laugh on the Opposition benches.) This whimsical reason given for abolishing four offices in Ireland was produced by a similar omission in the quotation. The officers were not to be transferred to the building; but the documents that were under charge of these officers, by which their places might be abolished. (A laugh.)—The right hon. gentleman then adverted to the question of figures. The hon. and learned gentleman had separated the offices of England, Ireland, Scotland, and the colonies: whereas, in speaking of the saving to the public, they should have been mentioned together, and the amount of their salaries given. He would mention, that in Scotland the saving would be greater by the provisions of this Report, than by the bill of his hon. friend (Mr. Banks) on the other side. The offices were to be reduced as much as they could be, consistently with a due regard to the Articles of the Union. It appeared more consistent to join the title and privileges of the Lord Justice General to the office of Lord President than to consolidate it with that of King's Remembrancer, as was proposed by his hon. friend's bill. The opposition of the hon. gentleman beside him (Mr. Boswell) seemed more natural than that of the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Grant). The Report was important, not so much from its saving to the public purse, but its tendency to remove public prejudices, and to counteract the malignant poison which had been infused into the public mind. It surprised him how any one who advocated popular wishes or feelings could oppose it. The measures it recommended were more restrictive than had ever appeared in any former bill. Formerly the pension list might be carried to 150,000*l.*: now by the provisions of this Report, it could not exceed 42,000*l.* Thus restricted was the principle of profusion and waste. (Hear, hear.) Never did any former plan so limit the means of remuneration to public services. He (Mr. H.) would not enter into the general subject of finance. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition benches.) The documents could not come into the hands of the committee till the 5th of April, and consequently the deficiency of the Consolidated Fund this year could not previously have become a subject of attention. What purpose would it have answered for the committee to have sent in a Report filled with accounts of the public debt, and fixed charges, which could be as well learned from documents on the table as from these reports? They were examining the estimates where a saving might be made, convinced that nothing could have been gained by a bare statement of revenue. The army estimates would be before the House on Wednesday, and by them it would be seen how the committee had been employed. It had been said by the hon. and learned gentleman, that the estimates last year were stated by Ministers to be calculated on a peace establishment. This he denied: it had always been denied on the side of the House to which he belonged, as often as it had been repeated on the other. Our expenditure and income could not be stated till the estimates were examined; so that the conduct of the committee was not so preposterous as the hon. and learned gentleman wished to make it appear. (Hear, hear.)

Sir J. Newport complained that the select committee had sat from the 8th of February to the 27th of March, and had done nothing more at last than copy the provisions of a bill introduced by the hon. member for Corfe-Castle. The suggestion itself, of one Paymaster as sufficient for Ireland, had been before made by that honourable member, and was to be found amongst the recommendations of a former parliamentary commission. So inaccurate was the wording of the Report, that instead of appearing to be a work of time and labour, it bore all the marks of haste and precipitation. Why had not the former parliamentary report, with respect to public offices in Ireland, been honoured with the notice of the committee? That Report was drawn up on the spot, with all the advantages of local knowledge, and it was the duty of the committee, if they did not think proper to adopt it, to shew in what points it was defective or erroneous. He was satisfied that the pension-lists of the three countries were quite adequate to the remuneration of all the ordinary services of Government, especially in this time of general distress, and for every purpose, except those special cases of merit which ought to be brought under the consideration of the House.

Mr. Marryat was desirous of calling the attention of the committee to one topic, which had scarcely been at all touched upon in the course of the discussion—he alluded to the subject of Colonial offices. Although two principles had been acknowledged as applicable to the regulations of all such appointments, they had unfortunately not been carried into practice. In the colony of Demerara, where, under the Dutch government, no sinecures were tolerated and residence was a necessary condition of office, we had established a different principle, and created a sinecure under the name of the vendue master. A variety of emoluments, which poured into the colonial treasury, and would have been sufficient to defray all the expenses of the civil government, had been given to a gentleman who had never visited the settlement. (Hear, hear.) A magistracy and receivership-general had also been created, and the appointment given to a right hon. gentleman, who, far from thinking his profits for doing nothing adequate to his merits, had twice raised his demands on the deputy who fulfilled the duties, and who had intimated that he should, in consequence, be obliged to raise his fees upon the colony. (Hear, hear.) What did not exceed 200*l.* or 300*l.* under the former government, now cost this country between 2000*l.* and 3000*l.* per annum. These abuses attracted great attention in a small community, and had a strong tendency to produce discontent, and to retard the progress of improvement. To protect the interests of the colonies, and to ameliorate the condition of their inhabitants, it was of importance that men of rank and character should be appointed to the chief situations, that European principles should be constantly infused, and that personal residence should be enforced. The greatest advantage which could be conferred upon them would be, to give them good masters and a good example. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Fremantle made a few observations, in which he expressed his objection to the abolition of offices of great antiquity in the Exchequer, which were always held by persons of high rank, to whom the deputies, who discharged the duties, were bound in great pecuniary responsibility.

Mr. Robinson rose only for the purpose of noticing an allusion made by an honourable member (Mr. Murray) to a particular transaction between a principal and deputy, which, when the proper time should arrive, he doubted not would receive an explanation that must satisfy every honourable mind; but he thought it very unfair to intrude these individual cases in a debate upon general principles; and the more unfair, because such cases could not possibly exist any longer, a bill having passed three years ago to compel colonial officers to reside abroad.

Mr. Murray in explanation observed, that he knew not how any argument was to be maintained without particular facts to support it. With regard to the act which had passed for enforcing residence in the colonies, it could only apply to the old colonies, and not to the conquered settlements, in which the offices were necessarily temporary.

Lord Milton said, his objection to the present Report was not that it went too far, but that it did not go far enough, nor was founded on any sound or intelligible principle. He thought the committee might have accomplished more, when he considered the former reports which they had before them, and the light they might have derived from Mr. Burke's celebrated speech upon economical reform. Mr. Burke's plan of retrenchment, in 1782, went much farther than he could induce the House to go along with him; and had he been less thwarted by his opponents on that occasion, much public discontent and irritation would have been prevented. The remarkably slow pace at which the committee had moved, seemed to him to indicate a disposition to do as little as possible, but to do just enough to acquire a little popularity. When the same reforms were formerly proposed by an honourable member (Mr. Banks), they were opposed by the members of this committee. He blamed them for having in their first Report made no distinct statement of the points to which they intended subsequently to direct their attention, not indeed in detail, which would have been impossible, but with regard to all the general branches of the expenditure. He made this observation with a particular reference to the diplomacy of the country, which appeared to him to have increased to an enormous amount. This part of the public service of Germany amounted in 1792 to 17,000*l.*, and in the year 1815 to no less than 38,000*l.* He concurred entirely in the propriety of abolishing the few offices pointed out as no longer necessary, and had only to regret that the committee had done so little, and had confined their attention to scraps and fragments of preceding inquiries.

Mr. D. Gilbert asserted, that he had always supported the sinecure bill introduced by the honourable member for Corfe Castle.

Mr. Tierney assured the committee that he wished to address them for a very short time indeed, upon a subject which had been so fully and ably argued by his honourable and learned friend (Mr. J. P. Grant.) When he said he believed that his honourable friend's observations had received no answer, he acknowledged that he was not in the House during the speech of right hon. gentleman (Mr. Huskisson.) As, however, the hon. gentlemen on the other side seemed to think it a very triumphant answer, he would now afford them an opportunity for its repetition. His opinion of this committee he had already stated, and he would again describe it to be nothing but a screen between economy and the public business of the country. It was now three months since the committee had been appointed, and if economy had been the real object in view, there was not one word of this Report which would be at all conducive to that end. They had nothing to do but to move, that the Report of the committee on sinecures be read, and immediately bring in the very bills that were now to be introduced. The present Report embraced not any one new topic, except the suggestion as to pensions: and this might have been made on the first day of their sitting, as well as at the expiration of 2 or 3 months. He was a member of a former finance committee, and attended one day, when he found the hon. gentleman below him (Mr. Bankes) diligently employed in pressing the principles now recommended by this Report, viz. that all offices in which there was no duty to be performed should be abolished; that where all the duties were discharged by deputy, the office of the principal should be also abolished; and that those offices in which the service and the emoluments were disproportionate should be regulated. The noble lord, (whom he was sorry to see leaving his place, because he feared he would not come back,) refused to hear a word of it; he would listen to no argument, and give no reasons, lest, as he said, it should endanger the measure in the other House. He was not averse to their recommending abolition, provided they abstained from all reasoning in defence of it. He (Mr. T.) was in the habit of finding himself in a minority two or three times a week, but the minorities in the House were as nothing compared to the minorities on such a committee. The noble lord succeeded in a division of sixteen against three, (hear, hear); and he (Mr. T.) refused to attend any longer, because he was sure that he should serve his country better by urging his opinions in that House. It was now proposed to introduce several bills upon the foundation of this Report, but what hope could they entertain that the lords would agree to them separately, and without having the entire subject at once before them? How could they be expected to agree in the first instance to a bill of abolition, without knowing any thing of the bill to come afterwards, giving to the Crown certain compensations for this loss in the means of rewarding public services? Suppose the lords were to appoint a committee of their own to inquire into this subject, the House would be completely turned round, and the whole session entirely lost. He would say nothing more than had been already said as to the bad manner in which the Report was drawn; but with all its defects, he heartily agreed with most of its suggestions; and he thought the country under great obligations (here the Chancellor of the Exchequer bowed): the right honourable gentleman need not bow, he was not alluding to him (a laugh); he gave no credit whatever to Administration for the work, but he thought the public was much indebted to the hon. gent. (Mr. Bankes), who had recommended all these measures five years ago. His hon. friend behind him (Mr. Fremantle) had disapproved of some of the alterations on the ground of the inconvenience they would occasion to the course of Exchequer business. It was true, as had been said, that these offices were of great antiquity, that they were filled by men of high rank, and sometimes abused to the purposes of a gross job; but, with regard to the importance of their being held by such and such individuals, the practice not long since was to give them to children; and we were to trust to Providence that they would grow up fit and qualified for their appointments; a hope which, if not realized, we were content to let them laugh at us, and point to their patent places. When the responsibility of the acting deputy to his principal was referred to, he would ask where was the difficulty in the agent furnishing the same securities to the Government at once? The Committee knew that the auditorship of the Exchequer was now held by perhaps the ablest man in the country, and yet an Act of Parliament had once been passed to enable him to execute its duties by deputy, on account of its incompatibility with the office of First Lord of the Treasury. The House would do well to reflect to what extent the pension list was now carried. The amount of the pensions for England and Scotland, independently of those founded on Parliamentary grants, was 240 or 250,000*l.* This was a great burden on the country, and one to which the attention of the House ought to be seriously directed. Instead of 40,000*l.* which had been proposed as a reduction, he thought the saving in that respect might be very easily carried to the extent of 80,000*l.* He had no wish to deprive the Crown of its necessary patronage; but when he saw numerous pensions granted, for which no public service had been performed, he could not help concluding, that they were employed as the instruments of dirty political jobbing. The House ought to have all the pension lists on the table. With regard to the abolition of sinecures, proposed by the Report, though he must condemn the manner of the thing, it had his approbation in substance: that the Committee should propose to abolish sinecures was perfectly consistent with their duty; but upon what ground did they propose compensations? They would say that they imitated the Sinecure Committee; but that Committee was instructed by the House to consider what offices could be abolished, and what compensation ought to be given on account of such abolition. No such instruction had been given to the present Committee, and of course they very improperly took this part of the business on themselves. In the Bill introduced by the hon. gent. (Mr. Bankes), it was proposed to abolish the office of second Paymaster-General. The present Committee admit, that 2,000*l.* ought not to be paid for nothing, but then they would attach the remuneration to another office, that of the Vice-President of the Board of Trade. He did not know what were now the mighty labours of those offices; but in Lord Grenville's administration, the present Marquis of Buckingham discharged the duties both of the Paymaster and President. Why might not the office of president of the Board of Trade be attached to some other office, as, for instance, that of Master of the Mint? It did not appear that the duties of the Board of Trade were extremely oppressive. The President was now abroad in Holland; in a trading country to be sure, but he was not employed in superintending the trade of this. It had been assumed, that there ought to be two Paymasters-General, because of the great responsibility of that office; but the fact was, that the duties had always been discharged by one, so that the country was, under this head, defrauded of 2,500*l.* a year. This was the spirit in which the Committee had proceeded. It had been said, that the consideration of the public income and expenditure was foreign to the object of the Committee: but he was of a different opinion. He would maintain the contrary proposition as broadly as his honourable and learned friend (Mr. Grant), who had been censured for stating it. The great object of the Committee was to see what savings could be made in order to diminish the expenditure. A right hon. gent. had said, that by and bye the Army Estimates would be before the House; next would come the Navy Estimates, which would be followed by the Miscellaneous Services, and so forth; and then, he said, the House would see the total amount of the demands for the public service. All this he believed was very true; but then, when was it to be done? By the month of June or July, when it will be too late to enter into the full consideration of the subject? And yet nothing was more urgent than that the attention of the House should be directed to that question; for, looking at all the receipts of last year as a rule for estimating those of the present, and taking the expenditure at the estimate of the noble lord, not now in his place, (Lord Castlereagh), there will be a deficiency to be made good of from 14 to 16,000,000*l.* How was this to be accomplished? The Chancellor of the Exchequer would not do his duty if he attempted to tide it over this year as he had former years: with so frightful a prospect before them, not a moment ought to be lost. The House ought to be informed of the measures to which the right hon. gent. proposed to resort in so extraordinary a crisis. He knew of no resources that the treasury had, except the 1,300,000*l.* arrears of the property tax, which the right hon. gent. would not find it easy to collect. He would not surely again hazard the boast of a surplus from the Consolidated Fund. Indeed, of the three millions he asserted he had to receive from that source, it was now confessed that he would have 600,000*l.* to pay. These certainly were fit topics for the investigation of the Committee. The right hon. gentleman seemed to think, that every thing went well with him because the stocks had risen. It was true, that there had been a rise, assisted by statements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in that House, and of Bank Directors, Jews, and others out of it, who had an interest in making the funds "look upwards," as they called it; but no solid relief to the country could be derived from this rise. The right hon. gent. had declared, that he would fund no Exchequer Bills, and that he would have no loan; but to some sort of borrowing or another he must inevitably be compelled to resort. Did he expect the stocks to keep up next year? That was possible, but it was also possible that those gentlemen who had now an interest in making the stocks rise might next year have an interest in making them fall. For his part, he was of opinion, that the funds would continue to rise for a time, but that when the right hon. gent. came to settle his accounts, the fall would be rapid. There was one topic more with respect to the finances on which he must take the liberty of saying a few words. Three or four times in his hearing, but when indisposition did not prompt him to address the House, the noble lord not now in his place had asserted, that he (Mr. T.) had given it as his opinion, that the peace establishment of the army could not be reduced below 19 millions, and then the noble lord, turning round to his friends for applause, entered into a flourish, which amounted to this—"You see what an excellent frugal Administration you have got; an Administration which has reduced the peace establishment to 18 millions instead of the 19, below which it was asserted it could not be carried." Now, all that was very fine on the part of the noble lord, only, unfortunately, he (Mr. T.) had said no such thing. On the occasion alluded to, he had assumed certain data. He had supposed, that the public revenue was to be the same as last year; that various heads of expenditure would also be the same; and that the peace establishment would be 19 millions; but he had never said that it ought not to be carried below that sum. On the contrary, he had declared, and now again declared, that if it was not possible to carry the reduction much farther, the country was in a state of bankruptcy.—He would now conclude by repeating, that he agreed in substance with the measures proposed by the Committee, though he must say that he never knew a Committee appointed by that House which had less efficiently discharged its duty to the country.

The question was then put on the first resolution, which was agreed to.

Mr. Tierney asked when the bills founded on the resolutions would be brought in.

Mr. Gilbert expected that they would be ready to be submitted to the House by to-morrow, or the following day.

The other resolutions, comprehending a variety of bills applicable to various offices, were then agreed to, and the Speaker having taken the chair, the Report was received.

Mr. Gilbert then proceeded to move for leave to bring in bills conformable to the resolutions, and the motions passed without observation, until he came to that, the object of which was to grant "Recompence of services in high and efficient offices," when

Mr. Brougham rose, and said, that though he did not intend to object to the present motion, he wished to state his disapprobation of the measure, in order that he might reserve to himself the right of resisting it in its progress. He, therefore, now gave notice, that he should think it his duty to oppose the bill in all its stages, as it proposed to introduce a new and dangerous principle into the Constitution. It was the first time it had ever been attempted to recognize this system of pecuniary reward, and to declare, that men were to look to high offices in the State for mercenary considerations.

Lord Milton agreed in opinion with his hon. and learned friend. The remuneration proposed was to depend on continuance in office, and was therefore to be a temptation to political profligacy. If persons were thus to be induced to hold places for the sake of political influence, to go on with the loss of honour and character, they could not be respected by the public, and their continuance in office would be a curse to the country. Nothing could be more injurious to the public welfare than a measure which should make the holding of office a mere mercenary object, and on that ground he should consider it his duty to oppose the bill.

Mr. Banks protested against the principle laid down by the two last speakers. Many men were drawn from profitable professions, and induced to accept public employments; and it would be very hard if there were no means of compensating them for the loss they might sustain by changes over which they could have no control. But the principle of the proposed bill was not new, it was recognised in the bill which he had introduced for granting remuneration to persons who had held high offices in the Government, and which both the noble lord and the hon. and learned gent. had supported.

Lord Milton said, it was possible that he might have supported the measures to which the hon. gent. had alluded; but if he had done so, he must now say, that he had altered his opinion. When he saw a good reason for changing his opinion, he would never be ashamed to own it. He was not, however, perfectly certain, that the bill now proposed was the same as the former. The principle of this bill was, that the reward was to depend on continuance in office, and in that respect he conceived it differed from the other.

Mr. Brougham was in Parliament in 1812, when the bill alluded to was brought in, but no separate measure of compensation was then proposed. The object of the bill was the abolition of certain offices, but it contained a clause of compensation to the holders. He, for his part, was content at that time to let the bill pass with the clause rather than lose the great object of abolishing sinecures; he was obliged to agree to the one for the sake of the other, but the case was very different when a distinct bill for compensation was introduced; a shape in which the proposition had never before been submitted to Parliament.

Mr. Canning voted for the bill of 1812, and he well recollected, that that bill had for its object not only the abolishing of offices, but the granting of compensations. The hon. and learned gent. had certainly a right to oppose the bill now moved for, and to change his opinion when he pleased; but no artifice of eloquence could reconcile his present with his past opinion, or give him a claim to consistency on this question. The noble lord (Milton) had acted with more candour. He had, with a proper manliness, declared, that he had changed his sentiments. The hon. and learned gent. might also change his; but he had no right to characterise the present measure as something new and dangerous.

Mr. Brougham thought he had made himself perfectly understood. He had distinctly stated the ground on which he had agreed to the former bill, though it contained a clause respecting compensations which he disapproved.

Mr. Ponsonby did not think that any artifice of eloquence was necessary to prove the consistency of his hon. friend. The bill contained two objects; and all that he had said was, that when they were presented together, he was willing to take the one for the sake of the other. The case was very different when the objectionable proposition was brought forward in a distinct shape. It was, however, very natural that the right hon. gent. should be an advocate for the right of changing opinion: the right hon. gent. knew that he had changed his own in a very signal manner—changed it in order to accept office under a noble lord, whom he had intimated against, with the view of expelling him from the cabinet, on the ground that he was unfit for his high office. It was, of course, no way surprising that the right hon. gent. should be very friendly to changes of opinion. He has already made some remarkable changes, and a day perhaps was not far distant when he might find it convenient to change again. (Hear, hear.) For his own part, he had to declare, that his opinion on this question had undergone no change. He was still for abolishing sinecures, and accompanying the abolitions with compensations. There was not only a great prejudice against sinecures, but also against those who held them, and they could not be got rid of too soon. With regard to pensions, however, the public could never be deceived as to the amount of the emoluments received by those on whom they were bestowed. The state of the pensions ought to be always clearly before the public; and with that view he intended soon to move for lists of all the pensions granted in England, Ireland, and Scotland, and from the four-and-a-half per cent. fund. It would then be distinctly seen, if the motion should be carried, to what extent the patronage of the Crown went with respect to pensions. (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought the House must acknowledge, that the right hon. gent. had defended his own consistency much better than that of the hon. and learned gent. near him; but it was extraordinary that in attempting that defence, he should find it necessary to make an attack on his right hon. friend (Mr. Canning). The hon. and learned gent. had singularly failed in his part of the defence; for if he disapproved of the clause for compensation in the former Bill, he might have moved to separate the two objects in the Committee, and thus have saved his consistency. With regard to the motion of which the right hon. gent. had given notice, he had no disposition to object to it. It was the wish of Government to give every information on the pension list, and on all subjects connected with the expenditure of the country. In reply to what had fallen from an hon. and learned gent. (Mr. Grant), he had to observe, that he had not entered into the financial situation of the country, because he expected that in a very few days an opportunity would arise for the full consideration of that subject. He should, in a few days, bring under the notice of the House, a proposition relative to an alteration in the Consolidated Fund, in doing which he would have to take a detailed view of the finances.

Mr. Tierney heard with some astonishment the intelligence given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that a new report regarding finances would be made in two or three days: he (Mr. T.) had expected, that it would have originated with the Committee; but the declaration was only one more proof that the reports were dictated by the Treasury, and adopted by the Committee.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer denied that he had said, that the Report would be presented in two or three days: the phrase he used was a few days. (Laughter.)

Mr. W. Smith maintained, that the epithet unmanly, was not applicable to the conduct of the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham), or to any of his hon. friends. He did not feel at all disposed to shrink from any opinion he had formerly expressed, and upon that point he felt exactly as his hon. friends had expressed themselves. He who acted with straight-forward uprightness, applying his talents, under peculiar circumstances, and at particular times, for the public good, could not merit such an opprobrious term as unmanly. In 1812 he (Mr. S.) voted both for the abolition of sinecures and for the clause of compensation, because he hoped, by a smaller evil, to attain a greater good; and in doing so, and in avowing it, he feared the censure of no man, however coarse might be the expressions he condescended to employ.

Mr. Peel was not a little surprised, upon a question of consistency, to hear a gentleman speak who a few days ago (see page 587.) had most unjustifiably brought a charge of the same kind against a private individual, founded merely upon an anonymous publication. (Hear, hear.) It was singular, too, that he should be the man to complain of the use of coarse epithets, when he had himself branded the same individual, who had no means of personal vindication, as guilty of the basest and most corrupt inconsistency. It was, indeed, astonishing that he, of all men, should stand up as the champion of consistency, and as the censor of recrimination. (Hear, hear, hear.) Honourable gentlemen on the other side might, perhaps, on some future occasion, be able to persuade the House, that their conduct, in this respect, had been irreproachable; but they would certainly fail in shewing that there was any thing monstrous or novel in the course of proceeding now recommended; for he held in his hand the bill of 1812, in which they concurred; the preamble of which distinctly recognized the principle of pecuniary remuneration, as just, wise, and honourable. It was, "And whereas it is no disparagement of any persons who have meritoriously served the Crown in high civil offices to receive permanent recompense where they need such assistance; and whereas, it is consistent with sound policy and true economy to bestow such honourable reward in consideration thereof; and whereas some offices, enumerated in the table, have been applied to the purpose, and ought not to be abolished without a substitution of some other and more certain remuneration in lieu of them, be it enacted," &c.: so that the greater portion of the preamble of the bill of 1812 was occupied with the pecuniary reward of meritorious services. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Smith said, that after what had fallen from the right hon. gentleman, the House would not refuse him the opportunity of saying a few words. He did not accuse him (Mr. Peel) of irregularity in referring to the debate of a former evening, though, had it been worth his while, he might have corrected him, not only for the reference, but for the manner in which it was made. The reason why the right hon. gent. had now revived the subject must have been, that he was not present on the former evening; for, had he been in the House, had he attended to what passed, and had his recollection served him, he could not have been guilty of the enormous, the extravagant, misrepresentation with which he (Mr. Smith) had now to charge him. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gent. had too much good sense and too much candour (in perfect sincerity he spoke it) to have attributed to him (Mr. S.) the expressions that had now been employed, when, in truth, what he (Mr. S.) had said in the previous debate, was merely levelled at the unwarrantable harsh censures applied by a person who had found it convenient to change his political opinions, to those who had not thought fit to follow his example. At least, this part of the complaint had not been answered either by the right hon. gent., or by the individual whose cause he now, for the first time, stood forward to advocate.

Mr. Lamb denied, that he or his friends could fairly be accused of inconsistency: he objected to this measure, because it definitively fixed the reward of services; whereas he thought a certain sum ought to be placed at the discretion of the Crown, to be disposed of in that way in the proportions that might be deemed proper.

Mr. Tierney again explained his reason for voting in favour of the Report: he considered the suggestion of his hon. friend highly objectionable: if a sum were left to the disposal of the Crown, it would be all swallowed up in two or three months for the accomplishment of about as many jobs.

Lord Ebrington stated his reasons for voting in favour of the Sinecure Bill of 1812, and against the measure now proposed.

Mr. D. Gilbert insisted, that the difference between the two bills was merely formal. It had been deemed convenient to divide the clauses for the abolition of sinecures, and the reward of sinecures, into two bills, instead of submitting them to the House, as in 1812, on one sheet of paper.

Mr. Lyttelton was not surprised to observe a smile on the countenances of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House: no doubt they held it to be a very ridiculous and superfluous thing for any man to vindicate himself from a charge of inconsistency: they wisely made no such attempts.

Sir M. W. Ridley contended, that some of the right hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Bench were most chargeable with inconsistency, for they had directly and strenuously opposed, in 1812, what they now came forward to support. If political tergiversation were a crime, many of them might be found guilty, and he was willing to place the characters of his hon. friend (Mr. Brougham), and of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning), to the opinion of the nation and the world at large, without any apprehension for the result.

Lord Binning challenged the other side to state any question upon which his right hon. friend (Mr. Canning) had been guilty of tergiversation. (Hear, and laughter.)

The question was then put, and it was ordered that the bill should be brought in, as well as bills for the following purposes: Regulation of offices in the Exchequer of England and Ireland: Regulation of offices in the Mints of England and Scotland: Abolition of offices in Scotland: Regulation of the offices of Clerk of Parliaments, Signet, and Privy Seal Clerks: Regulation of the Board of Trade: Abolition of office of Commissary of Musters: Regulation of offices in Ireland. (These, together with the bill for the "Abolition of the Offices of Justices in Eyre," and the bill for "Recompence of Services in high and efficient Offices," constituted the whole of the objects recommended by the Committee in their first Report.)

HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Window Duty Bill was read a third time and passed.

Tuesday, May 6.

WOOL TRADE.] Mr. Heathcote presented a petition from the wool growers of Hampshire, against the importation of foreign wool.

Sir T. Baring considered the subject of great importance, and wished to know whether it was intended to revive the committee which sat last year to investigate the matter?

Mr. F. Lewis could not help declaring, that in the committee of last session this subject had been treated in a very improper manner. He did not mean to say this in an unparliamentary sense, but it was a feeling which he was bound to express. In the next session he hoped the House would investigate the matter seriously.

Sir C. Burrell was of opinion, that some alteration should be made in these laws, which were extremely oppressive in their present operation.

Mr. Curwen said, he was a member of the committee of last session, and the general opinion was, that there existed no reason for complaint. There had been no petition from the wool growers last year; but, certainly, it was a matter of very considerable importance, involving a great number of interests; and though he was happy to find that it was not intended to press it this year, yet whenever the question came, he should not oppose going into it. The misfortune was, that we had always been legislating on particular interests; but in future it would be wiser to take a review of all our commercial and manufacturing interests, and not to encourage monopolies.

Sir J. Graham said, all the woolstaplers had been called on last year to give evidence before the Committee, and the agricultural interest might have given evidence also, but it was thought unnecessary, as their evidence would only have confirmed that of the woolstaplers. It was given in evidence then, that wool was selling at twice the price at which it had been at the end of the American war. He maintained that wool was now much higher than any other agricultural produce. It was not the wool growers in general, but only the growers of some kinds of wool, who complained of the present prices.

Mr. Western contended, that the object for which the Committee had been appointed last year, was not attained. The Committee was appointed just prior to the Easter recess—he had been obliged then to go into the country, and when he returned three or four days after the termination of the recess, he found that the Committee had put an end to their inquiries. In opposition to the statement of the hon. baronet (Sir J. Graham), he contended, that the wool growers had not had an opportunity of contradicting the evidence of the woolstaplers. The House were pledged to inquiry. He for his part did not see any objection to prosecuting the inquiry at this moment.

The petition was brought up, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

LEATHER TAX.] Sir T. Acland presented a petition from the Tanners of Devon, complaining of the pressure of the Duties on Leather, and praying for relief.

Mr. Benson wished to learn from the Chancellor

lor of the Exchequer, whether there was any prospect of the dealers in leather obtaining that relief to which they looked forward with such anxiety?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he had considerable doubts, in so far as respected stock in hand. He did not despair that some relief might be afforded.—Ordered to lie on the table.

CONTEMPT OF COURT.] Mr. Bennet presented a petition from John Hammons, a prisoner in the Fleet, who was committed on the 28th of November, 1814, for a contempt of the Court of Chancery, and was still detained for the costs of that contempt. The petitioner had been unfortunate enough to marry a woman who had a Chancery suit. He and his wife were ordered to make a certain return, and being an ignorant man, and not understanding the nature of the order, the return was not made, and he was ordered into confinement for contempt. He had made the return however, some time since, but being unable to pay the costs, he was detained in prison. The hon. gentleman observed, such was the distressed situation of this person, that he must remain in confinement during the whole term of his natural life, unless the House should interfere to procure his release, as there was no likelihood whatever of his being able to pay the costs. Good God! was it possible, in a country which boasted of its justice, its freedom, its humanity, that any man should be incarcerated for years, merely because he was unable to discharge the fees of a court of equity? Alas! the case had too frequently occurred, and many had fallen victims to this barbarous mode of administering the laws. Last year, when he called the attention of the House to this subject, there was a wretched individual in the Fleet, who had been confined there under an order of the Court of Chancery, for no less a time than thirty-one years. (Hear, hear, hear.) The name of that man was Thomas Williams. He had visited him in his wretched house of bondage, where he found him sinking under all the miseries that can afflict humanity; and on the following day he died. (Hear, hear.) There were at this moment within the walls of the same prison, besides the petitioner, a woman who had been in confinement twenty-eight years, (hear,) and two others who had been there seventeen years. (Hear, hear.) This was a disgrace to England, a disgrace to the laws, and to those by whom they were to be administered. The Lord Chancellor on a former occasion had said, Why did not I know of these cases before? He had known of them since, and he (Mr. Bennet) did not find from the keeper of the prison, that his lordship had interfered to restore these wretched persons to liberty, to their families, and to the world. It was high time, then, that something should be immediately done, or “the law’s delay” would drive them to madness, or consign them to the grave. (Hear.) Whether his Majesty’s Government intended to make any regulations on this subject he could not tell; but the Lord

Chancellor was bound to consider it; and if his lordship neglected it any longer, it would be a great breach of his legal duty. (Hear, hear.)

Sir F. Burdett said, the House ought to take some steps to put an end to a grievance which was quite intolerable. He could understand the exercise of power by Judges in what was called contempts of Court, if it extended to nothing more than removing obstacles in the way of justice; but that a person should remain for his whole life a prisoner, and after 30 years’ confinement die in gaol, was what no person could possibly think of without shuddering with horror. (Hear, hear.) He should have thought that the benefit of the Insolvent Act might have been extended to persons under confinement for contempt. It was necessary, however, that some measures should be adopted to prevent a recurrence of this evil.

Mr. Simcoe said, every person must know that the Lord Chancellor, in the exercise of his judicial duty, was under the necessity of ordering persons into confinement when his orders were not attended to. If the party remained longer in prison than was necessary, it was not the fault of the Lord Chancellor, but his own. It was in his power to bring the matter forward by petition to the Court, and if he had no means of paying the expenses he might apply in forma pauperis.

Mr. Bennet said, it was an insult to a man when he had no money, to tell him he might apply in forma pauperis. It was well known that all these things were attended with expense. The present petitioner had never had a penny in his pocket—he had therefore no means of applying; it was a mockery, therefore, to tell him he could apply to the Court.

Mr. Lamb thought it a very great hardship that persons, after purging the contempt, should be detained in confinement for costs. He saw no reason why the provisions of the Insolvent Debtors Act should not be extended to these cases, as well as to those of common law.

Mr. Bennet observed, that the Commission appointed to inquire into the state of the Courts of Justice, had sat nearly two years without giving in any Report.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

EMBASSY TO LISBON.] Mr. Lambton, in calling the attention of the House to the papers that had been laid on the table respecting the late mission to Lisbon, premised, that a subject of deeper importance could not be brought under the consideration of Parliament. His object in rising was not to attack the character or conduct of an individual, but to point out and reprobate an instance of the grossest public misconduct, and a profligate waste of the public money. He should esteem himself unworthy of the country he represented, unworthy of the people of England, if he did not undertake to expose a transaction in every view so unjustifiable and pernicious; and he hoped the House would express such a sense of it, as to convince the information that their professions of economy were not mere sounds; and that if the expense of the past was irretrievable, at least some hope might exist for the future. It was well known that the whole transaction was the effect of the weakness of Government, of an absolute dearth of talents in every branch of Administration. In truth, no necessity whatever existed for this mission; it was the result of nothing more than the lowest political intrigue. To prove this, he should enter into a statement substantiated by the documents which had been laid before the House. In the year 1814, negotiations were entered into by Ministers to secure the co-operation of the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Canning) and some of his friends. They had found it necessary to have some addition to their force; this necessity was announced by the appointment of Mr. Canning as Ambassador Extraordinary to Lisbon; Mr. Huskisson, Surveyor of Woods and Forests; and Mr. Wellesley Pole as Master of the Mint; and on the 30th of July, notice of these appointments was given in the public prints. The motives assigned for the appointment of an Ambassador to Lisbon, were two despatches from Lord Strangford, the Minister at the Court at Brazil, respecting the intention of the Prince Regent of Portugal to return to Europe. The first of these despatches had been received on the 24th of April, 1814, the second on the 26th of August. As these were the only authorities on which the measure rested, he should read them to the House. The first was in these words—"I should fail in my duty, did I not earnestly recommend to the consideration of his Royal Highness's Government, the speedy return to Europe of the Portuguese royal family. The Prince's own feelings, and those of every member of his family, are earnestly in favour of this measure. Some degree of apprehension may, perhaps, operate upon the mind of the Prince himself, to prevent him from coming forward as eagerly as the other individuals of the royal family would wish; but this sentiment would be easily removed; and his Royal Highness has explicitly stated to me, that as soon as ever Great Britain declares that his return to Portugal is necessary, he will accede to any intimation to that effect."—This, it would be observed, contained merely a declaration of the line of policy which Lord Strangford had thought fit to adopt. The next despatch was received on the 26th of August, and was in these words—"The glorious events which have given peace and independence to Europe, have revived in the mind of the Prince of Brazil, those eager desires to revisit his native country, which had been for a time suppressed. His Royal Highness has lately done me the honour to state his anxious hope that Great Britain will facilitate the completion of his wishes upon this subject, and that he may return to Portugal, under the same protection as that under which he left it. And his Royal Highness has during the last week intimated to me, four or five times, as well publicly as privately, that in case Great Britain should send a squadron of ships of war to this place for the purpose of escorting his Royal Highness to Europe, it would be particularly and personally gratifying to his Royal Highness that ——— should be selected for this service." The blank he believed had been filled up with the name of Sir Sidney Smith. Now, on one or other of the despatches which he had read, the appointment of the Lisbon Ambassador must have been founded, if it had any foundation but the desire to find an appointment for the right hon. gentleman. It was ascertained that in the interval between the 24th of April and the 26th of August, no communication had been made from the Portuguese Ambassador to our Government; an Address had been voted for all the communications from the Portuguese Ambassador respecting the return of the Prince Regent of Portugal, and the answer was, that no written communication had been made. Indeed he could prove, that not only had the Portuguese Minister made no communication of the probability of the return of the Prince of Brazil, but he had asserted that the Government had quite misunderstood the intention of his master. The appointment could not have been in consequence of the despatch received in April, for it was only on the 6th of June that Mr. Sydenham was appointed, and on the 18th of July, when the noble lord had written to Mr. Sydenham, he had no contemplation of any other appointment. (Hear, hear.) It was still more impossible that the appointment could have been occasioned by the despatch received on the 26th of August, for that was a month after the appointment of the right hon. gentleman had been announced to the public in the newspapers. He supposed it would not be contended that the appointment did not take place until it was formally announced in The Gazette—the evidentia rei, the previous notoriety of the transaction, was a sufficient contradiction of any such idea, and he did not think any of the Ministers would stand forward in their places, and assert that the appointment did not take place in July. But if the right hon. gentleman had really been appointed for the purpose of welcoming the Prince Regent on his return, by what pretence could the appointment be justified in August, when the fleet intended to convey the Prince of Brazil to Europe did not sail till the 29th of October? It was morally impossible therefore that his Royal Highness could have reached Europe till the month of May following. He should now call the attention of the House to the expenses of the Mission:—On the 18th of July, 1814, Lord Castlereagh had written a letter to Mr. Sydenham, then the Minister at Lisbon, in which he stated, that it was the Prince Regent's pleasure that the expenses of the mission should be reduced to the lowest scale, and stating, that he could not contemplate any reasons for continuing the scale of expenditure which had been adopted during the peninsular war. He had been rather surprised to find this economical disposition in any production of the noble lord's, but it was of short duration, for it was only ten days after Mr. Sydenham had been reduced to a salary of 5200*l.* a year, that the right hon. gentleman had been appointed with a salary of nearly treble that amount. On the 31st of October, in the absence of the noble lord (Lord Castlereagh) at the Congress, Lord Bathurst wrote to Mr. Canning, then at Lisbon, to inform him that he was to be allowed 14,200*l.* a year, on the same grounds on which Mr. Sydenham had been limited to 5,200*l.* Why such a change had taken place in the allowance to the Minister, while no change had taken place in the circumstances of the embassy, and when no chance existed of the immediate return of the Prince of Brazil to Europe, yet remained to be explained. The expense of Sir C. Stuart had been referred to, but that could form no precedent for the expenditure of the right hon. gentleman. Sir C. Stuart was a member, and the sole effective member of the Regency during the peninsular war. The case was very different when the war had ceased, and when the ambassador was no longer a member of the Portuguese Government. On the 30th of May, 1815, the right hon. gentleman had found out a reason for this increased scale of allowance. In a letter to the noble lord (Castlereagh) of that date, he stated, that "the rank of ambassador, which could make no practical difference in expenses, of which the salary (whether as ambassador or as envoy) supplied only a part, was politically important, as counterbalancing the positive loss of rank and influence, which would otherwise have been occasioned by the British Minister's being no longer a member of the Regency." The right hon. gentleman had by that time forgotten the letter of Lord Castlereagh, in which Mr. Sydenham was directed to reduce his expenses to the lowest scale. He seemed to have taken a former suggestion of his noble friend—to have two strings to his bow—for when he was forced to acknowledge that the object of his mission had ceased, as there was no probability of the Prince of Brazil's return to Europe, he contrived to discover, that it was essential to the political welfare of England, that his salary should be continued; he discovered, in short, that as Sir Charles Stuart had a large allowance, because he was a member of the Regency, so he (the right hon. gentleman) ought to have a large allowance, because he was not a member of the Regency. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) The rest of this letter of the right hon. gentleman's was unimportant, except as it displayed talents for finance, which, though he had never display'd on any other occasion, he might exert in support of his friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in this season of financial difficulty. From all these documents it was evident, that the plain and almost avowed purpose of the mission, was to procure a place for the right hon. gentleman. He was therefore sent, with a salary of 14,000*l.* a year, to a capital where there was no court, and to which, even while it had a court, no ambassador had been sent for almost a century, and when he had amassed a sufficient sum, or when a place was provided for him, or when the job became too glaring, and called forth the public censure, he left the important business of the Lisbon Mission under the sole guidance of a Chargé d'Affaires (hear, hear); and during the whole of this mission, the only duty performed by him, was a fine speech to the Factory. (Hear, and a laugh.) The defenders of this mission had talked of the efforts which the right hon. gentleman had made to complete the abolition of the Slave Trade; and one of his friends, on a former occasion, had said, "that if there was the least chance that the abolition of the Slave Trade would be accelerated by this measure, the opposers of the appointment of the right hon. gentleman should pause before they called on the country to pronounce it a gross and scandalous job." He could prove, however, that since the appointment of the right hon. gentleman, the trade of Portugal in human flesh had increased instead of decreasing; and that not one single favourable declaration was procured from the Portuguese Government by the efforts of the ambassador.—Under all these circumstances, he called on the House to pronounce on the merits of this transaction; he called on them to make good the professions of economy that had been held forth at the commencement of the session, and to mark their sense of a case of most profligate expenditure. In no one instance had the confidence placed in Ministers been more abused: and never was there a time when the effects of such misconduct could be more severely felt. He trusted, therefore, that by their vote on this occasion, they would still retain a claim to the regard of the people, and be the means of protecting them from farther loss and disgrace. It only remained for him to move the following resolutions, founded on the documents then upon the table.

"That it appears to this House, That on the 18th of July, 1814, Lord Viscount Castlereagh addressed an official despatch to Thomas Sydenham, Esquire, then his Majesty's Minister at Lisbon, acquainting him that it was the command of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, that during his residence at the Court of Portugal, he should confine his personal expenses within his ordinary allowances as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, viz. 5,200*l. per annum*: That he had directed Mr. Casamajor to lose no time in removing the Mission from the house of the Marquis de Pombal, and that he could not anticipate any public grounds for continuing the expenditure of his Majesty's servants at Lisbon, on the scale on which it had been conducted during the war in the Peninsula.

"That it appears that under the pretence of congratulating the Prince of Brazil, on his return to his native dominions, the right hon. George Canning was appointed Ambassador Extraordinary to the Court of Lisbon, with the increased emoluments and allowances belonging to that character, viz. 8,200*l.* as salary, 6,000*l.* as extraordinary, 1,500*l.* as outfit, and 3,180*l.* as plate money, amounting in the whole to the sum of 18,880*l.*

"That such an appointment, on such a scale of expense, appears to this House inconsistent with the recorded declaration in Lord Castlereagh's despatch to Mr. Sydenham, of the 18th of July 1814; was uncalled for by any change in the circumstances of the mission subsequent to Mr. Sydenham's appointment; and has been attended with an unnecessary and unjustifiable waste of the public money."

The first resolution having been put,

Lord Castlereagh said, he was perfectly ready to meet the charge on these broad and distinct grounds. And first, he should attempt to do away the odium which had been thrown on the appointment, on account of the alleged extravagance of the expense. The honourable mover had drawn a comparison between the salary of Mr. Sydenham and that of his right hon. friend, which he was not warranted in drawing. The salary of his right hon. friend was not 14,000*l.* a year. That sum was fixed at the extent which the whole expenses of the mission should not exceed. The salary was only 8,200*l.* a year, subject to all deductions, and did not exceed in amount what the Committee, in 1815, on the Civil List had recommended as the salary of an ambassador of the second order. It was true that, in his letter of the 18th of July, he had enjoined Mr. Sydenham to confine his expenses as much as possible; but he did not say that cases might not occur in which it would be necessary to alter the scale of expenditure; on the contrary, he could fully justify an approach to the amount incurred by Sir C. Stuart. But what was the case when he wrote to Mr. Sydenham? He had written without any knowledge of the peculiar local circumstances of Lisbon, without knowing that Mr. Sydenham had been writing to him on the judgment of the Duke of Wellington, that he must be ruined by his situation at Lisbon unless the Government allowances were increased. He had written, too, at a time when there was no Court at Lisbon, and no immediate expectation of the return of a Court. He would ask, therefore, whether, with a view to welcoming home the Sovereign of the country, it was not the duty of Ministers to consider how far the expenses should be increased when a mission was sent for the express purpose of that welcome?—The wish of this Government, that the Prince of the Brazils should return to Europe, had not been expressed for the first time, at the period to which the papers on the table related. It had been repeatedly urged that the presence of the Sovereign was essential to the interests of his country, and his absence was embarrassing to all the concerns of state, and the exertions made by us for Portugal herself. Indeed, the Duke of Wellington had encountered serious difficulties from this circumstance during the last years of the war, on questions that could not be decided without reference to the Prince of Portugal. This was at a period when the war was carried on with vigour: but when it ceased, embarrassments were felt all over Europe from the absence of this Prince. In 1814, serious difficulties had arisen at the peace of Paris; nor did they terminate there, but were again experienced at the congress of Vienna; and the questions touching Portugal could not be satisfactorily settled. The same difficulties recurred in the campaigns of the second war; and the endeavour to bring the Portuguese troops to the aid of the allies failed, because the Regency could not authorize such a measure without sufficient instructions. The House would, therefore, see the necessity there was of pressing the return of the Prince to Europe; and there had been every reason to suppose that the Prince had designed to revisit Portugal as soon as there was any certainty of his not being again disturbed. It was true, that in the letter of the 18th of July he (Lord C.) had stated, that no change was anticipated, but he did not contemplate any certainty that circumstances might not occur which would justify a different scale of expenditure; and if the hon. gentleman argued, that Government did not contemplate the possibility of the Prince's return, he was entirely wrong: for they had long been in earnest hope and confidence that such an event would occur. That hope had been much increased after the peace of Paris in 1814, because one of the causes that had prevented a return to Europe was the unsettled state of the Continent, subject to every kind of casualty. But in July, after the peace had been established, Government thought the probability of the Prince's return much increased.—He could truly state, that the embassy was not fixed till the 26th of August, when the letter was received which left no doubt on the minds of his Majesty's Ministers. Did the hon. gentleman think that his Majesty's Ministers would despatch a squadron across the Atlantic for an excuse to set up an individual in an embassy, and expose themselves to obloquy? He was certain that the hon. gentleman could not be sincere: the thing was too ludicrous to be imagined. It would be a waste of time to answer such a supposition. The fact was, that his Majesty's Ministers did believe that the Prince was returning, and they thought it advisable to mark his return in the most respectful manner. This, he maintained, was not only wise and right, but, under the circumstances of the two countries, it would have been a most unpardonable neglect, if such an honour had been omitted. Every other power had sent its mission to congratulate, and it was therefore the more necessary for this country to do so. Portugal had been our ancient ally and most valuable friend; and on this occasion we had afforded her more assistance than any one country had ever afforded another. It was the more incumbent on us to pay particular respect; and, had we failed, we should have been almost the only exception in Europe. The King of France had sent the Duke of Luxembourg, one of the first individuals of his court, and the Emperor of Russia had also sent an ambassador, though he now only retained a mission of the second order. Government, therefore, felt it incumbent on them to hail the return of the Prince, and the appointment of the mission was calculated to shew every degree of respect. No better compliment could be paid, considering that his right hon. friend had held such high offices at home; and at one time held the office which his lordship now had the honour to fill. (Hear, and a laugh.) As to any question of delay, he could only say that that was greater than was foreseen. Information was received on the 26th of August. On the same day Lord Bathurst wrote to instruct the Admiralty to provide a squadron. Intelligence of the matter was sent to his right hon. friend, then in the West of England: he returned to town early in September, but Admiral Beresford was detained with his squadron by unfavourable weather till October. Was it possible, however, that his right hon. friend could go out on an embassy of this nature without some preparation?—On a fair view of the subject, Mr. Sydenham's mission was not more economical than his right hon. friend's, though the latter went out in a superior order of embassy. No one who read attentively the documents could believe that his right hon. friend's object was to increase the expenses. There was really a spirit of economy in the whole arrangement. Certainly there was no great public motive, which was a marking feature of the mission; because the object of it did not take place, as the Prince Regent did not come back. There was in Portugal only a provisional Government. If, however, there was any blame or fault in the transaction, it must lie with those who sent out his right honourable friend; but himself and the other members of Government believed, in their consciences, that the Prince would return, and that they were only shewing every mark of respect to such a Sovereign. Upon these grounds, he should move the adoption of the previous question.

The Amendment being put,

Sir F. Burdett said, there never was in his knowledge a more complete failure in an attempt at defence than had been exhibited by the noble lord. The statement of the hon. mover was clear, distinct, and intelligible. The noble lord could not deny his letter to Mr. Sydenham; neither could he disprove the facts and dates which had been mentioned. It seemed unlikely he could ever have seriously believed that the Prince Regent intended to return. The idea of his return, and any measures consequent upon it, appeared to have been neglected for a considerable time, till the noble lord found out that it was convenient for him to employ his right

hon. friend. The noble lord, in this transaction, had endeavoured to display all the charity of a good Christian. He did good to those who had evil spoken of him, he returned good for evil, he did that unto others which they had not done unto him, beyond any instance in political history. He did not wonder at this Christian charity of the noble lord to a right hon. friend who had once filled the noble lord's own place, and who wished to fill it without the noble lord's assistance in Government. Nor did he wonder at the apparently triumphant tone of the noble lord occasionally, after this exhibition of Christian charity. He believed it was, however, pretty well recollected, that the right honourable friend did state to his constituents, that he could not return to office with the noble lord, consistently with honour. If at that time he could not do so consistently with honour, he (Sir F. B.) did not see how he could do it at all. It might be supposed, that great matters of importance to the public safety and welfare were felt so strongly, that the right hon. friend, in order to act under the noble lord in office, gave up all former charges, even the accusation of incapacity to plan an expedition. (Hear, hear.) Now there appeared forgiveness on the one hand, and benefits received on the other. The peculiar characteristics of the whole transaction might be viewed in many lights. It had been said, and by the right honourable gentleman too, that it was a great evil that public men got no credit for public motives in their conduct. This he had particularly complained of as an erroneous idea out of doors, and had ventured to stigmatize all who believed that much corruption existed, and avowed that belief, and desired a remedy and a reform. He threw out, that they were all mischievous and dangerous. Like the Pharisee in the temple, he thanked God that he was not like publicans and sinners, or reformers and republicans. (Hear.) After all, he had talked of morality and religion, as if they were altogether on his side, against all reformers; yet his own case was such as would gain him no credit, except for those very motives which he condemned and deprecated. The whole transaction had both fortunate and unfortunate "features," if he might use a term of the noble lord's: fortunate, because the noble lord, wanting the support of the right hon. gentleman, had a good place to give away, which the right hon. gentleman wanted, and was so fortunate as to obtain: unfortunate, because the defence set up was so inconsistent with the conclusion to be drawn from the facts and from the dates of all the papers produced. After complaining of the expense of the Lisbon mission, the noble lord suddenly found it quite right to send out his right hon. friend in the capacity of what he called a minister of the first order, none of that rank having been sent to Portugal for a century, and to give him a salary of 8,000*l.* a year, and an additional 6,000*l.* besides other money, making altogether about 19,000*l*. The court of Rio Janeiro did not mean to come; but at all events there was no reason to pay the right hon. gent. in advance, till it was ascertained that they would come. If it was a matter of great importance to induce the Prince Regent to return to Europe, and if the Prince seemed to hesitate, it might have been as well to have sent out the right hon. gentleman with the fleet to Brazil, where, as he was a great orator, he might have employed his powers to persuade the Prince to return with him. (Hear, hear.) But why pay the right hon. gentleman, when there could be no reasons, in conscience, to believe that the Prince intended to return? The appointment was made long before it could be wanted. Out of doors it was generally considered to be as gross a job as ever existed. (Hear.) It appeared to be a scandalous speculation on the public purse, that the noble lord might gain the assistance of his right hon. friend. The affair might be varnished an inch thick, and still it would appear a plain, palpable job. (Hear.) It was reported of Sir Robert Walpole, that he had said, that all men had their price; but, in respect to the noble lord, he had certainly had much more experience in such matters, in wholesale practice, than Sir Robert Walpole ever could have had. (Hear.) Yet he believed, that neither Sir Robert Walpole nor the noble lord could ever, before this transaction, tell precisely the price of any particular individual. But here the House had it shewn to them in figures. (Hear.) It had, to use again a term of the noble lord, some of the most disgusting features of any attempt he knew of to invade the means of an oppressed people. If ever there had been a time when it was necessary to look at small sums, even at shillings and pence, on account of public distress, for the sake of relieving the nation, it was now; and it was so at the time when this strange arrangement was made. No wonder need be excited that the right hon. gentleman should feel strong alarms at any steps taken in the way of Reform, and should profess to stand forward in the defence of what he called the Constitution; but which he (Sir F. B.) called, the violations and abuses of the Constitution. Whether the right hon. gentleman took on him to give grave warnings, or indulged himself in general declamations, to excite the passions against all Reformers; whatever road he took against Reform, he would find himself mistaken. One word in future would be a sufficient answer to any speech of the right hon. gentleman on these subjects, and that was "speculation." (Hear.) The noble lord had shewn the right hon. gentleman great forgiveness, and the right hon. gentleman had with still greater humility bought his benefits at a very dear rate. Let him then take care how he threw out hereafter his imputations, and his suspicions, and censures on others, who would find an ample made by of all they had said of public men Duke of Wulst of the right hon. gentleman him- transaction really did regard the public, as to expense, as to public honour, and as to the character of public men. If the character of public men was, as it had been called, the best part of the public property, it was greatly to be feared that, like the rest of the public property, it would soon be gone. (Hear.) There was no occasion for the noble lord to go into minutiae. All that was proper was to keep the grand object in view; and then it would be seen that this was one of the most notorious and disgusting acts of public men. Believing that much corruption existed, he felt satisfaction in the exposure of this transaction. He hoped gentlemen would now see the necessity of putting an end to this system, which encouraged the want of principle in public men; all which, in a great degree, it was apparent, arose from the necessity Ministers felt for taking undue measures to obtain support in that House.

The question was again put, when Admiral Beresford rose. He observed, that when he went out to Rio Janeiro, he waited on the Prince Regent to communicate the object of his arrival. The Prince requested him to continue there, but stated, that he still hoped to return to Lisbon. The Admiral wishing to go back to Europe, asked some time afterwards for another answer. He was still begged to remain, as the Prince expected an arrival which might induce him to return:—he also inquired how long the passage would be. Still the Admiral wished to depart; but he could obtain no final answer until about the middle of April. He could assure the House, that he would not have remained at Rio Janeiro five days after his arrival, but from a strong belief that the Prince intended to return with him.

No other member offering to speak, Mr. Canning rose, and addressed the House as follows:—Sir, Upon a question which, however disguised in form, I cannot but feel, in common with every member who hears me,—in common with the hon. mover of the Resolutions,—and in common with the hon. Baronet, who has fairly stated the real object in view,—to be an attack directed against me individually, I trust I shall not be considered as having shewn any blameable reluctance in pausing before I offered myself to the attention of the House. Sir, I could not bring myself to believe, that, in the two speeches of the hon. mover and the hon. Baronet, I had heard the whole of what is to be alleged against me; and yet I must suppose that, if others intended to add their weight to the accusation,—I must suppose that, in a case in which every thing that is dear to man, in character, in reputation, and in honour, is at stake, they would have had the fairness to give to the accused an advantage which is not withholden from the meanest criminal,—that of hearing the whole indictment to which he is to plead. If, after a year of menace, and after three months of preparation, from amidst all the array which I see opposed to me, there are my only accusers;—if the speeches which I have heard, contain the whole of the charges which are to be urged against me,—charges, which those who bring them forward state to be directed to no other object than the public weal,—but which I know, and which they know, to be intended to disqualify me for ever from serving the public with credit to myself or with advantage to the state;—if this be all,—it falls indeed far short of the expectations excited by such mighty menace and by such deliberate preparation! But, Sir, if this is not all,—if there are gentlemen, who hold themselves in readiness to aggravate the matter preferred against me,—whose speeches, prepared for the occasion and now throbbing in their breasts, are reserved till I shall be disabled from answering them,—from such I appeal to the candour of the House and of the world; declaring, and desiring it to be understood, both within and without the walls of this House, that if I do not refute what they may hereafter advance against me, it will be only because I am precluded by the forms of the House from speaking a second time. (Cries of no, no, from the Opposition.) O, Sir, I am not to be told that the motion consists of a string of Resolutions—that each Resolution is a separate question—and that upon each separate question I may speak:—but neither are my accusers to be told that this is technical nonsense;—that the effective debate must take place upon the first Resolution,—and that the question upon that Resolution once put to the vote, I should be heard upon those which follow, to very little purpose indeed. I agree with the hon. Baronet, that I have often deplored and deprecated,—and, in spite of the hon. Baronet's warning, I shall continue (not for myself but for the public good) to deprecate and to deplore—the practice of calumniating public men on either side of this House, by imputing to them motives of action, the insinuation of which would not be tolerated in the intercourse of private life. If, indeed, I shall be found to have forfeited all claim to the confidence of the House, the hon. Baronet needs not fear that I shall again offend him by such unpleasant animadversions. But if, on the other hand, I shall be fortunate enough to make plain to others—that which I myself confidently feel—my perfect clearness from any of the imputations attempted to be thrown upon me, the hon. Baronet may depend upon hearing from me hereafter the same language which I have used heretofore, on this—and on other subjects still more disagreeable to the hon. Baronet and his followers. Sir, the charge which the hon. gentleman's Resolutions involve, is this,—That the Government being perfectly aware that the Prince Regent of Portugal had no intention of returning to Europe, pretended a belief in such intention, for the express purpose of corruptly offering that mission which I corruptly accepted. It is true, that a distinction is most disingenuously affected to be drawn between the Government and me; of which it is hardly necessary to say, that I disdain to take advantage.

It is pretended that a charge is brought forward only against the Government for making the offer—but that I might have accepted that offer—if not altogether without blame, at least without absolute criminality. Sir, I disclaim this insidious distinction. I will allow no such exception in my favour. As my noble friend has claimed that my case shall be considered as that of the Government,—so do I declare on my part that the case of the Government is mine. The first head of charge, therefore, against the Government and myself is, That there was no belief on the part of the Government, or on mine, that the Prince Regent of Portugal intended to return to Europe: the second is, That the mission sent to receive and congratulate the Prince Regent on his return was on a scale of unnecessary, unexampled, profligate prodigality. To both these issues, distinctly, I mean to plead. All that I require of those who are to judge me is, that they will keep these two issues separate in their minds; that they will not confound them, as has been industriously done in the speeches of the hon. gentleman and the hon. baronet. If a fraud were purposed—if the Government did not believe in the return of the royal family of Portugal—there is crime enough for an impeachment, if you will, without entering into the question of expense. In that case the expense of one farthing was too much. But if, on the contrary, the Government was sincere in its belief of the occasion for the appointment when they made it,—and I, when I accepted it,—then the question of expense is indeed a fair subject of parliamentary jealousy (I am far from denying that it is so); but the amount of that expense must be estimated, with reference to its object,—and not upon the unfair and fallacious assumption that there was no occasion for any expense at all. As to the first point, if I were pleading for myself alone, all that it would be necessary for me to do, would be to refer to one only of the papers before the House:—the Extract of Lord Strangford's Despatch to Lord Castlereagh, dated Rio de Janeiro, June 21st, 1814. It is in these words:—"The glorious events which have given peace and independence to Europe, have revived in the mind of the Prince of Brazil those eager desires to revisit his native country, which had been for a time suppressed. His Royal Highness has done me the honour to state his anxious hope that Great Britain will facilitate the completion of his wishes upon this subject; and that he may return to Portugal under the same protection as that under which he left it." The dispatch, of which this is an extract, was, in fact, the only one upon the subject that I happened to see before I went to Portugal, and it appeared to me quite sufficient to establish the Prince Regent of Portugal's intention. I confess, indeed, that my belief in that event rested on authority short even of this extract. It rested on the authority of a private letter from Lord Liverpool, received by me on the 28th August, at a considerable distance from London; which, though it is not pleasant to quote in public discussion the contents of private letters, I will now, (having my noble friend's permission,) read to the House. It is dated, London, August 26th, 1814.—

“Letters have been this day received from Lord Strangford, by which it appears, that the Prince of Brazil has intimated his desire to return to Portugal, (in consequence of the recent events in Europe,) and the gratification which he would feel at the arrival of a British squadron at Rio de Janeiro, for the purpose of conveying the royal family to Lisbon. Under these circumstances, Melville has given orders for preparing a proper squadron for this service, and it will sail as soon as the necessary arrangements can be completed.” This letter, Sir, I received on the 28th of August, at Manchester, in my way from London to a distant part of the country, from whence I had no thoughts of returning till the middle of September. My right hon. friend, now sitting near me, (Mr. Huskisson) was with me when I received it. Now, the hypothesis of my accusers is, that the whole notion of the Prince Regent's return was a feint and a fraud on the part of the Government, if not on mine. But, I ask of any candid man, if he can believe,—I ask of any man living, if he will avow the belief,—that supposing a fraud to have been intended, it is likely that such a letter as this from Lord Liverpool, written in the unguarded style of private friendship, and addressed (as any gentleman who would take the trouble to look at it would see that it is) with the usual formulary of the most familiar correspondence, should have been one of the documents got up for such a purpose? Is it likely, that of two men, known to each other by nearly thirty years of intimacy, one should practise such a delusion upon the other? Or, is it likely that two such men should carry hypocrisy so far as to provide beforehand for the support of a public fraud, by the contrivance of such a private communication? This letter from Lord Liverpool was founded upon that despatch from Lord Strangford of which I have already read the extract, and which appears at full length in the papers laid upon the table. The extract was moved for at my desire, the extract only, when I conceived that my justification alone was in question: the whole despatch was afterwards moved for, also at my suggestion, when I found that the Government were suspected of having deceived me into a belief, for which they had no foundation. I will now take the liberty of reading the whole despatch.

[Received August 26th, 1814.]

“My Lord,—The glorious events which have given peace and independence to Europe, have revived in the mind of the Prince of Brazil those eager desires to revisit his native country, which had been for a time suppressed. His Royal Highness has lately done me the honour to state his anxious hope, that Great Britain will facilitate the completion of his wishes upon this subject, and that he may return to Portugal under the same protection as that under which he left it. And His Royal Highness has, during the last week, intimated to me, four or five times, as well publicly as privately, that, in case Great Britain should send a squadron of ships of war to this place, for the purpose of escorting his Royal Highness to Europe, it would be particularly and personally gratifying to his Royal Highness that ———— should be selected for this purpose. I have the honour to be, &c.

To Viscount Castlereagh, &c. &c. &c.

(The name of the officer is omitted from motives of delicacy. Sir John Beresford had been already appointed and announced to the Court of Rio de Janeiro, before this despatch was received.) Submit this document to any man in the habit of canvassing evidence, and ask him, whether there is any thing in it that could create a suspicion of the sincerity of the wish which it announces? whether the Government could reasonably doubt the authenticity of the intelligence conveyed in it, any more than I doubted the fidelity of the abstract of that intelligence transmitted to me by Lord Liverpool? A man might say, that he intended to go a journey, and the fact of his entertaining that intention might, perhaps, not be considered as altogether established by the mere intimation of it; but, when he ordered his carriage to the door, and named the servants by whom he wished to be conducted, then, surely, one would consider him to be really in earnest. This despatch, however, I did not see till after my return to London in September. I was quite satisfied of the fact, as stated to me by Lord Liverpool. Nothing is more easy than, when an event has, or has not, actually taken place, to find out that you ought to have foreseen how likely, or to have discovered how unlikely, it was to happen. But who balances probabilities in this way, in the ordinary transactions of life? Who is the wise and happy man that receives every friendly communication with distrust; that calls for proofs of the most credible expectancies, and deems every occurrence problematical till it has actually occurred? The Prince Regent of Portugal announced to the British Cabinet his intention of returning; he requested that a squadron might be sent to escort him to Europe; he named the officer by whom he wished that squadron to be commanded: yet Ministers were to suspect that he entertained no intention of the kind! For myself, I protest, that no shadow of doubt ever crossed my mind, as to the reality of this intention. Perhaps it may have been rash to believe; if so, I must acknowledge my error. But when, in addition to such positive testimony, I considered how desirable it was, with a view to the interests of the Portuguese Monarchy, of this country, and of the world, how essential to the complete restoration and tranquillity of that order of things which the French Revolution had disjoined and broken up, that Portugal, now sunk into a province, should resume her station among the states of Europe; when I felt that no efforts of the British Government ought to have been spared, and had reason to be assured that none had been spared, to induce that return, I confess I know not on what I could have founded the smallest doubt that the return of the Court of Portugal was really determined upon, and that this determination was upon the eve of execution. It may be true, that there were, as has been asserted, at the precise period to which I am alluding, conflicting reports on this subject; that merchants in Lisbon had received letters from their friends in Brazil, contradicting the opinion that the Prince Regent would return: that there were rumours of opposition to the measure in the councils of Rio de Janeiro; and that persons, supposed to have access to correct intelligence, avowed the conviction that the court would remain in South America. If there were such reports, I knew nothing of them. But I fairly own that had they come distinctly to my knowledge, had I even been consulted as to the weight to be allowed to them, I should have considered the British Minister's testimony as outweighing them all. I will tell the House why the testimony of Lord Strangford would have had so powerful a weight with me on this subject. In 1807, at the time when the Court of Portugal emigrated to the Brazils, I had the honour to fill the office now filled by my noble friend. When the first intelligence of the intended emigration reached this country, there was then, also, an abundance of conflicting and contradictory reports; and I believe I may say that for several days I alone, in London,—alone perhaps among my colleagues, was persuaded of the existence of that intention. At that time, I knew nothing of Lord Strangford, except from his official correspondence; but that correspondence had inspired me with a full reliance upon the authenticity of his sources of information, and upon his knowledge of the Prince Regent's mind; and Lord Strangford all along affirmed, that the Prince Regent intended to emigrate. The general persuasion at Lisbon was that the Court would not emigrate; even up to the very day, when, as Lord Strangford had predicted, the Prince actually embarked in the Tagus, and set sail for Brazil. My belief, therefore, in the present instance was founded, first on positive information; secondly, on the obvious desirableness of the return of the Prince Regent to Europe, and on the certainty that this country must have used all means of counsel and persuasion to ensure that event. I was persuaded both of the reality of the intention, and of the probability of its instant execution. Nothing, absolutely nothing, had come to my knowledge that could excite a reasonable distrust. But even had such distrust been excited in my mind by any rumour, or any testimony less than official, it would have been dispelled by the assurances of Lord Strangford. Such was my belief, my credulity, if you will—but a credulity of which I have assigned the grounds—a credulity which was assuredly not so fatuitous as to be fairly construed into crime. I must, however, beg not to have it understood that my belief in the return of the Prince Regent at once determined my acceptance of the mission; though it might have done so, for aught that I can see, without blame. Undoubtedly no earthly consideration would have induced me to accept it without an assurance as to that return; but it required a combination of other circumstances, with which I need not trouble the House, to induce me to go in an official character to Lisbon; and in fact my acceptance was not determined till after my return to town, late in September. The Government had stronger grounds for belief than I had. They had before them the communications contained, or referred to, in the papers submitted to the House:—letters, namely, from Lord Strangford, of so early a date as February, and the autograph letter of the Prince Regent of Portugal to the Prince Regent of Great Britain, dated the 2d of April. Of these I knew nothing till the other day, when the hon. gentleman's inquiries and denunciations led to an examination of the correspondence in the Foreign Office. This autograph letter disproves the notion of the hon. gentleman, that there was an interval between the month of February and the month of August in the communications respecting the Prince Regent's intended return. This letter fills up the supposed chasm in the correspondence. The reason why a copy of this document has not been laid before the House is, that as many gentlemen who hear me must know, it is contrary to the etiquette observed towards Sovereign Princes so to make their letters public. The practice is for the Secretary of State to refer to the substance of such letters in an official despatch accompanying them, or acknowledging their receipt: and such a record of the letter in question is to be found in the despatch from the Secretary of State to Lord Strangford, of the 25th July. In that despatch, this autograph letter is noticed as stating that the Prince Regent of Portugal only waited for intelligence of the final success of the Allies, in order to determine his return to Europe. But all this evidence, all this testimony, is, it seems, to be considered as fallacious, if not absolutely false, because there is a solemn, indubitable, irrefragable witness at variance with it—a paragraph in a newspaper of the 29th of July, which announced my actual appointment as Ambassador to Portugal! An appointment of the 29th of July could not be in consequence of information received on the 26th of August. Clearly. But events might be contemplated as probable before the 29th of July, which intelligence of the 26th of August might confirm; and a speculation might be founded upon those probabilities, contingent upon their fulfilment or non-fulfilment. I do not affirm that some such speculation, founded on some such possible contingency, but absolutely dependent for its realization on the happening or not happening of that contingency, might not be afloat before the 29th of July. The despatch of the 25th of July, (of which, however, any more than of the autograph letter alluded to in it, I had not any distinct knowledge till it was brought into notice the other day in consequence of the hon. gentleman's inquiries,)—the date, I say, of this despatch renders it not improbable that it may have been about that time that a mission to Portugal began to be contemplated as probable. But that I was at that time, or near that time, appointed,—that I then accepted such appointment, if offered to me, or that it could then have been offered to me, if I had been willing to accept it, I utterly deny. I deny here, Sir, in your presence, and in the presence of my country, that which has been assumed as established because I did not deny it when asserted in a newspaper. Sir, I value as much as any man the liberty of the press; I acknowledge its utility, I bow to its power; in common with all public men, I listen to its suggestions, and receive its chastisements, with all due humility and thankfulness; but I will not plead at its bar! I will continue to treat with scorn the attacks of anonymous malice. I disdain to make any answer to such charges, whilst there is a House of Commons before which I can vindicate my character. This is the place where it is my right as well my duty to plead, before a competent tribunal, and in the face of known and accountable accusers. And in behalf of all that is sacred and decent in private life, as well as in behalf of the honour of public men, I protest against the inference, that he is to be held guilty of a charge, who resolutely declines to answer it at the bar of the daily Press. But the newspaper had, it seems, announced not only that I was appointed Ambassador to Lisbon, but that my right hon. friend near me was appointed Surveyor of the woods and forests, and my right hon. friend at the end of the bench, Master of the Mint, both which nominations were immediately verified. It is very true that the latter office was shortly afterwards filled by my right hon. friend, who has discharged the duties of it with so much honour to himself, and advantage to the public; but I disclaim in the most peremptory terms any merit or influence of mine in that appointment. My right hon. friend near me, was, it is also true, appointed to the office of Surveyor of Woods, and undoubtedly not without my intervention. On the 30th of July I think it was that I moved the new writ for my right hon. friend. I moved that writ for the express purpose of shewing that I approved, and was party to, the accession of my right hon. friend, and of other friends of mine, to the Administration. And had I myself accepted office at that time, I should have been equally ready, nay, anxious to avow it. At different periods of my political life, I have held, I have resigned, I have refused, and I have accepted office. And there is no occasion on which I have taken either of these courses, on which I am not perfectly prepared to vindicate (I will not say always the prudence, but I will say confidently) the purity and honourableness of my conduct. I know, Sir, how difficult it is to speak plainly on subjects of this nature, without transgressing the decorum, if not the strict order, of our debates. But it is brought as an accusation against me, that, having no difference of opinion with the Administration, I did not neglect an opportunity which presented itself of furnishing an accession of strength to that Administration, which I wished to strengthen and uphold? Why ought I to have declined this? And by whom am I accused for not declining it? By those who consider the principle of Party as a virtue, as a badge of distinction, and a pledge of purity, when predicated of themselves; but who are intolerant of any party, presuming to connect itself together, except under their banners. And, what is the bond of Party? what are the boasted ties that connect the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House with each other?—Fidelity in private friendship, as well as consistency in public principle. Their theory of Party is a theory which they would confine exclusively to their own practice. One may become a satellite in their system, and welcome; but any eccentric planet moving in another system, they view with jealous yet with scornful eyes, and denounce its course as baleful and destructive. To this exclusive doctrine I have never subscribed. To these pretensions I have never listened with submission. I have never deemed it reasonable that any confederacy of great names should monopolise to themselves the whole patronage and authority of the State;—should constitute themselves, as it were, into a corporation, a bank for circulating the favours of the Crown and the suffrages of the people, and distributing them only to their own adherents. I cannot consent that the administration of the Government of this free and enlightened country shall be considered as rightfully belonging to any peculiar circle of public men however powerful, or of families however preponderant; and though I cannot stand lower in the estimation of the hon. baronet than I do in my own, as to my own pretensions, I will (to use the language of a Statesman so eminent that I cannot presume to quote his words without an apology,) I will, as long as I have the faculty to think and act for myself, “look those proud combinations in the face.”—I plead guilty, then, to the charge, if it be one, of having treated with an Administration, with the principles of which I perfectly agreed. I plead guilty to the charge, if it be one, of having on this, ay, and on other occasions, postponed my own interest to that of my friends. If, indeed, the charge could be turned the other way, if occupied exclusively with any personal objects of my own, it could be said that I had neglected the claims, the interests, or the feelings of any individual connected with me in political life, I should indeed hear that charge with sensations very different from those which I now experience; then, indeed, should I hide my head with shame. When I moved the writ of my right hon. friend, on the 30th of July, I declare, upon my honour, that I thought it very doubtful whether I should myself have any official connection whatever with the Government. I do not mean to say, that the question had not been mooted, as to my undertaking the mission to Portugal, if it should turn out that such a mission was to be sent. But many circumstances might have prevented the result that did afterwards happen. I was not pledged, I was very far from having made up my own mind to accept the mission if it should be offered to me; nor had the Government as yet any assurance that they should have it to offer. I had previously made arrangements of my own. My plans were to go where I did go, but from different motives and with a different object. What that object and those motives were, I am not called upon, nor do I think it necessary, to state in this place. It is sufficient for me to say that I was master of my own actions, and that I chose to go. My intention was known to my private friends, and had been communicated to my constituents two months before the close of the Session. The first official tender of the mission was made to me by my noble friend, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, I think about the end of the first week of August: I cannot be positive as to the day; but I recollect perfectly that I had but two interviews with my noble friend upon the subject, within a few days of each other, and that at the date of one of those interviews Mr. Sydenham had arrived in England. He arrived on or about the 8th of August. My noble friend was then on the eve of his departure for Vienna. His tender to me was altogether contingent and conditional. The way in which the matter was left, was this: that if the certainty of the Prince Regent of Portugal's immediate return should be established, I should hear from him (or, in his absence, from Lord Liverpool) again. I did hear again, in the manner that I have stated: but, in proof that I had not, in the mean time, acted on the presumption that I should go out in an official character, I can appeal to some of the members of the Board of Admiralty who sit near me, that I was so late as in the month of September a supplicant at the Admiralty, as a private person, for a ship to convey me and my family to Lisbon; and when I arrived in Portugal, I found a house provided for me, as a private person, through the kindness of a friend, a house in the neighbourhood of Lisbon, which, in my official character, I could not occupy. But all this, it may be said, was but contrivance, an artificial chain of circumstances forged and linked together, with a view to the present discussion. Has such an imputation the colour of probability? What I have now stated both as to facts and motives is the truth. If any man shall contradict this statement, I can only say that he will affirm that which is not true. Where a matter rests, and from its nature must rest solely, on the consciousness of an individual, there is no other answer (that I know of) to be given to an arbitrary contradiction. I speak this, I hope, without offence. But on this part of my case, I know of no other possible answer. I did not believe then in the intention of the Prince Regent to return. The Government believed in it. Their belief would have been ground enough for mine. But I have shewn that they had good grounds for their belief. Further, it appears, from what has been stated by the gallant Admiral behind me, (Sir J. Beresford), in anticipation of a question which I might perhaps have taken the liberty to put to him, that not only had the royal family really entertained that intention, but that the disposition to carry it into execution survived the report of its abandonment; that he was repeatedly requested by the Prince Regent of Portugal to defer his departure from Rio de Janeiro from time to time, in hopes that the next arrivals from Europe might bring intelligence decisive of the voyage; and that it was not until the beginning of April that those hopes were finally relinquished, and the gallant Admiral permitted to take his leave. Contrary and contradictory rumours did, no doubt, continue to prevail on this subject, in London, as they certainly did in Lisbon. Even when I received at Lisbon in the beginning of April 1815 the first intimation from England on which I founded my resignation, I was in possession of most positive assurances the other way; and on the very day on which I sent off my resignation, I had heard through what I might have considered as authentic channels, that the Prince would certainly embark. The day was specified on which the embarkation was to take place; and we were to look for the first news of that event in the arrival of the squadron off the bar. But did I act on this information? Did I endeavour to shake any credit which the Government at home might be disposed to give to their accounts from Rio de Janeiro? Did I contrast the rumours of Lisbon with the rumours of London, for the purpose of clinging to my office? No. It appears from the papers on the table, that upon the 29th of March the information of the Prince Regent's abandonment of his design was received here in an official shape. Probably this official information must have been preceded some days by private intelligence. The intimation which reached me on the 9th of April certainly was not official; I did not wait however for its official confirmation: on the 10th of April, I wrote and sent off by an express packet the following despatch to the Foreign Office:—

“By the mails which came in yesterday, I learn, (though not officially,) that the accounts received in England from Rio de Janeiro, since Admiral Sir John Beresford's arrival there, create a doubt of the Prince Regent of Portugal's present intention to return to his European dominions. Nothing has been received here from the Brazils which indicates any such change in his Royal Highness's intention. But should any impediments have been interposed to delay the execution of it, until the intelligence of the late astonishing and afflicting revolution in the state of Europe shall reach Rio de Janeiro, it is possible that the receipt of that intelligence may determine his Royal Highness to remain there for the present. In that case, or in the event of your lordship's receiving such positive accounts as satisfy your lordship's mind that such a determination has been taken by the Prince Regent of Portugal, I have to request your lordship to lay at the feet of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent my humble resignation of the commission with which he was graciously pleased to honour me, in contemplation of the Prince Regent of Portugal's return." So much for the first head of the charge against me, and against the Government. I have shewn, I hope to the satisfaction of the House, that we did believe in the return of the Court of Portugal to Europe; that we had good grounds for that belief; and that, upon that belief exclusively, any mission to Lisbon was founded. Remains to be considered, whether upon that ground such a mission was necessary or justifiable. And this question again divides itself into two heads: first, whether necessary at all; secondly, (if admitted to be necessary), whether conducted on a scale of disproportionate expense—disproportionate either to the unavoidable expenditure of the mission, or to its political importance. In the first of these questions, Was an embassy to Lisbon necessary, in the event of the Prince Regent's return?—is involved another more personal question, from which I must not shrink; namely, was there any unfitness in the offer of that mission to me, or in my acceptance of it? I feel all the difficulty of arguing this point in a manner at once satisfactory to the House and not just to myself. It is distasteful and revolting to one's feelings to be obliged to speak of one's self, and of one's own fitness for any situation, or any undertaking. But it will be remembered, that I am upon my trial—that I am defending myself against a criminal charge; and if in such a defence something like egotism should be unavoidable, I hope the House will have the goodness to excuse it. But, to place this question in its true point of view, I must once more go back to the year 1807. I have said that when in that year the royal family of Portugal adopted the resolution of emigrating to the Brazils, I had the honour to hold the seals of the Foreign Office. I had thus an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the wishes of the Prince Regent of Portugal in favour of Lord Strangford, who had been employed to advise and to urge that splendid and magnanimous emigration. It was my duty to report these wishes, and to recommend the services of Lord Strangford to the consideration of my Royal Master. The result was, that his lordship was appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary; was invested with a red ribbon; and might also have received an advance in the peerage; which (for reasons nothing to the purpose of this night's discussion) he declined. There was, however, another point respecting which the Court of Portugal was extremely solicitous—a reciprocation of missions of the highest rank: and this point, from the period of which I am speaking to the last moment at which I held the seals of office, the Portuguese Minister never lost an opportunity of pressing upon my attention. It has been said by shrewd observers of domestic politics, that when once a coronet gets into a man's head, there is no driving it out again; and I believe it may be as justly said, that when once a court takes up the notion of reciprocation of embassies, it is no easy matter to get the better of it. Such a notion reproduces itself on every occasion. A Secretary of State is sure to be assailed with repeated solicitation till the favourite measure is accomplished. To this application Lord Strangford did not listen. And I believe I reconciled the Court of Portugal to the refusal of it, by shewing that it could not then be granted in the person of Lord Strangford; whose diplomatic standing would not admit of such an advancement, having been already so recently raised from the station of Chargé d'Affaires. I promised, however, that on the occurrence of any signal event which might constitute a proper occasion for an embassy, (and the two possible events in contemplation were either the final establishment of the Portuguese Court at the Brazils—should the cause of Europe be lost,—or, what was then a distant, though never with me a hopeless prospect, its restoration to Europe on a successful termination of the war,) I would recommend to my Sovereign, should I be then in office, a compliance with the wishes of the Court of Portugal. Long after I quitted office, and more than once or twice, or three times, I was appealed to for the truth of the assertion, that such a promise had been given; not that any engagement of mine could be binding on my successors. At last (I believe in 1811) without waiting for these long-coming events, the Portuguese Minister here assumed the character of ambassador. The reciprocation was declined. Much discussion, it seems, followed during the three succeeding years upon the refusal to name an ambassador at the Court of Brazil; and I perfectly remember, that in one of the conversations which I had with my noble friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, he reminded me of the circumstances which I have here recapitulated, and observed, "We shall, besides, thus have the long-disputed point of a reciprocation of embassies settled, and your pledge to the Court of Portugal redeemed in your own person." If it is supposed by hon. gentlemen, that the aggregate allowances of the mission were necessarily increased by giving the name and rank of Ambassador, instead of that of Envoy Extraordinary, to my appointment, I assure them they are mistaken. The question of expense I reserve for separate consideration; but as it here mixes itself with the question of the rank of the mission, I am compelled shortly to advert to it, a little before its time. There are (or were before the regulation of 1815) two different scales of ambassadorial allowances: the higher scale with a salary of 11,000*l.* a year, and the other, on what is called the old salary of 8,200*l.* The difference between these two salaries is nearly the same as the difference between the lower of them and that of an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, which is 5,200*l.* Now, Sir, a man who covered an Embassy for the sake of emolument would hardly fail, once Ambassador, to choose the higher scale of salary. I chose the lower. But I do not claim any merit from this preference. For, as neither 5,200*l.* (the salary of Envoy Extraordinary,) nor 8,200*l.* (the salary of Ambassador on the old scale,) nor even the higher salary of 11,000*l.* reduced by deductions at home and abroad, was expected to cover all the expenses of the mission, without any addition of extraordinaries (as I shall presently shew) it became indifferent in that point of view, what should be the nominal rank of the mission. But it was not indifferent in other respects. I flatter myself, that I shall not be suspected of the idle and stupid vanity of caring under what name I did the public business. I believe, however, that it will be generally acknowledged, that having once, with however little pretension to so high a station, filled that office which presides over the diplomacy of the country, I could not consistently assume any other than the highest diplomatic rank—that which alone represents the Sovereign—in any mission on which I should happen to be employed. Much less could I have done so with propriety on a mission to the Court of Portugal, with which I had, as Secretary of State, engaged for those exertions, and (sanguinely perhaps, but, as it has turned out, safely) anticipated those results, by which that Court was now enabled, if it so thought fit, to accomplish its return to Europe. But neither was the question of what might be individually becoming, the whole of this question. The character of Ambassador, though it may make little difference here, where every negotiation passes through responsible Ministers, is by no means a matter of indifference in many foreign courts. The mere question of precedence, trifling as it may seem in itself, is not a thing of no moment in diplomatic transactions. The facility of access to the person of the Sovereign, without the intervention of a Minister, perhaps hostile to our interests, and the right of precedence of that Sovereign himself, are advantages of no inconsiderable moment in courts where the will of the Sovereign is mainly the policy of the State. But what good did I expect to achieve through these advantages? What was there for me to do? What did I expect to be able to do? First, it was not for me to judge of my own qualifications: it was for the Government. I might entrench myself behind this answer. But in the spirit in which I am stating my argument, taking the defence of the Government upon myself (as my noble friend has taken mine upon the Government) I will not do so. I must again remind the House, that I speak of myself only because I am upon my trial. With the allowance belonging to that consideration I may be permitted to say, I think that there was good to be done; and I think that I had as fair means, and as probable a chance as any other man of doing it. I pass by many obvious difficulties and embarrassments in the present state of the relations of the Court of Portugal with other Governments in Europe, which might have been avoided had that Court returned. But there is one subject which seems to be comparatively forgotten at this moment, but which in 1814 (the year of my appointment) was the theme of loud remonstrance and incessant reproach against the Government, as though they had been indifferent or lukewarm in their exertions upon it—I mean the Slave Trade. I did hope to be able to effect something on this great and interesting subject. I cannot conceive a more favourable opportunity for this purpose than would have been afforded by the return of the Prince Regent to the kingdom of his ancestors: a kingdom saved, through the blessing of Providence upon the arms and counsels of this country. Of those counsels I had, from my official situation, been the humble instrument and organ: nor was it perhaps altogether an unreasonable presumption, to hope that the share which I had accidentally had in them might have conciliated, even to so humble an individual as myself, something of kindness from the Sovereign whose crown and whose dominions had been thus preserved and restored to him. I say, therefore, Sir, I cannot conceive circumstances which would have afforded a better chance of making some impression on the mind of a prince naturally good, naturally religious, upon a matter in which his personal character was the best, perhaps the one, hope of success. I can assure the hon. gentlemen, that of the instructions which I carried out with me, three-fourths were directed to this object. And, besides the instructions of my noble friend, the Secretary of State, I had with me ample and most useful suggestions from an hon. friend of mine (Mr. Willoughby) whom I do not now see in his place, should not have lain idle in my desk. I had nothing, indeed, from the "oratory" which hon. baronet is pleased (I suppose ironically) to attribute to me; but much from a good cause in zealous hands. I did believe—I do still believe, that had I had the opportunity of personal intercourse with the prince, I might have effected some good in this matter; and if it had pleased God that I should succeed in it, I should neither have thought the expenses of my mission ill employed, nor have felt any disparagement to myself in having undertaken it. So much for the objects in contemplation at the commencement of the mission. But these objects were not attained.—True. And it is supposed, that not to have attained them was to me matter of great disappointment. In one sense, undoubtedly it was so. I should have thought the settlement of the question of the Slave Trade with one of the peninsular powers, an object of importance not easily to be over-rated. In another sense, I do assure the hon. baronet and the hon. gentleman, that I had not experienced one half of the satisfaction in accepting my office which I felt when I was permitted to resign it. When, after writing the letter of April the 10th, tendering my resignation, I yielded to the request of my noble friend, and consented to remain at my post so long as my services might be thought necessary, I must beg the House to observe, that the whole question of the mission had assumed an entirely new form. The war had broken out; and if there had not then been a Minister of high diplomatic rank at Lisbon, it would have been absolutely necessary to appoint one. I failed, it is true, in the main object of my negotiations during the war—the obtaining the aid of a corps of Portuguese troops to act with the Allies in Flanders. But why did I fail? Precisely because that state of things existed in Portugal—because that form of local government remained there, which it was the interest and the wish of this country to see altered. I failed because the Sovereign himself was not at Lisbon: an additional proof, if any had been wanting, of the advisableness of that return which we had endeavoured to invite by every proper inducement—an additional proof of the inconvenience of leaving one of the kingdoms of Europe with which Great Britain is most intimately allied, under a delegated government; a government incapable, from the very nature of their trust and from the immensity of distance which separates them from their Sovereign, of acting in all cases with the promptness and energy necessary for the glory of the absent Sovereign, and for the welfare of his people. Sir, I venture to hope that the House will feel that I have satisfactorily disposed of the first part of the question as to the embassy, and justified the nomination of a mission of that character, on the supposition (which I had before justified) of the Prince Regent of Portugal's return. I now proceed to the second part of that question—the expense of the mission. If there was no delusion in the cause assigned for the embassy, if I have shewn that it was necessary or highly expedient in the case supposed to exist, it still remains to be inquired whether or not it was conducted on too costly a scale.

I must observe, however, again, that if the belief in the return of the Prince and the expediency of an embassy to welcome him are not made out, one farthing of expenditure was too much; and if, therefore, in the opinion of one honest and impartial man who has heard me, what I have stated appears to be founded in fraud or artifice, the question of pecuniary expense is at an end. On the other hand, if I have been so far successful, I am prepared to challenge a like decision on the issue now to be joined; and to demonstrate that the cost of this mission was not only not prodigal in proportion to its rank and character, but that it was economical, in comparison with any standard with which it can in fairness be compared. The hon. baronet has quoted a dictum of Sir Robert Walpole's, that "every man has his price." I do not think this maxim true of men—I do not think it true that even every thing has its price. Things must be estimated, not merely by their intrinsic qualities, but by their relative fitness and value. There is no rule for judging absolutely what ought to be the cost of an embassy. There is no forming such an estimate a priori. Facts and experience are the only grounds on which you can safely or justly proceed. I beg gentlemen, then, to look at the printed accounts of missions in the years 1812, 1813, and 1814, and I ask, who could tell, on going to Lisbon, in the autumn of the latter year, what his expenses were likely to be? Who is there that having before him the expenditure of Sir Charles Stuart, for the years 1812-13, and 1813-14, would have ventured upon such a mission without coming to some understanding as to the extent of his expenditure, and as to the principles of its limitation? I shall perhaps surprise the hon. baronet, when I confess that an application on the subject of extraordinaries was made by me to the Government. But in what sense was this application made? Was it for latitude and indulgence? Was it that I might be put upon the same footing and allowed the same range as my predecessor? No, Sir; it was for strictness, for definition, for restraint. In the beginning of October I wrote a letter to my noble friend, Lord Liverpool, (my noble friend near him was then abroad,) an extract of which, with their permission, I will now read to the House. The House will see that it was of as private and familiar a style, and as little destined for public citation, as that from Lord Liverpool to me which I read to the House a short time ago:—"I have been looking over Stuart's Extraordinaries, and they really frighten me. It may be very well for him, or any man not connected with politics, to draw thus at discretion; but it would not do for me. For God's sake limit me to what you think right; I can form no judgment of the matter: only limit me, so that I may have no responsibility." This letter shews at least the quo animo, the disposition, with which I entered upon the subject. Is this the language of rapacity? Is this a petition for large emolument and unbounded discretion? Or does it not rather indicate a cautious dislike of discretionary power, arising from a dread of responsibility, and an anticipation of injustice? The former of which I am not ashamed of confessing I did feel; the latter, I have at this moment, God knows, no reason to disavow. Sir, in entering upon this most disagreeable discussion—disagreeable because I must mention the names of honourable men in a way which may be liable to misconstruction—disagreeable, because I must speak (though but to repel them with scorn) of imputations with which I never thought my own name liable to be stained—I beg leave to preface what I have to say, by observing, that the name of Sir Charles Stuart, or of any other person whom I may have occasion to mention in my defence, is brought forward by me most reluctantly. I have no choice. The necessity is forced upon me. The name of Sir Charles Stuart I mention with the respect due to his talents and character. I consider him as one who has rendered eminent services to his country, and from whom his country may confidently look for such services hereafter. I believe him to be as free from pecuniary taint—as I know myself to be. Large as his expenditure at Lisbon may appear, I am persuaded that it was at once justified and limited by the necessity of the case. It is to be borne in mind also that of the aggregate sums, which appear to have been expended by him, no small proportion was simply and absolutely lost upon the Exchange and upon the conversion of English into Portuguese money. After these declarations, I proceed to state the expenditure of the Lisbon mission, as it stood in Sir C. Stuart's time; and the amount of his regular and extraordinary allowances. For the year, from the 5th of April, 1812, to the 5th of April, 1813, Sir Charles Stuart's Extraordinaries appear to have been . . . £ 26,807

Total £ 32,007

For the next year, from the 5th of April, 1813, to the 5th of April, 1814, the extraordinaries are stated at £ 26,006

This was the conclusion of Sir Charles Stuart's mission. These statements are all before the House. They are to be found in pages 90 and 91 of the Report of the Committee on the Civil List, in June, 1815;—which Report I wish that the hon. gentlemen opposite would have the goodness to take into their hands, as I shall have many occasions to refer to it. Then comes a period which is particularly selected as a contrast to my expenditure;—namely, the half year, beginning the 5th of April, 1814; (the termination of Sir Charles Stuart's mission,) and ending the 10th of October, 1814, (the commencement of mine). Here my accusers take their grand position. This is the narrow isthmus between two rushing seas of expense, on which they plant their standard of economy!—I do not complain of them for doing so. I do not blame the hon. gentleman who brought forward this question, for moving for papers to illustrate this position. But what I do think I have some right to complain of is, that having obtained these documents, they have some how or other totally forgotten to notice their results. When it suited the hon. mover's purpose, he asked for the information; and when he got it, and found that it was not precisely what he wanted, it suited his purpose to abstain from any observation upon it. In this respect, he will excuse me if, instead of following his example, I endeavour to supply his omissions. At Sir Charles Stuart's departure from Lisbon, Mr. Casamajor, the Secretary of Legation, was appointed Chargé d'Affaires, receiving of course the regular salary belonging to these two appointments. As Mr. Casamajor's salary during this half year was nearly the same as his salary of Secretary of Embassy with me, and made but a trifling part of the expenses of either Mission, I shall not take it into calculation. Not so, however, as to his Extraordinary allowances; which during this economical half-year appear by the Civil List Report, p. 32, as well as by Mr. Sydenham's testimony, to have amounted to upwards of 2,500*l*. I am not exactly informed at what period between April and July Mr. Sydenham was named Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Local Government of Portugal. The first official despatch to him that I have seen is dated in July; but his nomination must have preceded that despatch by some weeks. He had from the 5th of April the same salary as had been enjoyed by Sir Charles Stuart. I speak here of the regular salary of 5,200*l*. a year,—not of extraordinary allowances. Mr. Sydenham arrived at Lisbon the end of the first week of July. He remained there until the 27th or 28th of that month, when he embarked for England, being obliged to quit his station suddenly on account of his health. These three weeks (or thereabouts) were the whole of Mr. Sydenham's residence at Lisbon; and for these he received (I am not blaming him, but I state the fact) two quarters' salary at the rate of 5,200*l*. a year—that is to say £ 2,600 0 0 he received also, for outfit, . . . 1,500 0 0 he received for his journey to Lisbon 1,100 0 0 and lastly he received (at a subsequent period) for losses occasioned by his sudden relinquishment of the Mission . . . 2,000 0 0

Add to this sum, Mr. Casamajor's Extraordinaries for the same period 2,500 0 0

The result of cost to the public, for the half year intervening between Sir C. Stuart's Mission and mine, is therefore . . . £9,700 0 0

This was the reformed period which is to put all past and future Ministers to shame! This was the rigid scale of economy which I ought to have taken for my guide, and for departing from which I am arraigned before this House and the country! Yet hear how Mr. Sydenham describes Mr. Casamajor's way of life. "I find," (says Mr. Sydenham, in his letter to Mr. Hamilton of the 8th July, written immediately upon his arrival at Lisbon): "I find that Mr. Casamajor has been living in a very quiet retired way, with no suite to feed and lodge; and by the examination of his books I perceive that he does not live on less than 100*l.* a week." Here was no establishment, no representation, no call for display of any kind; and yet the ordinary expenses of Mr. Casamajor's household were 100*l.* a week, or at the rate of 5,200*l.* a year. It is true, at least I have heard and believe, that during the three weeks that Mr. Sydenham passed at Lisbon he lived in Mr. Casamajor's house. But, as to charge upon the public, Mr. Sydenham was then in the enjoyment of a yearly salary of 5,200*l.* which comes to exactly another 100*l.* a week. So that independently of the extraordinary allowances of Mr. Sydenham, for outfit, journey, and losses, the aggregate of the regular salary received by him, joined to the extraordinaries allowed to Mr. Casamajor for weekly expenditure, for victus and convictus, during the economical half year, was at the rate of upwards of 10,000*l.* a year. There is not upon earth a more honourable mind than Mr. Casamajor's; and I had myself the opportunity of verifying the statement respecting his expenditure, by the inspection of his books, at his own particular desire. But I must take the liberty of reminding the House, that from the moment at which I arrived at Lisbon, Mr. Casamajor, then becoming Secretary of Embassy, became part of my family; and as such, lived at my table. From that time therefore his expenses (salary excepted) were involved in mine. Why, Sir, if I were to calculate by simple addition, or by the rule of three, I might say, that, according to what I have shewn you, on Mr. Sydenham's testimony as well as my own, two Casamajors ought to have eaten up my whole allowances, ordinary and extraordinary. And, by the way, I had two Casamajors, for in addition to the gentleman of whom I have been speaking, and of whom I speak with every feeling of kindness and of respect, another gentleman, Mr. Croft, who was recommended to me by my noble friend as Secretary for the Portuguese language, (and who had been with Sir C. Stuart in the same capacity), lived with me as one of my family, during the whole period of my mission. I, of course, do not mean seriously to state that the increase of my expenses was in exact proportion to the number of persons whom I had to maintain. But I do mean seriously to shew the different footing upon which Mr. Sydenham and Mr. Casamajor separately,—or even Mr. Sydenham and Mr. Casamajor jointly,—stood, in respect to the claims upon their expenditure, from that in which I stood, with all the necessary burdens, and all the unavoidable representation, of an Embassy. With neither of the two gentlemen, whom I had the good fortune to have attached to me, Mr. Casamajor or Mr. Croft, had I any personal acquaintance before my mission began. I learnt, during our official and domestic intercourse, to value and esteem them both. I am sorry to be forced to mention their names in connection with these miserable details; but I am driven to it by the unsparing coarseness of the attacks which have been made upon me, and by the foolish, fallacious, and dishonest contrast of my expenditure with that of Mr. Sydenham: Mr. Sydenham's, who, during his three weeks' residence at Lisbon, was an inmate in the house of Mr. Casamajor, and mine, who, during the whole period of my mission, had the suite of an Embassy to maintain! And now, Sir, come we to the famous letter of letters, upon which it seems that the whole of the case against me is made to turn, the letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Sydenham, directing him to confine his expenditure within his regular allowances. Before this letter is made conclusive against me, I might perhaps contend that it should be shewn that I was, in some degree, if not party to it, cognizant of it. Upon my honour, I never saw it till after the hon. gentleman's first notice of his motion. I cannot say that I had never heard of it. I had heard, or perhaps seen in a newspaper, that some such letter had been written to Mr. Sydenham by my noble friend: and I well remember that the same authority stated the rate of 5,000*l.* a year as that which covered all Mr. Sydenham's allowances. I have already shewn the accuracy of that statement. But I waive this plea: I acknowledge the authority of the letter; and if the circumstances of Mr. Sydenham's situation and mine were the same, and if the meaning of this letter was what has been attributed to it, and if that meaning was enforced against Mr. Sydenham, or was not remonstrated against by him, I will admit that, notwithstanding my ignorance of the law, I was bound by it, and am guilty of not conforming to it. And, first, what was Mr. Sydenham's situation? That of Envoy to the Local Government; mine, that of Ambassador to the Sovereign. (With the propriety of the appointment we have in this part of the argument nothing to do.) Secondly, What was the meaning of the letter? My noble friend, the writer of it, has told you, that it did not mean the absolute exclusion of extraordinaries, which he held to be almost impossible; but it did mean to prescribe the discontinuance of that rate of expenditure which had brought, during the war, such heavy charge upon the public. The letter itself says: "I cannot anticipate any public grounds for continuing the expenditure of his Majesty's servants at Lisbon, on the scale on which it has been conducted during the continuance of the war in the Peninsula."—To be sure he could not. Who dreamt of an expenditure of upwards of 30,000*l.* a year in time of peace?—Lastly, the instructions which were given, were they executed? Did Mr. Sydenham think it practicable to conform to them? Did he receive them without a remonstrance, and act up to them with strictness and fidelity?—With fidelity, in the moral sense of the word, I have no doubt he would have acted up to them if he had remained at Lisbon; but have we no positive proof that he regarded the literal execution of them as impossible? And here, Sir, again I feel myself called upon to guard against being supposed to mean any thing unkind in the reference which I am compelled to make to Mr. Sydenham. That gentleman is no more! He has closed a distinguished and honourable life, during which he endeared himself to his friends, and has left behind him an unspotted character. I imagine of those who hear me, that if a word should escape me in the heat of argument, which can be thought to bear any colour of disrespect to Mr. Sydenham's memory, they will believe it to be wholly unintentional. I am the last man living who would wantonly throw a star upon his reputation, or give a wound to the feelings of those who mourn his loss. I would most gladly have avoided any allusion to him: but his name has been made the vehicle for a foul calumny against my character; and the House will feel that not to me who repel an attack, but to those who have misused Mr. Sydenham's name for the purpose of attack upon me, is to be imputed the guilt of profaning (if it be profaned) the sanctity of the tomb. The fact is, that while the mandate to Mr. Sydenham, directing him to confine his expenses within certain limits, was traversing the ocean in one direction, a remonstrance by anticipation against such a limitation was on its passage to the Foreign Office. Mr. Sydenham, I suppose, might have heard rumours of such intended restriction; he knew, from what he saw of Lisbon himself (in the amount of Mr. Casamajor's weekly bills), and from what he had heard of it from others, that a literal compliance with that restriction was impracticable; and, on the 8th of July, the very day (I believe) after his arrival at Lisbon, he thus addressed himself to Mr. Hamilton, the Under Secretary of State, (for the information of my noble friend,) in the letter from which I have already quoted an extract: "While the Duke of Wellington was at Madrid, he spoke to me on the subject of my allowances at Lisbon, and he gave me the comfortable assurance of my being ruined, unless Government allowed me something more than the usual salary, diminished by the usual deductions in England, and the loss of exchange. He promised to mention the subject to Lord Castlereagh; and I have written to him to remind him of his promise. I find that Mr. Casamajor has been living in a very quiet retired way, with no more to feed and lodge, and by the examination of his books, I perceive that he does not live on less than 100*l.* a week." So far is printed. Further on, in the same letter, the extract of which now lies before me, he states, that he "shall live with the greatest possible economy, but that what he cannot pay out of his allowances, he shall trust to the Government to pay for him." Mr. Sydenham, as I have before observed, resided about three weeks in Lisbon, namely, from about the 7th or 8th to the 27th or 28th of July. I have already stated the allowances, regular and extraordinary, which he received during that period, or on account of it, viz. 2,600*l.* salary; 1,500*l.* outfit; 1,100*l.* for the journey from Paris and Madrid to Lisbon. All these sums are in the printed accounts of the Civil List Report; and, therefore, gentlemen might have known these without moving for papers: but I was not aware, and I suppose they were not aware, till in an evil hour they brought it out by their own motion for papers, of the sum of 2,000*l.* for losses, which makes up the aggregate of Mr. Sydenham's receipts, on account of his half-year's mission, to 7,200*l.* If it is said, that as this sum of 7,200*l.* includes outfit, and allowances for journey and for losses, it is not fairly to be stated as Mr. Sydenham's expenditure for half a year, I readily admit that it is not so: but then I must observe, that on the same ground the aggregate of my allowances cannot be fairly stated as the expenditure of a year. The cost of outfit and plate in my case would not have been repeated another year: any more than that of outfit, and allowances for journey and for losses, would, in Mr. Sydenham's case, have been repeated in another half year. But it is quite fair, it is indeed absolutely necessary, since the contrast between Mr. Sydenham's half year and my year has been so much insisted on, to state, as I have done, Mr. Sydenham's salary joined to Mr. Casamajor's extraordinaries for the same half year, as constituting the expenditure of the mission for that period. And it is fair to state the whole of Mr. Sydenham's receipts joined to Mr. Casamajor's extraordinaries, as the aggregate expense of that half year, with which the aggregate of my receipts for a whole year is to be compared. Whatever comments, therefore, gentlemen may think proper to make on my conduct in other respects, they will at least, I think, abandon the contrast between Mr. Sydenham's mission and mine as to the rate of their respective cost to the public. This point, on which they relied so confidently, completely fails them. They may, if they will, continue to arraign my political views; but, if comparison with the period of Mr. Sydenham's mission be a decisive test of economy, they must on that comparison absolve me from pecuniary transgression. But, Sir, it is not on pecuniary matters only that they have wrong as to me and Mr. Sydenham. They flattered themselves that they had another case against me on his account; a case of hardship, as if this valuable public servant had been displaced purposely to make way for me. It has been asserted, that I superseded Mr. Sydenham. Sir, I did not supersede Mr. Sydenham. If the fact were so, I know not that it would constitute any charge against me. It would, I believe, be the first time that the undoubted right of the Crown to appoint and to change its foreign Ministers has been made matter of charge, or even of question, in Parliament. But the fact is not so. Mr. Sydenham's mission was irretrievably at an end before mine began. He quitted Lisbon not only unrecalled, but without leave. He did this from necessity, on account of the impaired state of his health. He arrived in England (as I have already had occasion to say) on or about the 8th of August. From that day to the 10th of October he received in England his appointments as Minister at Lisbon. Are the economists angry that he did not continue so to receive them longer? He was neither then, nor at any subsequent period before his death, (as I shall presently shew, by a document founded on his own representations,) in a state of health to admit of his resuming the Lisbon mission, or accepting any other. If he had happily been so, my noble friend will bear testimony not only to the fact, but to my knowledge of the fact, that another and more important employment was in contemplation for him.—So much for that charge. I have in my hand a copy of the letter from the Foreign Office to the Treasury, which authorized the payment to Mr. Sydenham of that sum of 2,000*l.* for losses, which forms the last item in his account. I almost wonder, by the bye, that I have not been told in distinct terms that this 2,000*l.* was given to Mr. Sydenham to reconcile him to my supersession of him. The House, if they will allow me to take the liberty of reading this letter to them, will see how that matter stands. I am ready to move for its being laid on the table, if they think it necessary. It is luckily the last document of the kind with which I shall have occasion to try their patience. It is as follows:—

" My Lords,

" Thomas Sydenham, Esq. late his Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Lisbon, has represented to me the very great expense he was at in making preparations to undertake that mission, with a view to a permanent residence at Lisbon, and the great loss he sustained by the sudden disposal of his effects, &c. on his being obliged to relinquish that mission, on account of the dangerous state of his health, after a residence of only a few months, whereby he has been a loser of considerably more than two thousand pounds, and is thereby involved in difficulties beyond the reach of his private fortune to satisfy. (There is a slight error of inadvertency here as to the period of Mr. Sydenham's actual residence at Lisbon, which was, as I have shewn, weeks only and not months. I now come to a passage to which I particularly wish to call the attention of the House.)—Having considered this application, it has appeared to me, under the peculiar circumstances of the case (Mr. Sydenham's state of health still preventing his being employed in the diplomatic service of his Majesty), to be just and reasonable, that Mr. Sydenham should receive a compensation on account of these losses. I am therefore to desire your Lordships will be pleased to take the commands of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, with regard to the issue of the sum of two thousand pounds, net, to Mr. Sydenham, or his assigns, as a compensation for the losses above stated." Is this also a sham letter and a concerted fraud? Perhaps the date will help us to a solution of this question. It is dated the 25th October, 1815; that is to say, six months after I had tendered the resignation of my mission, and three months after my resignation had been accepted; a period, therefore, when, if Mr. Sydenham's health had been sufficiently restored to enable him to resume his station at Lisbon, there had been for three months no impediment whatever, and for six months no impediment on my part, to his resuming it. It was manifestly the hopelessness of his return to public life that weighed with the Foreign-office in writing this letter; to which I am happy to have had an opportunity of referring, both for the proof which it affords of a good-natured and considerate disposition, and the just testimony which it bears to the merits and character of Mr. Sydenham. I had not the honour and the happiness of a personal acquaintance with Mr. Sydenham. I knew him only by reputation, by the report of common friends, whose report would of itself have been sufficient to ensure my belief of his good qualities, and by the exhibition of his talents in that memorable investigation which was carried on in a Committee of this House upon the renewal of the East India Company's Charter. In the course of that examination the gentlemen connected with India displayed a degree of ability and information, which perhaps could not have been matched, certainly not excelled, in any other service, or in any other country. Among these very able men, Mr. Sydenham stood eminently distinguished, evincing a capacity for great affairs, and a fitness for important employments, such as are rarely to be found even in more practised Statesmen. If, therefore, I have been driven to say any thing of this gentleman (I hope I have not, I am sure I have not intended it) which may have appeared in any degree disrespectful or disparaging, if I have been obliged to soil the name of a high-minded and liberal man with money, the blame (I repeat it) is not with me, but with those who forced Mr. Sydenham's name into this discussion. I now, Sir, come to the details of the expenditure of my own mission, the account of which is among the papers upon the table. The

hon. gent. who made the motion, has had the goodness to compliment me on the minuteness and accuracy of my calculations. I understand the nature of the hon. gentleman's compliment; and I see that he has been taught thoroughly to understand the nature of the advantage which he has over me on this day. Undoubtedly any charge connected with money places the accused in a dilemma of painful difficulty—a difficulty the more painful in proportion to the consciousness of his innocence, and to the warmth of his indignation. If he contents himself, as is the first natural impulse of every honourable mind, with general and lofty denial, he exposes himself to be triumphed over as having evaded investigation; and figures are then invoked as the only test of truth. If on the other hand he condescends to detailed arithmetical calculation, he becomes liable to such compliments as those of the hon. gentleman; and must feel (as I do now) a certain inevitable degradation in the very process by which he is to be justified. It is certainly not without such pain that I made up my mind to this latter alternative. Those who know me in private life are, I am afraid, too well aware how little I am versed in questions either of arithmetic or of economy, not to have been as much surprised, as the hon. gentleman professes himself to be gratified, at the proficiency in figures which is displayed in the papers before the House; particularly in that laboured despatch of mine of the 30th of May, 1815. In truth, I availed myself, for the purpose of those statements and calculations, of the aid of persons much more conversant with such matters than I can pretend to be. I beg the hon. gent. also to understand, that I do not profess, in these accounts, to state my whole expenditure at Lisbon, but only my expenditure of public money. Sir, the expenditure of Sir Charles Stuart's mission for the two years, 1812-13, and 1813-14, and that of the interval between the conclusion of Sir Charles Stuart's mission and my appointment, can hardly be denied to justify the nominal amount of the allowances assigned to me. But that nominal amount and the real effective value were very different indeed. For my actual expenditure (as distinguished from nominal receipts, or rather nominal issue), a fair but strict standard of comparison is furnished by the Report of the Civil List Committee of June, 1815. If it shall appear that my whole actual expenditure as Ambassador, tallied within a very trifle with the amount fixed by that Committee and sanctioned by the House for a Minister, at Lisbon, of the second order, I think it will not be imputed that I abused the discretion confided to me. Assuredly I did not, on going out to Lisbon, anticipate the trial of this day: but I did, as has been seen, dread and deprecate any unlimited pecuniary discretion. It has been shewn how anxious I was to have the limits of my expenditure defined: and within those limits, whatever they might be, I resolved to restrict myself. My nominal allowances were, as I have said, and as appears from the papers upon the table,

Of this amount of extraordinaries I drew only for three-fourths, or 4,500*l.* I received (like every other Minister of whatever rank) the sum of 1,500*l.* for outfit. If that sum be taken as replacing the 1,500*l.* extraordinaries which I declined to draw, the result of salary, extraordinaries, and outfit, for that one year (outfit could only be a charge on the first year) is, as above, 14,200*l.* I had plate, like other Ambassadors and Envoys Extraordinary, &c., but upon the scale of an Envoy. Having no rule or experience to guide me, all that I could determine was to consider the established recognized amount of the salary as the limit of my public expenditure; and to draw for no more extraordinaries than should make up the nominal salary of 8,200*l.* to that effective amount. Had, therefore, that salary been paid free from deductions at home, and without loss on the exchange and on the conversion into Portuguese money, I should not have drawn for one shilling of extraordinaries for my expenses at Lisbon. But the case was very different. This nominal salary was liable to deductions amounting to no less than about sixteen per cent. in England, which reduced it from 8,200*l.* to about 6,900*l.*; and this latter sum again to a loss of something more than twelve per cent. in its transit and conversion, reducing it from 6,900*l.* to somewhere between 6,100*l.* and 6,000*l.* This statement applies to the first three-quarters of the year, ending the 5th of July, 1815. In July, I received the Report of the Civil List Committee, to which I have so often had occasion to refer. From that time, therefore, I had, what I had always wished, a positive written public rule, not laid down indeed for my mission, but which I might safely take for my guide. By the Civil List Report, the Minister to Portugal was considered prospectively on the footing not of an Ambassador, but of an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary. To that Minister of the second order, the Report assigned a salary of 8,000*l.* a year. It further recommended, that all sums for foreign missions should be paid free of all deductions, except the property tax; thus relieving the issues of salary from all the established legal defalcations at home, amounting to about six per cent. (in addition to the property tax), and from all losses by exchange, or otherwise, in the transmission abroad. At the same time, the allowance for outfit, which had been hitherto in all cases, and for all ranks, only 1,500*l.*, a sum which is stated by the Report not to be sufficient to cover above one-third or one-fourth of the real expense, was raised to 4,000*l.*; and an annual allowance of 500*l.* was given for rent. These several arrangements are found in pp. 47 and 48 of the Civil List Report, to which I beg the gentlemen who do me the honour to watch what I am saying to refer. Deducting 800*l.* the property tax from the salary of 8,000*l.*, these issues to the new Envoy would amount to 11,700*l.* nett for the first year; and to 7,700*l.* nett for every subsequent year. And this, exclusive of plate; for which the Report makes a special provision.

When I received the copy of this Report, I instantly determined that, so long as the mission continued in my hands, I would limit myself strictly to the amount specified in it. For the last quarter, therefore (from July the 5th to October 10th, 1815), I conformed to the new scale of ordinary allowances, and received only 1,800*l.* nett, without any extraordinaries whatever. The exchange was now, in consequence of the termination of the war, become so favourable as in a great measure to counteract the loss upon the paper money, which continued to be about seven per cent. The result of this counteraction was, that the loss upon 1,800*l.* by the exchange and paper money jointly, which three months before would have been about 220*l.*, was now only about 70*l.* Of the 6,000*l.* extraordinaries which I had liberty to draw, I drew only for so much as was sufficient. First to replace the deductions on 6,150*l.*, being three-quarters of nominal salary at the old rate of 8,200*l.* (gross), and on 1,800*l.* one quarter at the new rate of 7,200*l.* (nett); secondly, to make up the old allowance for outfit, viz. 1,500*l.* to the sum of 4,000*l.* specifically allowed by the Committee. And not one farthing more, so help me God! So scrupulously did I adhere to these limits (which seemed to me to have been formed on a clear principle and which had the sanction of the House of Commons), that finding that my agent had drawn, for the last quarter, a sum of 1,500*l.* as extraordinaries (at the rate of the 6,000*l.* originally allowed to me), I directed him to return that sum to the Treasury: and I declare, on my conscience, that when I gave this direction, I had no more expectation that the transaction would ever be known to any one except to my agent—to my right hon. friend (Mr. Huskisson) near me, whom I requested to see my direction executed—to my noble friend (Lord Castlereagh), whose permission was necessary, and to the Treasury, to which the return was made, I had no more expectation that I should ever have to state this transaction privately or publicly in vindication of my character, than I had apprehension that on such grounds my character would ever be assailed. It is undoubtedly still open to the hon. gentlemen who are the framers and supporters of the impeachment against me, to recur to the charge that the mission to Lisbon was unnecessary; to find fault, if they please, with my personal conduct in accepting it (of which a word by and bye); and to censure the mode in which I may have discharged the duties of it: but as to pecuniary imputation, I stand upon a rock. I stand upon the authority of a Committee of this House, appointed long after my embassy was established and endowed; and not merely approving by retrospect the amount of its actual endowment; but recommending prospectively the same endowment for a mission of a lower character. Before that Report was known to me, with the power to go to a certain extent of expense, I restrained myself within that extent, to limits narrowed by my own sense of what was right. As soon as I had the authority of that Report to guide me, I adhered to it voluntarily and strictly, living as an Ambassador within the allowances assigned for an Envoy. To other allegations of misconduct, political or prudential, I may be obnoxious; but surely no fair adversary, after this exposition, will impute to my Embassy either a wasteful prodigality on the part of the Government, or a corrupt rapacity on mine. I am afraid I have already wearied the House with figures: but there is another calculation, of which the result is so striking, that I cannot help requesting of the House to allow me to state it to them. Its elements are few, and the process short and simple. I particularly request attention to it from the right hon. gent. (Mr. Tierney) who sits opposite to me, whose skill in these matters peculiarly qualifies him to detect any error in the statement. The Report of the Committee on the Civil List fixes the salary of the Lisbon Envoy at 8,000*l.*, to be reduced by the deduction of the property tax to 7,200*l.* This sum of 7,200*l.* was to be received nett at Lisbon, free from all other deductions at home, and from loss by exchange and conversion abroad. Sir, I desired a person far better skilled in calculations than I am, to make out for me how much must have been received nett from the Treasury here, to produce 7,200*l.* nett, in Lisbon, during the year 1814-15. The following is the statement of my arithmetician:—The first addition to be made is that of the amount necessary to cover the average loss of something more than twelve per cent. by exchange and paper money: this would be about £ 980 which being added to 7,200 gives £ 8,180 as the sum necessary to have been received nett in England, in order to produce 7,200*l.* nett in Lisbon. But, again, how much would it have been necessary for the Treasury to issue gross to produce (on the footing on which my salary was issued) 8,180*l.* nett in England? The deductions at the Exchequer, I have shewn, amounted to about sixteen per cent., the property tax included. The sum necessary to cover these deductions would be about £ 1,556 which, added to 8,180

shews that the gross issue at the Treasury must have been about £ 9,736 Add to this sum the allowance for outfit 4,000

Add the allowance for house rent (to which, by the way, might be added twelve per cent. for loss on exchange, &c.) 500

And the gross nominal issues at the Treasury, to meet the recommendation of the Committee, for the first year of the new Envoy, must have been £14,296

Does not the very sound of this sum carry conviction, and, I could almost hope, compunction, to the bosoms of my accusers? Does it not excite, in the minds of all impartial men, an indignant recollection of the arts and the clamours by which, during two years and a half, I have been stigmatized to the country as an instance of unexampled waste—as an insatiable pillager of the Exchequer? Sir, of the pecuniary charge, I trust that I may here take my leave. After my own vindication, however, (which must on every account be nearest to my heart), I confess, I am most anxious to put the well-intentioned part of the nation on their guard against those exaggerations for mischievous purposes, by which public men are run down. If the result of this night shall warn them not to be too easily misled into the belief of monstrous and improbable corruptions, I cannot say that I shall not still regret the calumnies with which I have been overwhelmed, but I shall be in some degree rewarded and consoled for them. I have thus disposed of the two main heads of accusation. I have shewn that there was a sincere and well-grounded belief in the return of the Prince Regent of Portugal to Europe: and I have shewn that the cost of the embassy appointed to receive him on his return was not only not extravagant, but that, according to every test by which expenditure can be tried, whether of contrast with what had gone before, or of comparison with what has been deliberately established for the future, it was limited by a reasonable and scrupulous economy. Some minor charges remain to be refuted. I am accused of having held the mission after all hope of executing the duty which I undertook to fulfil was abandoned. But, before I enter on this point, I am reminded that I am accused also of having assumed the mission too soon. It is said that I assumed it in October, although the Prince of Brazil could not be expected in Europe for six months from that date. Now, if there were any ground for supposing that the return was altogether a false pretence, the acceptance of the embassy sooner or later would be of no consequence; the acceptance of it at all was a crime. But if the Prince Regent of Portugal was to come to Europe, there was fair probability that Sir John Beresford might have landed him at Lisbon in February. Sir John Beresford sailed from Portsmouth on the 5th of October. True, he was driven back to Plymouth after having been some days at sea. But, as to the length of the passage, he did reach the Brazils in seven weeks from the date of his last sailing (that, too, with a convoy under his protection); and it was not only no improbable expectation, but it was the belief of Sir John Beresford himself, stated repeatedly to the Prince Regent of Portugal; that from five to six weeks would be sufficient for the voyage from Rio de Janeiro. It is true, that the hypothesis was, that the Prince Regent would be ready to embark, and would have made all the preparations necessary for his departure, between the period of his writing for a squadron and its arrival. Such in fact was our expectation; and upon that supposition (as I have said before) the arrival at Lisbon of the Prince Regent himself would have been the first intelligence that would have been received there of his departure from Rio de Janeiro. I sailed the beginning of November. I landed at Lisbon (I think) on the first of the following month. I had no more doubt of the impatience of the Portuguese royal family to return to Europe than I have that I am now addressing this House. I consequently reckoned upon their arrival in Lisbon almost as soon after my own as I could conveniently be prepared to receive them. In the month of February, I well remember, we used to be looking out at Lisbon, at every favourable turn of the wind, for the arrival of Sir John Beresford with his royal passengers, in the Tagus. The only period therefore, during which I can be accused of receiving a salary without executing a public duty, is that between the date of my appointment and my sailing for Lisbon,—a period of about three weeks. Surely this then is a charge of minute and petty captiousness. It is said that nature abhors a vacuum; and I believe it may be equally said that an Exchequer Quarter abhors a fraction. My salary was reckoned from the 10th of October, the Quarter-day which preceded by about ten days my taking leave at Carlton House;—and which preceded my actual departure (as I have said) by about three weeks. Of the scores or hundreds of missions which have gone out from this country for the last century, I very much doubt whether one could be found whose allowances had begun to run from so short a period before its departure. If this, Sir, be not a sufficient defence on such a matter, I can only give myself up to the mercy of the House, with a frank expression of my regret that I was gazetted three weeks too soon.

As to retaining my Office too long,—I have already answered to this point incidentally, but I must briefly answer to it again here in its proper order. The first loose intimations of a doubt of the return of the Prince Regent to his European dominions arrived in England in the month of March. They reached me at Lisbon on the 9th of April. On the 10th of April I wrote to the Foreign Office, tendering my resignation. I was desired to continue in the exercise of my functions; and from that moment the mission entirely changed its character. I was no longer the pageant Ambassador to a non-forthcoming Sovereign. The war had broken out, with the ominous re-appearance of Buonaparte: and who was there in this country, or in Europe, that ventured to predict its speedy, its miraculous termination? Who could presume to say what might be its course; or what the extent of effort required to give effect to its operations? Henceforth, therefore, I filled, (whether worthily or not, is another question,) a situation of business, at a not insignificant post, and at a most eventful crisis. If I had not been on the spot, another must have been appointed, —a Minister of the second order, if you please,—but even if so, with all the allowances and expenses incident to a Minister of the second order at Lisbon,—which I have already shewn to be, according to the recommendation of the Civil List Report, substantially the same as mine. Henceforth, therefore, I did not add one farthing to the unavoidable expenses of the country. It may be alleged, that a more able individual might have been found to discharge the duties of the mission; and that I did wrong in continuing to do what others might have done better; —but there is not a shadow of pretence for affirming that my continuance at Lisbon laid any burden upon the public, or that any saving could have been effected by the acceptance of my resignation on the 10th of April. It is obvious that in the refusal to accept my resignation, I was wholly passive: but neither does my Noble Friend require any justification for having recommended to the Prince Regent to decline accepting it. My Noble Friend is sufficiently justified by the case itself, and by his subsequent conduct. For no sooner was the battle of Waterloo fought, and the war thus happily ended, (almost as soon as begun), than my noble friend signified to me his Royal Highness's acceptance of the resignation which had been before declined. It is true, that it was not until three months after this notification that I was finally relieved from the mission. Amidst the important negotiations in which my noble friend was then engaged, he appears to have forgotten that he had not appointed any one to receive the business and correspondence of the Lisbon mission, out of my hands. Portugal and myself had (no wonder) sunk into insignificance and oblivion: and up to the beginning of August, no successor to me was appointed.—Did I think this a lucky chance? Did I go on quietly to enjoy the advantage of this oblivion?—No. After about a month had elapsed without hearing any thing from the Foreign Office, I wrote to my noble friend, to remind him of my existence: and, apprehending him to be—as he in fact was,—absent from England, I wrote by the same packet, a private letter to Lord Bathurst, begging leave, in case any difficulty should have occurred in the nomination of a successor, to recommend Mr. Croft (whom I have already mentioned as having been first introduced to me by my noble friend,) as a person perfectly competent to act as Chargé d'Affaires; and offering, at the same time, the aid of my unofficial advice, so long as I should remain (which I intended to do through the winter) in Portugal. I desire to know if this conduct can be characterized as a clinging to my office?—or whether my pertinacity in adhering to it was more than exactly on a par with my eagerness in seeking it? Perhaps, Sir, I might now sit down perfectly satisfied with having cleared the integrity of my conduct; and, perhaps, with a feeling rather of gratitude than of hostility towards those who, by manfully giving a distinct and substantive shape to their allegations, have afforded me an opportunity of refuting them. But I cannot pass by the taunts of the hon. Baronet, and the grave admonitions of the hon. Mover of the question, without assuring them, that so long as I possess in my own breast the consciousness of integrity, such assailments, whether taunting or monitory, will excite in it no emotion warmer than contempt. I must above all things assure the hon. Baronet, that no attempt to impeach my character and to degrade me (as he flattered himself this proceeding might do) in that estimation with this House which constitutes all that is valuable and all that is efficient in a public man, no such attempt, I say, will cause me to lower my voice one key, or to abate one jot of my exertions, in opposing and exposing those doctrines of which the hon. Baronet is the representative and the champion. Let not the hon. Baronet flatter himself with any such result from this attack upon my reputation. Let him not flatter himself with the hope of such a result from his asperity to-night, or from his menaces for the future. If I am satisfied to have done right, for the peace of my own conscience, I am also glad to have made that right apparent, mainly because I know how necessary are the good opinion and the favouring attention of this House, to enable me to exert myself successfully for the defeat of those projects which the hon. Baronet has at heart, and which I verily believe, would bring this country to ruin. The hon. Baronet has spoken out: and the only sentiment with which I am inspired by the bitterness of his declared enmity, and by the burst of his anticipated triumph, is that of a pride—I hope an honest and pardonable pride, at the proof which he has thus unintentionally afforded of the reasons to which I am indebted for his hostility. It is because I am held in hatred and in fear by those who share the hon. Baronet's opinions, that by them I have been sought to be destroyed. I have been sought to be destroyed, because I have declared myself, (with what effect it becomes not me to say, but with all my heart and soul)—against schemes, which, if unchecked, would bring destruction upon those hallowed institutions by which the mixed and free Government of this great kingdom is upheld, and from which the practical blessings of our Constitution are derived. Sir, I thus dismiss all that part of the charges which, if substantiated, would have established against me the guilt of criminality or of culpable misconduct. But I wish to leave nothing unnoticed, whether of charge or of insinuation, whether conveying the imputation of positive guilt, or only implying discredit and disparagement. It is made matter of accusation and reproach against me that I have accepted Office with my noble friend who sits beside me, between whom and myself it is assumed that our former differences had placed an impassable barrier. First, from what quarter comes this reproach and accusation? From a bench on which I do not see any two neighbours who have not differed from each other, and that within short memory too, much more essentially than myself and my noble friend. But it is insinuated that the differences between my noble friend and myself were of a sort which precluded reconciliation! Since when have such matters become topics of parliamentary discussion? Since when has it been the practice of this House to take cognizance of the disagreements of individuals, and to indulge in such animadversions on the most delicate topics of personal conduct as in private society no gentleman would venture to hazard? Since when, I say, has this practice commenced? and how far is it to be carried?—I know of no precedent for it. I know of no authority. It is not for my own sake, but for the sake of this House, that I protest against it: for, if this practice be permitted, our discussions must inevitably sink into grosser personalities than have disgraced the meetings of Palace-Yard and of Spa-fields. The hon. Baronet is entirely mistaken as to what he supposes me to have addressed to my Constituents at Liverpool in 1812. Nothing that I then said was intended to convey, or did convey, the notion that I was precluded by any feeling, or in my own judgment) by any principle, from acting in Office with my noble friend. I had declared the directly contrary opinion some months before, in a correspondence respecting the formation of an Administration, which the discussions of those times brought before the public, and which is now upon record. What is not publicly recorded is, that some time after those discussions had closed, but six or eight weeks before my Election at Liverpool, other negotiations, which had for their object my return to Office, had taken place; amongst the proposed arrangements of which, my noble friend—with a manliness and generosity which I hope I felt as they deserved—had voluntarily tendered to my acceptance the seals of the Office which he now holds. Other reasons induced me to decline that tender. I might be right or wrong in my view of those reasons. One among them was, that I was at that time embarrassed with respect to a most important question (the discussion of which is now fixed for no distant day) by pledges which

I could best hope to redeem with unquestioned fidelity and honour, by remaining out of Office till I had redeemed them. But what would be thought of me, what should I deserve to be thought of by any liberal mind, if after such a transaction as I have described, I could ever pause for a moment, to consider in what order with respect to each other my noble friend and I should march towards our common objects in the service of the Country?—In that transaction, any feelings which had previously separated my noble friend and myself were buried for ever. The very memory of them was effaced from our minds: nor can I compliment the good taste of those who would call them up from oblivion: surely not with the vain hope of exasperating differences anew, but with the purpose of making a reconciliation now of five years' standing, a subject of suspicion, taunt and obloquy. What I have said, sir, is, I hope, a sufficient comment upon the notable discovery that I accepted public employment not with, but under, my noble friend. This paltry distinction, I can assure those who are so vain of it, occasions me not the slightest uneasiness. When Lord Pembroke went out to Vienna, and the Marquis Wellesley to Spain, during (or under, if you will) my administration of the Foreign Department, had I the ridiculous vanity to fancy that these distinguished Noblemen acted under me, in any sense of degrading subordination? Or is it imagined that when the Duke of Wellington undertook his mission to Paris, my noble friend conceived that he was therefore entitled to claim a pre-eminence over the deliverer of Europe? They know little, Sir, of the spirit of our Constitution, they are very ill acquainted with the duties that it imposes, and the privileges that it confers, who are not aware, that in whatever station a man may be called upon to serve his Sovereign and his Country, there is among statesmen, co-operating honestly for the public good, a real substantive equality which no mere official arrangement can either create or destroy; they, who are yet to learn, that in a free Country like ours, it is for the man to dignify the office, not for the office to dignify the man. Sir, I have now done. I have humbly to apologize to the House for having trespassed upon them so long, and to thank them for their indulgent attention. The manner in which I have been heard by the House, has been such as satisfies me that they justly and kindly considered how much I had at stake on this day. If I have succeeded, (as my conscience tells me that I must have done,) in refuting the charges brought against me, I have not spoken in vain; and you, Sir, will not regret having listened to me. If I have not succeeded, if the House shall be of opinion that any stain remains upon my character, then indeed, Sir, have I troubled you too long; but I have troubled you for the last time.

Mr. Brougham declared, that he was not one of those to whom the right hon. gentleman could have alluded as hanging back in their accusations. The charge must have applied to some one, but he was at a loss to determine who was meant. His hon. friend (Mr. Lambton) had stated the question fully and fairly; he was answered by the noble lord opposite (Lord Castlereagh), who was replied to by his hon. friend (Sir Francis Burdett). The gallant Admiral then said a few words, when there ensued a dead pause in the House—nothing being offered to be said on the other side. Was the accusation to be repeated without hearing any defence? Were the common forms of the House to be departed from on this occasion, and were he and his friends to be accused of want of candour for following the usual course recommended by common convenience and the general experience of its utility? He did not hold back, and he was sure his hon. friends did not. If he now came forward, he did not bring any new charges; he would not state a tittle that had not previously been stated; and if he travelled out of the accusation he begged he might be stopped. He would tell the right hon. gentleman, that he was not his accuser; that he acted here in a different capacity. The accusation was already made; the defence had been heard, and he, and the House, were now to act as judges. (Hear, hear, from Ministers, re-echoed by Opposition.) He observed, that the right hon. gentleman was anxious to separate the two questions of the return of the Prince Regent, and of the expenses of the embassy. He had no objection to this line of argument, and would shew, from dates, that there was not a shadow of pretence for this job, which was the greatest that had happened for many years. The blame of it was shared between the Administration and the right hon. gentleman who benefited by it. The charge, however, had been replied to as containing particulars which were never advanced; it was never said that there was no intention expressed on the part of the Prince Regent of the Brazils to return to Europe; he and his friends charged them with appointing a minister at a time when there were no functions to be exercised. The charge admitted that there might be a mistake; on this mistake the job was founded: the mistake was pardoned, but the plunder was reprobated. It was by facts and by dates only that the question under debate ought to be decided, not by empty professions or noisy declamation, which, in the opinion of the world, would be of no more value than the wind of which they were made. Referring, then, to the despatch of Lord Strangford to Lord Castlereagh, he found it stated, that hopes were entertained by the British Minister that the Prince Regent was disposed to revisit his ancient dominions; but this intention would never be executed without the concurrence of the English Government. It was added, subsequently, that any intimation of the wishes on the part of our Government, would probably be acceded to. We were thus left altogether to determine upon the time and the mode in which the return of the Prince Regent of Portugal should take place. The right hon. gentleman had pretended, that this return was an affair of the highest importance; that it was an event so desirable, as to justify all the expense and all the extraordinary proceedings which belonged to this transaction. But if it had been of such mighty interest to the concerns of Europe, ample time had been previously afforded between the downfall of Buonaparte's power in the Peninsula, and the period of the right hon. gentleman's appointment. Not a word, however, of the return of the royal family was heard till the 29th of July, and then arose a question which was now to be determined upon stubborn dates on one side, and metaphor and verbosity on the other. During the three months previous to this period, although the noble lord (Castlereagh) was all that time apprised of the probable return of the Portuguese Court, as far as the despatch of Lord Strangford could create that expectation, he never once thought of sending out an embassy extraordinary upon the mere possibility of such an event. Such an intention, if ever entertained, had hitherto lain dormant, and never appeared till it was wanted for private purposes, or for cabinet arrangements. (Hear, hear.) To shew the temper in which this matter was conducted, it might be of use to examine one of the pretexts upon which the whole defence of the case rested. It had been asserted, that the appointment of an ambassador extraordinary was made, in one respect, for the purpose of gratifying the feelings of the Prince Regent: but it was worthy of observation, that whilst we complimented him with an ambassador whom he had never asked for, nor evinced any desire to see, we refused him the favour of appointing the commodore whom he had expressly named, to command the convoy on his passage home. He believed this officer was Sir Sidney Smith, (no, no, from the Treasury Bench,) but, if he were mistaken in this, it was probably the officer who commanded the vessel in which his Royal Highness sailed from Europe to the Brazils. Why, if there was so much anxiety to gratify the personal feelings of his Royal Highness, was so slight a civility refused?—But he now came to a part of the question which had been wholly omitted by the noble lord, and but incidentally mentioned by the right hon. gentleman in the close of his justification; upon which, however, he would venture to say, that the judgment of the country would finally be formed; he meant whether any real necessity had existed for the appointment of the embassy, or whether it was not a mere pretence to suit the views and interests of individuals. Had there been any doubt, or even the smallest uncertainty, with regard to the occurrence of those circumstances which called for so extraordinary an appointment, it was the duty of the noble lord not to have precipitated the embassy: for, if delayed but a short time, the whole of this useless expense might have been saved to the country. The right hon. gentleman had argued as if it were absolutely necessary that an ambassador should be present on the Prince's return, if it had taken place; but if a chargé d'affaires had remained there a year and a half, there could be no great inconvenience in his remaining a week or a fortnight longer under the existing circumstances. He apprehended, however, that the fact was, the right hon. gentleman was going to Lisbon at any rate; and that if the appointment was longer deferred, it would come too late to answer his purpose. (Hear, hear.) The Court of France had taken a very different view of the intentions of the Portuguese Court, and had sent their Minister to Rio Janeiro; and he could conceive no reason for our pursuing a different course, except that it was necessary to put money into the pocket of an individual, as a means of settling certain political arrangements. He believed the French mission was subsequent to the British, but this was of little moment. In considering the amount of the right hon. gentleman's allowances, a great deal had been said as to the expenditure of Mr. Sydenham. He agreed entirely with all the praise which had been bestowed upon that lamented gentleman, and could have wished that the right hon. gentleman had not qualified his panegyric by certain expressions which could hardly be intended to do honour to his memory. Why did the right hon. gentleman endeavour to place the character he eulogized in an odious light, by ironically calling Mr. Sydenham "that prince of economists," or mock the reputation which he affected to respect? Mr. Sydenham had remonstrated against a too rigid system of retrenchment; he had told the noble lord that it was vain to attempt to cut so deeply; and therefore, if the right hon. gentleman had any censure to direct against an excess in the disposition to economy, it was the noble lord, his present colleague, and not Mr. Sydenham, to whom it properly applied. The regular expenses of Mr. Sydenham had been distinctly limited to 5,200*l.*; and admitting the highest amount to which they had been swelled by an accidental addition of 2,000*l.* incurred through ill health, and 1,500*l.* of outfit, there was still a wide difference between the aggregate amount, and the sum of 18,000*l.*, expended upon the mission of the right hon. gentleman. When the plain fact was before the House, that although the return of the Portuguese Court was announced in April, as a probable event, and yet that an envoy was considered to be sufficient on the 18th of July following, it would not do for the noble lord and the right hon. gentleman to put themselves generally on the House for an acquittal, without any attempt to controvert the facts. The noble lord, on the 18th of July, thought of nothing but economy: and in this spirit wrote his despatch to Mr. Sydenham, expressing the Prince Regent's commands that he should, under the altered circumstances of the country in which he resided, confine his expenses strictly within his ordinary allowances; but on the 25th a new light had broken in upon him; he then knew more of the right hon. gentleman, with whom for some years before his acquaintance had been but slight; and although he knew no more with regard to the return of the Prince Regent from the Brazils, he had ceased to preach upon economy. According to the letter of Lord Bathurst, it was not till the 31st of October, that a new view was taken of the scale of expenditure necessary in Portugal, and it was found that a variety of charges were incident to the transition from a state of war to a state of general tranquillity. It did not appear, however, at what particular moment this discovery, as to the necessity of a gradual transition, was made. What did all this evidence indicate, but that the whole was a pecuniary transaction, the direct end of which was the acquisition of money by one of the parties? The right hon. gentleman might tell them, that without a clear acquittal this should be the last time of his addressing them; but he would say, that such an acquittal would shake his confidence in the verdict of any plain men upon a plain matter of fact. The House must decide whether this was or not a bonâ fide transaction, entered upon with no views but those of national advantage, originating in no private or personal considerations; or whether it was not exclusively the result of party schemes and cabinet arrangements (hear, hear); whether it was any other than a money-getting contrivance; whether the scale of expenditure which it created, great as it was, was not infinitely pitiful and miserable in comparison with the object which it was intended to serve; and whether the whole aim and end of the negotiation had not been to make the country pay the price of the purchase of the right hon. gentleman's accession to the present administration. (Hear.) To refer once more to the subject of Mr. Sydenham's expenses, he could not but notice the manner in which those expenses had been increased, to the amount of several thousands, for the short space of a fortnight. Never had he known a matter of fact so entirely distorted. Mr. Sydenham had received the usual appointments and outfit, when the sudden breaking down of his health impeded the full execution of his mission. It would be as fair to consider the 300*l.* which a wounded officer might draw during the six months he was confined, as a remuneration for a week's or a fortnight's service. (Hear.) Sir C. Stuart, like all the other personages alluded to by the right hon. gentleman, though treated with professed respect, met with very little indulgence. But the right hon. gentleman could hardly forget that Sir C. Stuart was not merely the resident minister of this country, he was also a member of the Portuguese Regency. The right hon. gent. might as well have taken, as a scale for his own expenditure, the royal establishment at Rio Janeiro, or of Carlton-house. Upon the whole, whatever might be the judgment of the House on this transaction between the noble lord and the right hon. gentleman, he was convinced that no impartial man out of doors would regard it in any other light than as it had been described by the worthy baronet—that of a pecuniary and profitable party-job. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Milton thought the House and the country indebted to his hon. friend (Mr. Lambton, who had brought forward this subject, because it was important that the characters of public men should be understood; and he did not think they would have been so well understood but for the discussion which had taken place. (Hear, hear.) He was not ashamed to confess that he was himself a party man; and to own, that he did not consider himself gifted with a wisdom which entitled himself to set up his judgment against those with whom he generally acted. He had listened attentively to all the different speeches which had been made, and the result was, that he could not conscientiously agree with his honourable friends in the vote of censure which they had proposed. (Loud cries of hear, from the Treasury benches.) Much as he regretted the necessity of differing from them, he could not forget that he had a higher duty to perform. He desired at the same time to say, that he did not acquit the right hon. gentleman of all blame; and that he thought the negotiation between him and the noble lord, which led, by his subsequent appointment, to the Lisbon mission, not very creditable to either. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Warre said a few words (amidst cries of question), the import of which was understood to be in favour of the appointment.

Mr. Gordon said, that he was sorry to detain the House, but he felt some anxiety to state his opinion that the right hon. gentleman had cleared himself from the charge of pecuniary views. The question, however, was still open as to the propriety of sending an embassy at all. If necessary, it appeared to him that it ought to have been sent at once to the Brazils.

Mr. Abercromby agreed that the right hon. gentleman could not be considered as a principal in this transaction. His vote in support of the motion would be given upon the ground that the embassy itself was unnecessary.

Mr. Sharp was satisfied that the charge had been fully substantiated against the Government, who had, it appeared, not only deceived the country, but the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Tierney wished to say a few words in explanation of the vote he was about to give, and which he could declare would rest upon no ground of objection to the propriety of the right hon. gentleman filling the situation he had occupied. He was; however, of opinion, that if there had been a vacancy in the cabinet when that right hon. gentleman proceeded to Lisbon, the House would not have been troubled with the present motion; for in that case, he would not have been appointed to the embassy. Something was to be done to bring about the reconciliation of the noble lord and the right hon. gentleman. His decision would be formed upon the conviction, that at the time the right hon. gentleman was appointed ambassador to Lisbon, no embassy whatever was necessary. There would have been sufficient time for sending him out on his extraordinary mission, after it had been ascertained that the Court of Portugal was to be re-established at Lisbon. But what reason had the noble lord to expect that such an event was to take place? He (Mr. T.) could mention from his own personal knowledge a fact, which to his mind proved that the expectation was quite unfounded. It had been stated to him, by the Portuguese ambassador, the Count de Funchal, that if his Majesty's Ministers had applied to him for information on the subject, he would have told them that the Prince Regent had no intention of returning to Europe. Thus it appeared, that if the noble lord had taken the trouble of making inquiries in the proper quarter, he would have been able to have saved the expense of the six months' embassy with which the country had been so unfairly burdened. If it had been necessary to send an ambassador at all, he should not have said a word on the subject. The right hon. gentleman, as he had already observed, was as well calculated for that office, generally speaking, as any other person who could be appointed to it. Something had, however, been said of the fancies of crowned heads, with respect to such missions, which did not tend so well to support this particular appointment. He believed, that if crowned heads were flattered by such attentions, they looked more to the rank than to the talents of the ambassador sent to them; and viewing the subject in that way, the right hon. gentleman certainly was not the fittest person that might have been chosen for this complimentary embassy to the Court of Lisbon. In the comparison made on the other side between the expenses incurred by Mr. Sydenham's residence, and the mission of the right hon. gentleman, the whole expenses incurred by Mr. S. had been charged upon the half year. This was not fair; but how would the case stand were the whole expense of the right hon. gentleman in salary, plate, outfit, and other expenses, to be put on the half year, with the additional consideration that it was an expense which ought not to have been incurred at all? In addition to the other expenses, a considerable loss was incurred by the rate of exchange. He had that day sent to the city to inquire what the rate of exchange at Lisbon on London had been from July, 1814, to March, 1815; and he learned that it was 68½, instead of 67, as had been stated. The loss, therefore, in the negotiation of paper was 14 per cent.; and adding that to all the other charges, the expense of the half-year would be 11,000*l.* This would be the amount of the charge if he were to follow the example which had been set up, and put all the expenses on the half-year, as had been done with Mr. Sydenham's mission; but he should do no such thing. He would not argue so unfairly. It was sufficient for him to state, that when the right hon. gentleman was appointed ambassador to the Court of Lisbon, he came into the possession of a salary of 14,000*l.* a-year; that that salary, the 3,000*l.* for his plate, and all the other expenses of his outfit, were totally unnecessary, and formed a burden most improperly imposed upon the country. The right hon. gentleman had made some very extraordinary flourishes, for which the noble lord was certainly much obliged to him. The noble lord seemed somehow or other to think that he had been accused of taking other people's money unfairly. The right honourable gentleman seeing his embarrassment, had got up, and, in wishing to clear his friend of the character of the thief, acknowledged himself to be the receiver. He must say, however, that he had no intention of bringing against the right hon. gentleman the charge of peculation. There never was a country in which public men were more free from such an accusation than in this; and in that respect he was free to confess, that he regarded the right hon. gentleman as perfectly clean-handed. But it would be paying the right hon. gentleman a compliment on the score of his possessing a degree of virtue and self-denial which fall to the lot of few, were he to suppose that he ought to have refused the emoluments which were pressed upon him; that he should have refused to listen to a person who told him he was a better judge of what his services merited than he could possibly be himself; and that he ought not to have a farthing less than 14,000*l.* a-year, with 3000*l.* for his plate, and all the other expenses of his outfit. He should not now detain the House longer than to state, that on this question he considered himself as speaking on behalf of the public, and he should not think that he did his duty if he neglected to vote for the motion of his hon. friend.

Mr. Lyttelton did not think either the appointment by his Majesty's Ministers, or the acceptance of it by the right hon. gentleman, justifiable at the time it was made, and could not perceive any grounds on which it could be defended. He was also of opinion, that, considering the circumstances in which the right hon. gentleman stood towards the noble lord, the transaction was not creditable to him.

Sir J. Mackintosh did not entirely agree with his hon. friend who spoke last. He imputed blame to the appointment, and not to the acceptance of it; and it was in that way he understood the censure of the resolutions to apply.

Mr. Canning wished to state, by way of explanation, two facts, which would throw a light on two assertions made by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Tierney) in his speech. In the first place, it had been said, that if a vacancy had presented itself in the cabinet at the time he went to Lisbon, he would not have gone on that mission. On this point, if it would satisfy the hon. gentleman, he could produce most ample proof that no vacancy which could have occurred would at that time have tempted him to have delayed his journey, and accept of office in this country. The second fact related to the right hon. gentleman's statement respecting the opinion of the Portuguese ambassador. He stated, that the Count de Funchal had assured him that the Prince Regent of Portugal had no intention of returning to Europe. He (Mr. C.) knew nothing of this declaration, and would not attempt to dispute its having been made; but this he would affirm, that at the time the Prince Regent was expected to return to Lisbon, the Count de Funchal actually gave to Sir J. Beresford a list of the persons who, it was understood, would embark with the Prince at Rio Janeiro for Portugal. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Cartwright observed, that an hon. baronet on the other side had stated, that whenever this subject should be mentioned, he would apply to it the term peculation. After the defence which the House had heard; after the full and satisfactory explanation of all the circumstances which had been given, he should have expected that common candour would have induced the hon. baronet to get up and disavow that epithet as far as possible. (A laugh.) He must say that, after what had passed, he should think it very extraordinary if the hon. baronet persisted in his charge.

Sir F. Burdett said, that he had not used the term peculation in its common and gross sense; but, as the appointment was the result of a political negotiation between the parties for their own interests, he still regarded it as what he had already stated it to be, namely, a pecuniary job.

Sir T. Acland was confident that the candour of the hon. baronet would not permit him to hesitate in pronouncing the full acquittal of a person accused, who had proved himself to be innocent. He did not know what the honourable baronet meant by his concluding words, in which he denominated the transaction under consideration a pecuniary job. He did not think that such terms could be fairly applied to it, after the defence which had been heard. After a speech so eloquent, which had thrilled through every heart in the House, he should have been proud to have been so accused, in order to have so defended himself. It would, however, be presumptuous in him to suppose that he could so defend himself; but he was sure there was not a member in the House who would not have been glad to have committed such an action, if he could have made such a defence.

Mr. Lambton rose to reply. He observed that the President of the Board of Control had totally misrepresented him in saying that he had dwelt on the quarrel between him and the noble lord. He had done no such thing, and he entirely disclaimed what had been said by his right hon. friend and the hon. baronet on that subject. He had carefully avoided every thing in the nature of a personal attack, in the observations which he had thought it his duty to submit to the consideration of the House. It was the improper nature of the appointment, and not the acceptance of it by the right hon. gentleman, which he condemned. The noble lord, and others of his hon. friends, were mistaken in the view they had taken of the resolutions. The object of the resolutions was not to condemn the right hon. gentleman, but to declare that the appointment imposed an unnecessary expense on the country. As the question had been so fully discussed, he should not detain the House with any farther observations.

The House then divided,

Wednesday, May 7.

ATTACK ON ALGIERS.] The Lord Chancellor communicated to their lordships the answer of Vice-Admiral Baron Van 'de Capellen to their lordships' vote of thanks of the 3d of February last. It stated, in substance, that the approbation of such high assemblies was one of the best rewards of those who had endeavoured properly to discharge their public duties; and that the thanks of their lordships were so considered by the persons on whom that honour had been conferred.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, May 7.

ATTACK ON ALGIERS.] Mr. Speaker reported Vice-Admiral Baron Van de Capellen's answer to the vote of thanks of the 3d of February last. It expressed the high sense entertained of the distinguished honour which the House had been pleased to confer on the Admiral and the squadron under his command.

LONDON CLERGY BILL.] On the motion of Sir J. Graham it was ordered, that a bill which had been introduced for making certain regulations among the Clergy of the City of London, should be read a second time this day six months.

COTTON TWIST.] Sir O. Moseley presented a petition from several merchants, factors, warehousemen, and others, in the city of London, interested in the sale and exportation of cotton piece goods. It set forth, "That the petitioners had for many years been engaged in the sale and exportation of cotton piece goods, and that their extensive capitals, activity, and enterprise, had tended greatly to carry the manufacture of cotton goods in various parts of the kingdom to an extent surpassing any other manufacture of these realms; that the petitioners were fully persuaded, that the preservation and extension of the cotton manufacture was of vital importance to the country, whether it be considered as an object of revenue and of foreign and domestic commerce, or as an almost inexhaustible resource for every description of labour, ingenuity, and science, and of the greatest benefit to the agriculturist and land owner; that the great superiority of our spinning machines, aided by the practical skill and systematic industry of the persons employed in our cotton mills, and the possession of important local advantages, had, until recently, prevented any foreign state from becoming our rivals in this beneficial trade and manufacture; nevertheless, foreigners, for a considerable time past, with a view to establish themselves in this trade, had been in the habit of purchasing along with our piece goods some parcels of our unwrought cotton yarns, which at first being small were not considered materially to injure the trade in goods, but the conclusion of peace in Europe having enabled the Continental States to turn their attention to the manufacture of cotton goods, which, from the low prices of provisions and labour in some departments, they could do at a cheaper rate than could be done in this country, and their manufacturers being protected by heavy duties upon, or total prohibition of, our goods, their purchases of our yarns had of late become so great as to create serious and just alarm to the petitioners for the loss of their export trade; that the consequence of the extensive manufacture of cotton goods from British yarns in Russia, Turkey, Germany, France, Switzerland, Belgium, and other countries, was a vast diminution in the demand for our piece goods from those countries, whereby many merchants and manufacturers had been ruined, and their workmen reduced to such a state of distress as to threaten the most serious results; that the petitioners humbly apprehended that the exportation of our yarns was contrary to the maxims of sound policy, and a complete departure from the principle adopted in the wise restrictive laws now in force for the protection of our other great staple the woollen manufacture, and gave to other nations all the advantages of our inventions in machinery without any adequate return; that if the exportation of British yarns were suffered to go on, our valuable trade in cotton piece goods to the Continental States and their Colonies would be totally lost, to the great injury of the petitioners, and the innumerable body of manufacturers, weavers, calico printers, dyers, bleachers, embroiderers, finishers, and others dependent on the trade in cotton piece goods; the petitioners therefore humbly prayed, that the House would be pleased to take this matter into their consideration, convinced that in it would be found one of the principal causes of our commercial distresses, and of the present alarming state of our population in the manufacturing districts, and that the House would cause such measures to be adopted as would prevent, before it were too late, the total loss of our trade in cotton piece goods to the countries above mentioned."

Mr. Phillips said, it was necessary that a more enlarged view should be taken of this subject. It was stated, that in proportion as the exportation of cotton yarn had increased, the exportation of cotton piece goods had decreased, and that the increase of the one was the cause of the decrease of the other. It appeared from official returns, that the importation of cotton wool, on an average of 10 years previous to 1814, amounted to 72,000,000 of pounds, whereas, on an average of the three years ending in 1815, 1816, and 1817, it amounted to 95,000,000 of pounds, making a difference of 23,000,000 of pounds weight increase in the three last years, compared with the 10 preceding years. The cotton yarn exported only amounted to 30,000,000 of pounds, leaving a difference of 60,000,000 of pounds weight, which must be absorbed in the cotton piece goods. The observations in the petition might lead the House to suppose that Great Britain had an exclusive possession of skill in the spinning of cotton yarn; but this was not the fact. Establishments for spinning cotton yarn existed in France, the Netherlands, Westphalia, Saxony, Silesia, Prussia, Austria, Bohemia, and other places, and the average nature of those factories was better than that of the factories of Great Britain. They were in possession of all our recent discoveries, the establishments were mostly directed by British spinners, and the machinery constructed by British mechanics. Great part of the nations of the continent had already either excluded cotton yarn, or loaded the importation of it with high duties. In Austria all yarns, but a small proportion of the finest, were excluded. In Russia the exportation was subject to a heavy duty. It was the same in Prussia. Under these circumstances, no other effect could be produced by the imposition of a duty on the exportation of yarn, than to shut it out altogether from the continent. A more absurd proposition never was suggested. The great complaint on the continent was, that we were too much disposed to exercise an exclusive control over trade, and this led to jealousies on their part, attended with very serious detriment to us. He had little doubt, that if the proposition were adopted, it would lead to a bounty to cotton spinners, and an exclusion of British yarns. The fact was, that the sale of cotton yarn on the continent was at present nearly impossible. It had been said, that the exporters of cotton yarn sold it on the continent cheaper than they did at home: how any person in his senses should incur all the risk and trouble of conveying his goods to a foreign market, and subject himself to the risk of bad debts, for the sake of selling his goods at a lower price than he could obtain at home, he was at a loss to conceive. The average annual importation of cotton wool for 1792, 1793, and 1794, was not more than 26 millions of pounds weight; whereas for 1814, 1815, and 1816, it was 95 millions, making a difference in that time of nearly 70 millions of pounds weight. It might be said, that this increase of trade was owing to the improvements made by the manufacturers of piece goods; but the fact was, that the whole increase was owing to the improvements made in the spinning machinery by Watts, Arkwright, and others. In this country the cotton spinners had great difficulties to contend with in the high taxes, and the high price of subsistence occasioned by those taxes. The rate of wages of cotton spinners on the continent was not half of what it was in this country. (The hon. gentleman then went into some details, to shew that the persons employed in our cotton factories were not in a miserable condition, an opinion to which some mismanagement about 20 years ago had given rise, and that they were in general better off than persons engaged in other departments of our manufactures.)

Lord Stanley thought, that restrictions on the exportation of cotton yarn would only excite expectations which might prove illusory.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

[WRONGOUS IMPRISONMENT.] Sir S. Romilly rose to present a petition from John Montgomery, a weaver, in Bell-street, Calton of Glasgow, complaining of wrongous imprisonment. It set forth, "That circumstances of extreme oppression obliged the petitioner to approach the House in the hope that his motives and wrongs would plead his excuse, however humble his condition; these motives and sufferings would be best discovered by the following plain statement of facts: on Sunday, the 23d of February last, the petitioner was awakened at six o'clock in the morning by three men, who stated, that they had a warrant to apprehend him and search his house, on suspicion of seditious practices; they accordingly were allowed to make every search they required, after which they carried the petitioner to gaol, where, in spite of the most earnest remonstrances, the turnkey seized him by the back of the neck, and shoved him forcibly into a dismal cell on the ground-floor of the felons' department; that various criminals were immured on both sides of the petitioner, who was doomed to hear their horrid conversation during the whole of his confinement in that cell, and after being kept there for three days and two nights, he was moved to another cell up stairs, but both of them were so extremely dark, that he could not see to read, even during mid-day, the only light being from a small grated aperture in the wall, above the door, but the light to which was borrowed from another grated window on the opposite side of the passage leading to the cells; that the dimensions of both cells did not exceed six feet and a half in breadth, and eleven feet in length, or thereby; and the petitioner was not allowed either a seat, or a bedstead, or a table, or a candle, or a lamp, or a carpet, or a fire, or a stove, or, in short, any thing to cheer his solitude, or to mitigate the extreme coldness of his dungeon, which consisted, above, below, and on all sides, of stone, without any lathing or plaster; nay, when one of his friends sent the gaoler a candle for the petitioner's use, it was kept up, on the allegation that no such accommodation was allowed in the felons' department; that the cell in which the petitioner was immured for the first three days and two nights was much infested with vermin of various kinds, and the bed-clothes were in a very filthy state; the petitioner also received no allowance whatever for his sustenance during the first three days and two nights, the consequence of which was, that at the end of that time he was reduced to such a state of hunger, that one of the criminals took compassion on him, and sent him a twopenny loaf by the hands of the turnkey; that after the petitioner had been immured in his cell for four days and three nights, he was for the first time examined by Mr. Robert Hamilton, sheriff depute, and although he frankly and honestly declared that he was a total stranger to all political associations, and had never attended any private meetings, or was acquainted with any of the alleged conspirators, he was remanded to his cell without any reason or pretext, and detained there until the forenoon of Thursday, the 27th of February last, when he was liberated without any farther examination; that during the whole period of the petitioner's confinement (four days and four nights) he was not visited by a magistrate or any other person to whom his sufferings might have been communicated, a hardship which he more felt, because, during the whole of his imprisonment, he laboured under a severe bowel complaint, occasioned, as he supposed, by the extreme coldness of his cell at that stormy season, and for about eight days after his liberation he was so indisposed that he was unable to do little or any work, owing to the severity of his treatment whilst in confinement; that the petitioner lamented the necessity which had obliged him to trespass so long on the patience of the House, but well knowing their solicitude for the liberties and character of his Majesty's loyal subjects, however humble, he ventured to hope that the nature and extent of his sufferings would induce them, upon a proof of the foregoing facts, which he then offered to adduce, not only to give him that redress which to the House should seem meet, but lead them to adopt such measures as would effectually check the recurrence of similar grievances in time coming." The hon. and learned gentleman observed, that this petition was sent to him some time ago, but he had been desirous of presenting it when the hon. member for Glasgow was in the House. It was impossible for him (Sir Samuel) to answer for the truth of the facts, but he believed them to be true, as he had received several testimonials of the good character of the petitioner, and affidavits from very respectable persons attesting the truth of all the facts.— might be said, that the petitioner could obtain redress by the common law of the land; but, notwithstanding that, a person who had been exposed to such hardships was entitled to the attention of that House. No ground for the arrest was established before the magistrates; and if a man could be taken and imprisoned in this manner in Scotland, what would have been the consequence to the people of that country, if the House had not altered the bill which had been sent down by the other House, suspending the Constitution, with respect to the liberty of the subject? The warrant on which the petitioner was arrested was directed against a person of the same surname, but whose Christian name was left blank. The hon. and learned gentleman then moved, that the petition do lie on the table.

Mr. Finlay said, he understood it was not necessary by the law of Scotland, that the Christian name of the person against whom a warrant was issued should be inserted. The Sheriff, on an application of the procurator fiscal, would not object to grant a warrant for the apprehension of a person, though the Christian name was not stated. In many cases, murder and robbery for instance, it was often impossible to obtain the Christian name, and the ends of public justice would be defeated in such cases, if a warrant were not issued. The practice in question, therefore, was universal, and not contrary to justice. With respect to the treatment of the individuals arrested, he had had opportunities of conversing with gentlemen acquainted with the whole transaction. It happened unfortunately, that a great number were arrested at the same time, and all the accommodation that might have been wished could not be afforded to each. Out of the 25, however, 22 or 23 were accommodated with rooms as good as any to which they had been accustomed. The best proof of the humanity and attention of the magistrates of Glasgow was, that immediately after the arrests, they sent to those who had the disposal of the subscriptions for the relief of the distressed, to take care of the families of the prisoners. A more exaggerated account of privations and sufferings than that in the present petition, had never been made by any individual. He was astonished that any one could have put such a statement into the hands of the honourable gentleman—he could not have believed that a statement so little founded in truth, could have been drawn up. He appealed to an hon. gentleman (Mr. J. P. Grant) acquainted with the state of the prison of Glasgow, and with the circumstances attending the arrests in question, whether the representation was not grossly overcharged. He felt, in common with the great body of the people of Scotland, the obligations they were under to the hon. and learned gentleman (Sir S. Romilly) for the improvements which he had introduced into the Suspension Bill, in so far as regarded Scotland; but he could not help saying, that in the present case, the hon. and learned gentleman had been greatly misled.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that as he had lately been in the place referred to in the petition, he felt it his duty to state to the House the circumstances which had come to his knowledge. This subject highly merited their attention, more especially after they had passed bills suspending the Constitution of the country, in so far at least as related to the liberty of the subject. He did not wish to throw any slur on the magistrates of Glasgow. The prison of Glasgow was well constructed, and even handsome, and the general management was praise-worthy. But he blamed them for this: that when so many persons were incarcerated from Sunday morning to the middle of Tuesday, during all that time none of them visited the prison to see what accommodation could be obtained. It so happened, that two persons (Montgomery and Weir), who were discharged as soon as examined, were condemned to cells situated as described in the petition. He admitted, that they were not damp in the degree which one of them stated; but they were on the ground-floor, cold and comfortless, and the prisoners were without any accommodation. After four days' imprisonment they were examined by the sheriff, re-committed by him, and on the next day discharged without any further examination. He had heard that Weir, when asked if he wished to have any additional comforts, said, he had no complaints to make; but the man thought he was on the point of being discharged, instead of which he was detained two days longer. If it was the law of Scotland, that warrants might be issued to take up all and sundry his Majesty's subjects without Christian name, or special designation, he could only say that he had never heard of such a law. But he denied that this was the law of Scotland. He denied that any magistrate could say, Take up a man without any Christian name, residing in such or such a street. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. B. Bathurst said, that the petitioner was arrested, because there was no other person of his description in the neighbourhood. In all such cases, however, application for redress should be made to the ordinary tribunals, and not to Parliament. All necessary accommodation had been afforded to the prisoner.

Sir S. Romilly, in moving that the petition be printed, observed, that in Scotland, where all belonging to the same clan bore the same name, the greatest abuses and oppressions might ensue, if such proceedings were to be esteemed valid. All the Grants and all the M'Intoshes in Scotland might be exposed to imprisonment, and taken under a writ of this description sued out against any one of them. He was aware, that in such a case it might be replied, the party aggrieved had remedy by action. But, if actions against magistrates in Scotland were subject to all the difficulties which attended those against magistrates in England (such as notices to be given beforehand, a nonsuit consequent on failure of notice, and treble costs payable by the plaintiff if he did not succeed), he did not know what likelihood there would be of obtaining any substantial redress; but he was certain that that House would not think so lightly of the liberty of the subject; that they would not protect magistrates in an abuse of their authority; and would feel extremely sensible to any tale of oppression, from whatever quarter it might proceed.

Mr. B. Bathurst could not say whether the law of Scotland, respecting warrants of arrest, differed from the law of England; but he presumed that the subject could not be injured without redress in any part of the kingdom. The transaction now complained of was entirely a mistake, for the officers had been informed that no other person of the name lived within the district.

Mr. Finlay contended, that under the gaol regulations of Scotland, it was impossible a prisoner could have been confined two days without food.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.] The order of the day having been read, for the Rev. Thos. Thirlwall, to attend at the bar of the House, the Sergeant was ordered to require Mr. Thirlwall to be in attendance.

On the question being put that Mr. Thirlwall be called in,

Mr. B. Bathurst rose and suggested, that before the House proceeded to animadvert on the conduct of this individual, they ought to consider the mode in which that animadversion should be expressed, and the amount of punishment to be inflicted for a breach of privilege of this nature. It would be necessary to establish some proportion, and draw some line, inasmuch as there were many others much more guilty than the individual now about to appear.

The Speaker observed, that before the House entered on any discussion, it would be proper to hear the party himself; when the whole matter was before them, they would be enabled to form a better judgment.

Mr. B. Bathurst merely wished to suggest, that if the House expressed itself so jealous of the privileges of a committee, they must go farther, whenever a breach of privilege insulting to the whole House was brought before them: he wished, therefore, to know distinctly how far they were to go in the present instance.

Mr. W. Wynn rose to order. The point the hon. gentleman was pressing had been decided by the House, in ordering the attendance of the reverend gentleman. He having been ordered to attend, and being actually there, must now be brought in before any further step could be taken.

gentleman being in attendance at the door, it was a question for the House, whether he should be called in or no.

Mr. B. Bathurst said, it was certainly open to the House, either to relax or enforce the rules which respected their privileges; but, at all events, they would not suffer any one, to reflect on the conduct of a committee.—If, however, they testified their displeasure against an individual for an attack on the proceedings of a committee, they should at least observe some proportion; and, ought not to animadvert on a light offence, while a heavier remained unpunished. One committee appointed by the House, had been noticed in a public journal in the following terms:—"The aim and object of the committee was not the reduction of expense, or the recommendation of economy, but the expenditure of as much money, and the conniving at the existence of as many places, as the nation could be brought to bear." This was the character given to that committee out of the House. He did not deny that the offence of the gentleman then in attendance was a grave offence; but he did say, that if others of greater magnitude were permitted to go unnoticed, it ought to be visited with less severity.

Mr. W. Wynn declared, that he should be the last man in the House to oppose the moderation inculcated by the honourable gentleman, or to complain unnecessarily that their authority, or that of their committees had been insulted; but he must contend, that each case of contempt was to be weighed on its own grounds, and brought before them on its own merits. He thought, that no course could be more injurious to their privileges, than to argue, that because other libels had passed unnoticed, any instance of disrespect brought before them was to escape reprehension.—There doubtless had appeared in the public press many attacks on the dignity of Parliament, which, for his part, he regretted had not been brought under their notice; but when a libel like this, disrespectful to the House, and highly calculated to impede the exercise of the power of its Committee, did come before them, it could not be suffered to pass without censure. This case, however, was of a particular description, as the individual, after he had been called on to explain his conduct, had aggravated his offence, not only by refusing to retract his expressions, but also by an improper demeanour. Their committee had called on them for protection; the act complained of had been entered on the journals; and if the House did not take notice of it, they would substantially determine that there was no ground of complaint. The argument of the honourable gentleman opposite might have some weight as to the degree of animadversion the House should express on this occasion, after the party had made his appearance; but unless he were called in, the House would in fact have decided that the charge made against him by the committee was without foundation.

Mr. Brougham agreed that every case of breach of privilege should stand upon its own basis, and that no publication could be defended by a reference to others, which a member might conceive to be of a more objectionable tendency. During the debates seven years ago, respecting a breach of privilege, in consequence of which the worthy member for Westminster had been committed to the Tower, he had differed from the majority of the House; he had held at that time in his hand publications of that very morning, which, with this aggravation, that a discussion was then pending, contained, not indeed remarks on the decisions of the House or its Committees, but the most indecent observations on the Parliamentary conduct of individual members. He had come down with those to the House, and shewn them to some of his friends, who argued, that no defence for one breach of privilege was to be drawn from the commission of another. Yet, though it was strictly no defence for Mr. Thirlwall, that many breaches of privilege had passed unnoticed, it was a most material consideration in settling what degree of animadversion should be inflicted on that individual. The apparent inclination of the House to make his punishment extremely light, was so general, that it was unnecessary to say a word more on that subject. As to the notice which the right hon. gentleman (Mr. B. Bathurst) had given to the House and the public of his intention to urge a new course of proceeding on the subject of privilege, he hoped it would be altogether abandoned. A new course of dealing with the public press, unless greater licence prevailed than he saw any reason to apprehend, would be attended with the most serious mischief; and unless the House desired to descend from the high ground on which it had hitherto stood, by putting itself "on the country," it would never depart from the system which it had wisely pursued, and by which its conduct, as well as that of the Government, or that of any individual, were open to discussion within certain bounds chalked out by sound discretion. If public discussion respecting their proceedings transgressed all bounds, the House might at any time, by making an example of the offender, declare that it would go no further. Hitherto they had lost nothing by abstaining from a too vigilant regard of the publication of remarks on their measures; the more they were scrutinized the less it might be found their reputation would suffer, and he dreaded a contrary course more than any blow against the House, except, indeed, one which would destroy their privileges, might destroy their existence, and certainly would put an end to their practical utility—he meant, the enforcement of those orders which would prevent their constituents and the country from becoming acquainted with their deliberations. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh thought his right hon. friend had very properly called the attention of the House to the measure of animadversion that should be inflicted on the present offender; he did not consider that this was the only one that called for the reprehension of Parliament, and he hoped that the principle which dictated it would be impartially applied to others. If any committee employed on an object agreeable to the other side of the House were insulted, there was immediately a loud cry for the support of privilege, while the grossest aspersions on the measures and motives of his side of the House were suffered to pass unnoticed. If the press, in its discussions on the conduct of Parliament, encroached too nearly on their privileges, it should be the subject of fair and impartial examination; and if any member should think fit, in another case, to follow the example which had now been set, he begged the House would bear in mind, that the precedent of severity did not proceed from Ministers or their friends. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Smith was not inclined to go the length of saying, that remarks made on the conduct of an individual member in publications out of the House ought to be severely punished; for while the House was remiss in enforcing one branch of its orders, and permitted what passed without it, to be circulated through the country, the other order, which forbade any remarks on speeches delivered in the House, which might contain observations injurious to individuals, could not be rigorously acted upon. He had, however, thought that thus much was due to the House from one of its members, not to defend in publications his conduct within those walls: and on this principle he had always acted, nor should he be tempted to depart from it for the sake of a temporary triumph. As to the instance before the House, it was absolutely necessary to maintain the authority of committees in any case which affected their power of obtaining information, by the examination of witnesses, which was of such essential importance to the utility of their appointment.

Sir S. Romilly felt it necessary to explain the vote he had given on a former occasion, when Mr. T. was ordered to be called to the bar. He was astonished to hear an attempt to make this a party question, because the Chairman of the Committee, by whom it had been brought forward, sat on that side of the House. It arose out of a Committee on the Police of the Metropolis, one point of which concerned the licensing of public houses. Surely nothing could be more free from party politics than this. He had before differed from the majority of the House in cases in which they had thought proper to visit with punishment what they considered breaches of privilege. He had then thought it most improper to exercise their vindictive powers against an individual for his animadversions on their proceedings, on the same ground as he would have condemned a similar line of conduct followed by courts of justice against authors of remarks on their decisions. If the present case had been of that description, he would not have voted that the individual should be called to the bar. What was the case? The Police Committee had made no Report, but had put the House in possession of evidence on which it might proceed. The gentleman in question had published a work to persuade the House not to proceed on the suggestions of the Committee, complaining of its proceedings, as similar to the Star Chamber, the Committees of the Long Parliament, and the Revolutionary Committees of Public Safety, a copy of which he had sent to every member. This was similar to the case of a publication on a cause pending before a jury, and calculated to influence their judgment, and interrupt the due course of public justice. If the rev. gentleman's offence had not been of this nature, he would not have concurred in passing any censure upon him.

Mr. Ponsonby considered, that nothing could be more injurious to the House than to adopt a very strict conduct as to publications which noticed their proceedings. He was not fully acquainted with the nature of this offence, but he understood that Mr. Thirlwall had printed and published animadversions which tended to impeach the conduct of a committee of that House; and that the committee had in consequence sent for him to explain himself. He could not tell whether Mr. Thirlwall saw his error, and was disposed to apologize; but as he was ordered to attend at the bar, the question could not be got rid of. Certainly, it could not be done by saying that other libellous matter was published against the proceedings or committees of the House. He must, therefore, be called in; and if he shewed a disposition not to persevere, but rather to acknowledge an impropriety, he (Mr. P.) wished the lightest measures to be taken towards him. The whole liberty of this country depended on the publicity of the proceedings of the House of Commons. Any thing that might be done to impair it, would, in his opinion, be a greater blow to public liberty than any other measure. (Hear.) For his own part, he would always rather submit to misrepresentation, than interfere in that House with public observations on any discussion he was concerned in. Unless the reverend gentleman shewed wilful obstinacy, he hoped the House would visit him lightly.

Mr. Canning had no wish whatever to interrupt the pending proceedings; but thought it quite fair in his noble friend to suggest that they were entering into rather a new course, as recently the House had not shewn a disposition to notice these matters. He could not, however, perceive the force of the arguments used by the learned gentleman (Sir S. Romilly) in his allusions to juries and courts of law. The labour of the committee was terminated when the book appeared. (No.) So far it terminated when the report was printed. The learned gentleman must be mistaken. The libel was called, A Vindication of the Tower Hamlet Magistrates from Charges in a printed Book, entitled the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons on the Police of the Metropolis, &c. by Thomas Thirlwall. The book was published, therefore, on a past proceeding, and before the revival of the same committee; it dwelt on a concluded transaction of last year. How could this octavo pamphlet interrupt measures respecting public justice? None were half as likely to have heard of it as of a paragraph in a daily newspaper. He then held in his hand the printed report, and the pamphlet was only a comment upon it. He was ready to close with the learned gentleman on his own premises, for he had admitted that all idle comments on proceedings of that House were better passed by. Perhaps he agreed with him in this; but the learned gentleman thought that if there was a tendency in a publication to incline the House to look with an unfavourable eye at its committees, then a case of interference was established. He begged leave to warn the learned gentleman, that it would not be to one committee only that his observations would apply.

The Clerk then read from the proceedings of the committee, that they had considered the state of the police of the metropolis, and made a report of their examinations, but thought the investigation by no means exhausted; and looked forward to the renewal of their labours, with the hope of recommending measures highly advantageous to the public.

Sir John Newport thought the question really was, whether Mr. Thirlwall had not in his book attacked the committees of the House generally, by his observations respecting committees, the Inquisition, and the Star Chamber. He impeached the right of the House to institute committees of inquiry for any purpose. This was not a parallel case with that of an idle or desultory observation in a newspaper, on any particular committee.—The hon. baronet professed the greatest respect for the liberty of the press, but could not consent to an impeachment of the conduct of a committee.

Mr. Bennet defended his own conduct in the committee. No human being could have taken more care than he did to prevent any political influence from biasing his mind in its proceedings. He had objected in one case to the recording of the evidence of witnesses from a desire to avoid any appearance of being actuated by party feelings. No man either in or out of the House held their privileges in higher respect than himself; but God forbid that their proceedings should not be discussed, or that his own conduct, as well as that of others, should not be examined. He must repel the charge of dearing to interfere with the freedom of the press. In a matter of such high importance as an inquiry into the public police, let the subject be discussed freely, but yet orderly and discreetly. He had to observe, that Mr. Thirlwall called upon him, and told him he was going to write a pamphlet. He replied to him, that he was glad to hear of it, as he wished the subject to be fully discussed; and that he had no other motives for inquiring into abuses, but a sense of his duty as a member of Parliament. Mr. Thirlwall, who appeared to come like a person on a voyage of discovery, then left him. He had fairly answered all Mr. Thirlwall's questions, and he would appeal to the other gentlemen of the committee, whether he had ever shewn anything but mild language and manner to Mr. Thirlwall. He knew nothing about what side his political opinions leaned to; politics had nothing to do with the Committee. The noble lord might as well have spared a remark he had made, by which he introduced a new spirit into this discussion, and which was rather contrary to the usual suavity with which he treated public subjects. He was thereby led to suspect, that Mr. Thirlwall had some political connexions with gentlemen opposite, though the witnesses had no such connexion with him or his friends. He had felt it his duty to summon Mr. Thirlwall before the Committee, in order to give him the opportunity of defending or explaining himself. He did not come to the House in the first instance upon the business, but sent for Mr. Thirlwall, who treated the Committee with great indignity; and who in what he said appeared more offensive in manner than in matter.

Lord Castlereagh wished to say a few words in explanation. He was far from intending to impute partiality. He had read every word of the Report, but not a word of the comments. Until very lately he had never heard of Mr. Thirlwall's name, nor did he know any of his connexions. His opinion was, that Parliament should be protected on all subjects as well as on this; and that one species of inquiry should not alone enjoy exemption.

Mr. Barclay, though not present at the discussion about ordering Mr. Thirlwall's attendance, yet, having seen the conduct of the chairman of the Committee (Mr. Bennet), considered it his duty, after some insinuations had been thrown upon him, (no, no, and hear, hear,) to state, that he knew from private information, that if the chairman had felt any political motives, he could have had some evidence that would have answered such objects. On the contrary, he gave to every person examined a fair opportunity. This he thought it his duty to state.

The Rev. Mr. Thirlwall was then called in. On his appearance at the bar, the Speaker informed him that a complaint had been preferred against him for a publication which contained reflections on one of the Committees of that

House, of which the clerk would read the offensive passages, and that then he might say what he had to say in his own behalf.

The clerk then proceeded to read the passages and the answers which Mr. Thirlwall had given before the Committee. (See page 798.)

The Speaker then asked Mr. Thirlwall what he had now to say respecting the passages complained of in his publication.

The Rev. Mr. Thirlwall said, he hoped the hon. House would do him the justice to believe that he felt great concern at having trespassed upon their privileges and incurred their displeasure. The offensive passages were contained in a work written by him in haste, and with the sole intention of vindicating his brother magistrates and himself against the statements of some witnesses necessarily examined by the Committee. If in his ardent zeal he had incautiously been hurried away from the path he had prescribed to himself, and to which he desired to restrict himself, it was his anxious wish to express his sincere sorrow for it, to that honourable House and to the Committee. Trusting to the clemency of that hon. House, he hoped, and petitioned, that any sentence they might think proper to pronounce would not be such as to degrade his character as a magistrate or a clergyman.

The Speaker.—Have you any thing farther to offer?

Mr. Thirlwall.—Nothing. (He then withdrew.)

Mr. Bennet said, he was not inclined to press for any severity on this occasion. It was necessary, however, that the House should come to some decision, and, therefore, he proposed the following resolutions:

"That the Reverend Thomas Thirlwall, by the said publication, has reflected upon the proceedings and authority of a Committee of this House, and is thereby guilty of a high contempt of the authority of this House, and a breach of its privileges.

"That the Rev. Thomas Thirlwall be again called in, and that Mr. Speaker do communicate to him the said resolution, and, at the same time, acquaint him, that in consideration of the full acknowledgment of his error, and the contrition which he has this day expressed, the House is contented to proceed no further upon the matter of this complaint."

Mr. Brougham did not oppose the motion, but observed, that had this book of Mr. Thirlwall's been nakedly produced, without stating the reverend gentleman's conduct before the Committee, he, for one, would not have consented to call Mr. T. in at all. Though there were objectionable words in the passages read, yet those were contained only in a discussion on a public subject. If they had not been followed by insolent behaviour, they would not have been a fit subject for the House.

Mr. Thirlwall was then called in, and Mr. Speaker having communicated to him the said

Resolutions, he was directed to withdraw: and he withdrew accordingly.

PROPRIETORS OF BANK STOCK.]—Mr. Grenfell said, he knew not whether the motion which he was about to submit to the House would be opposed, or upon what grounds it could be opposed; but he founded it on a paper which he held in his hand, published by order of the Bank Directors. It was an account of the number of proprietors of Bank Stock among whom there was no inconsiderable proportion of aliens. It was not of this that he had any intention to complain; but the profits of the Directors being enormous, he thought it an aggravation that foreigners should pocket our money. The profits of the Bank, he would assert, were undue and unnecessary; the whole system was—to use the words of his lamented friend, Mr. Horner—whose premature death was an irreparable loss to the country, and whose name could not be mentioned without exciting admiration of his talents and respect for his memory, (hear, hear) “the result of extravagance and prodigality on the part of the Government, and of rapacity on the part of the Bank.” One hundred and fifty thousand pounds might be annually saved, if justice and equity were regarded in those transactions; and surely that was not a sum to be overlooked in the present state of the country. These Bank proprietors had, during the last twelve years, had in their possession no less a sum of the public money than 11,000,000*l.* out of which they had made annual profits of not less than from 3 to 600,000*l.*; yet were they paid nearly 300,000*l.* a year for the trouble of making those very profits! Since 1807 sums had been annually advanced by the Bank, which were improperly called loans; for it was only the public money again restored to the public; and for those loans they received 280,000*l.* per annum. He would appeal to any man acquainted with the subject in that House, or out of the House, whether, if a second Bank were established, it would not willingly undertake the whole of this business for 20 or 25,000*l.* per annum. Thus a sum exceeding 400,000*l.* would be saved to the public, a most important consideration, as at this moment it was a matter of the greatest difficulty how to relieve the distresses of the country, and meet the demands of the State. One other circumstance he would mention. In 1797, the Bank was relieved from the necessity of paying in specie; there was in consequence a great addition to their circulation, which, in fact, amounted to 16,000,000*l.*, and consequently their annual profits were not less than 800,000*l.* This was a most oppressive evil; but it was aggravated by the knowledge, that a considerable part of the proprietors were foreigners, living in foreign countries, and that a considerable part of the profits went out of this country. He should therefore move,

“That there be laid before this House, an account of the number of the proprietors of the Bank of England, on 31st of March, 1817; distinguishing the number of aliens, from that of British subjects.

“That there be laid before this House, an account of the aggregate amount of the capital stock of the Bank of England, standing in the names of British subjects, and of aliens, on 31st March, 1817; distinguishing the amount belonging to each of these two classes of proprietors respectively.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not conceive what right that House had to call upon the Bank to lay those accounts upon their table, any more than they had to call upon any mercantile house to lay its accounts before them. He objected, too, to the policy of the proposal. It was for the advantage of this country to encourage foreigners to deposit their capitals among us. What other object could this proposal have than to ascertain and publish the names of all the foreigners who had money in our funds? This, he contended, would be a pernicious thing. Besides, it could not be done; other persons held property in their name, so that the names of the proprietors could not be ascertained; but if it could be done it would be highly injurious. The hon. gentleman had mentioned no reason for this motion. The amount of the profits was no reason; for if foreigners had their money in the Bank, they must have their share of the profits; and besides, the profits had no ostensible connexion either with the number of foreigners or their proportion of stock. If there was any fraud, the public were equally defrauded and injured by native stock-holders as by foreigners. There was in this respect no difference. He therefore considered the motion as unnecessary and improper in all its parts, and as such he hoped it would be resisted.

Mr. Ponsonby was satisfied, that there was not a gentleman in that House more attached to the interests of the country and the prosperity of its commerce than his hon. friend. He did not know the precise object which he had in view by the present motion; yet, knowing his zeal to serve the country, and the good he had already effected, he could not withhold his support. How many motions of his hon. friend had been supposed as dangerous to the interests of commerce, incompetent for that House, and even injurious to the character and prosperity of the country; and yet how many of those very motions were afterwards complied with, and found most beneficial. When he recollected this, when he had seen how much good he had done, when he considered that he had saved 90,000*l.* a year to the country, he was satisfied that he would found some salutary measure upon the documents he now required. At any rate, it could not possibly do any injury. What was it he wished to know? Not the names, if the publication of them did any harm, but the number. How could this shake public credit? What bad effect could arise from knowing that fifty foreigners had each 500*l.* in our funds? Knowing, therefore, the good that his hon. friend had done, leaving it to himself to shew the purpose he had in view, and being persuaded that it could do no possible injury, he should vote for the motion.

Sir J. Newport said, he should wonder how it happened that the Chancellor of the Exchequer always opposed every motion that was made by his hon. friend, though in some cases he afterwards adopted them, if he had not known that the right hon. gentleman was not at liberty on this subject to act according to his own view of the matter: but that his private engagements must influence his conduct. He should feel great surprise that the right hon. gentleman should have shewn his reluctance to receive any proposition respecting the Bank, and yet afterwards act upon it as just and useful, if he had not known that he and the Bank directors were bound to each other, and reluctantly admitted what they could no longer resist; but he had witnessed such conduct so frequently, that he now felt no wonder or surprise. What was the object of this motion? It was merely to have the documents laid upon the table. The facts, indeed, were already well known; but, until the official accounts were produced, no farther steps could be taken. He fully concurred with his right hon. friend near him, that no person was more zealous for the interests of the country and of its commerce than his hon. friend. He had saved more money to the country than all their Finance Committees.

Mr. Manning said, he would avoid entering into any general argument upon the subject. What inference did the hon. gentleman intend to draw from the documents if produced? If there were any errors in the proportions laid before them, who could put them right? He denied the fact of enormous profits being derived by foreigners: profits had nothing to do with the question: the House was bound by its own acts. It had sanctioned and approved of the transactions with the Bank, therefore it could not now call them in question. In 1807 a committee, of which his hon. friend, the member for Corfe Castle (Mr. Bankes), was chairman, had introduced the system that saved all the money to the country. It was upon the recommendation of that committee that Mr. Perceval acted in 1808, when the saving was made. The hon. gentleman could not therefore claim the merit of it. It would be unfair and improper in him to enter into a general answer to the assertions of the hon. gentleman; but he took that opportunity of saying, that on any proper occasion he was ready to meet any reasonable charges that he could bring forward. The object of the motion was unjust, as the ancestors of many of those foreigners might have been natives, and deposited their property in the public funds. Why should the documents be produced? Was it proposed to tax foreign stock? The commissioners of taxes had already found that impracticable. He could assure the House that the proportion of foreign stock was very inconsiderable. No person could tell the injury that might arise from the production of such accounts.

Mr. Grenfell replied, that his objection was to foreigners enjoying the sweets of the business. He wished to shew, that not only was the evil itself great, but that it was much aggravated by conveying so much money out of the kingdom. The proportion of foreigners was 1 to 10. Was the House aware that by their dividends of 7 per cent. the Bank proprietors had made more than 25 millions during the last 20 years; a greater sum than they had made for a whole century preceding? It was said that the committee of 1807, and Mr. Perceval's arrangements in consequence, in 1808, occasioned all the savings, yet this saving had been made within the last two years. By the economical arrangements he proposed, he could save much greater sums per annum; but it was always replied, that these matters might safely be left to the vigilance of Government, and the generosity and liberality of the directors. Parliament had not pronounced any opinion on the subject; they had not given credit to the Government for vigilance, or acquitted the Bank of rapacity. His motion had been only for investigation and inquiry. The refusal contained a proof of neglect but afforded no grounds for forming an opinion. He expressed his hope, that he should be called as a witness before the Committee of Finance now sitting, and pledged himself to prove that a saving of 400,000*l.* per annum—he would repeat it, that a saving of 400,000*l.*—could be effected.

Mr. Marryat stated, that several foreign correspondents of his, who had had large sums of money in the funds, or in Exchequer-bills, had withdrawn their money on the return of peace, either from apprehension of a reduction of the dividends, or some such reason. This was a positive national evil. Any agitation of such a question as the present was impolitic, as tending to excite alarm.

The motion was then negatived without a division.

ELECTIONS.] On the motion of Mr. Wynn, a Committee was appointed "to consider of the best means for shortening the duration of polls, and for the further regulation of elections in Great Britain," and to report their observations and opinion to the House.

CASE OF MARY RYAN.] Sir J. Mackintosh, in bringing forward the subject with regard to the administration of justice in this case, of which he had given notice, professed himself desirous of trespassing as little on the patience of the House as possible, though he hoped he should be indulged in a few observations. The case to which he alluded was one that had lately occurred in London, and was known to most members of the House. It arose out of the condemnation of Patrick Ryan, who was convicted at the Old Bailey two sessions ago, and who was executed, in consequence of a warrant for that purpose, after his case had been reported to the Prince Regent by the Recorder. An attempt had been made to afford him the means of escape between his conviction and the report of his sentence to his Royal Highness; and in this attempt his wife, Mary Ryan, was implicated. She was in consequence brought to trial for this offence, and placed at the bar on the day of her husband's execution. She was thus called upon to make her defence against the charge of favouring the escape of her husband in the forenoon of the day of his death, while her mind was perplexed with agony and distracted by the wounds given to those affections, of whose existence the crime for which she was tried furnished the most convincing evidence. He was not disposed to take up lightly any suspicion against the manner in which justice was administered, and he did not despair of hearing a satisfactory explanation of this apparently unjustifiable act; but till he did receive such an explanation, he would not hesitate to call it one of the gravest indecours that had ever come within his knowledge, and one of the most revolting instances of inhumanity that could prejudice human jurisprudence. (Hear, hear.) When he went thus far, he was not bound to contend that the proceeding was illegal: for the House did not require to be told that many things which transgressed no positive law, were yet of such a nature as to outrage those sentiments of humanity, and violate that sense of justice, which were implanted in the hearts of all men, by which the goodness of all laws was to be tried, and which no act done under the forms of law should counteract or injure. To punish domestic affection, to wound the dearest feelings in the breast of a wife, to endeavour to extinguish those instincts which nature had implanted for the best purposes, and rend those ties which were the surest guard of morals, and the firmest bonds of society, was as far removed from wise policy, as it was inconsistent with nature and humanity; and no man who had any regard for the institutions of his country would wish to see their forms thus used to cover objects so unworthy of their spirit. Few persons of sensibility had read without admiration and emotion the heroic fidelity which lady Nithsdale shewed in attempting to rescue her husband from the Tower. He would ask, was the scale of merit to be measured by the condition of the parties; was that which was admired in a lady of rank, to be punished in the humble and friendless wife of a more ignoble criminal? (Hear, hear.) He did not complain of the illegality of the sentence—he did not even complain of the institution of the trial; what he complained of was, that the prosecution was not dropt when the mercy of the Crown was refused to the object for attempting whose deliverance this legal criminality had been incurred. He could not trust himself with describing the character of the prosecutors, when he considered the circumstance in which they pressed the trial. If they had the feelings of men, they must have known that respect for her husband and sorrow at his fate must have prevented this wretched woman from taking those steps which were necessary to meet her accusers and prepare her defence. If distracted with agony, it was the same thing as if she were distracted with madness; and whether she were dragged from a cell in Newgate or a cell in Bedlam, she was in these circumstances equally unfit to be brought to the bar of a court of justice. (Hear, hear, hear.) She, therefore, ought not to have been tried; or rather, she could not be said in the eye of humanity, or even of law, to be tried at all; for there was no trial where there could be no defence. (Hear, hear.) He was perfectly unacquainted with the history or character of this person, except in so far as it appeared in the lamentable circumstances to which he had alluded; but the more humble, and unprotected, and unknown, the individual was, the more was the House called upon to inquire into her treatment, and to afford her its protection. He might be told, that in this case there was no fault on the part of any one, but an inevitable misfortune; and he should be as glad to see as he was willing to believe, that this might be made out to be the fact. He should then only have to lament an unavoidable calamity, where he was now inquiring into an apparent inhumanity. On the other hand, it would have been prevented by vigilance and foresight. The blame would still fall somewhere, though there might be no criminal intention. Was it not possible, then, to have prevented this trial by a mere nolle prosequi on the part of the Crown? Was there ever a case that was more worthy of interference? Had any Attorney-General that ever was in this country been applied to, would he have refused? He was sure the good-natured and humane person who had just retired from that situation would have prevented this prosecution had he been apprised of the circumstances. It had been said, that this was the last day of the sessions; and that this individual, if she had not been tried on that day, must have suffered confinement till next sessions. He admitted there would have been some weight in this objection, had the trial been appointed to take place at a distance; but he did not see its force in the present instance, where a nolle prosequi might have been obtained, and the prisoner discharged, in 24 hours. In this case she would have been able to have paid, as the best solace of her affection, those rude honours to her unfortunate husband, according to the style of her country, which it was her anxious wish to perform. (Hear, hear.) Her fate had, indeed, been severe; and if ever she returned to her native country, she was not likely to spread that love for the laws of England, and that affection for its institutions, which ought to be generally diffused, and which in no country were more necessary or would be more beneficial. (Hear, hear.) Her story would not be confined to this country; it would be listened to over Europe, wherever we had a friend to feel shame, or an enemy to enjoy a triumph. (Hear, hear.) The consideration that it would spread over Europe, and would be made a test of the excellence of our criminal jurisprudence, or produced as a feature of our national character, was one chief reason, among others, why he had mentioned it in Parliament; and he entertained the hope that a public declaration in this House would counteract the impression made against us abroad, and convince the world that its apparent inhumanity did not escape notice, and that the terms in which it was mentioned shewed it to be rather an exception from the usual course of our judicial proceedings than a common specimen. (Hear.) The hon. and learned gent. concluded by moving for "An Account of the dates of the Report of the Recorder of London to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent on the case of Patrick Ryan, otherwise Brown, lately convicted of Highway Robbery at the Old Bailey; of the Warrant for the Execution of the said Ryan, and of the time when he suffered death; together with the dates of the finding of an Indictment against Mary Ryan, otherwise Brown, his wife, for aiding in an attempt to procure the escape of the said Patrick Ryan from prison; and of the Trial and Conviction of the said Mary on that charge."

Mr. H. Addington wished to say only a few words, and he would not have spoken at all if it had not been in his power to afford information. The hon. mover seemed aware of one ground of defence which he thought very strong, namely, that this was the last day of the sessions, and that the unfortunate woman, if not then tried, must have endured three months longer confinement. Thus she was tried on a principle of humanity, and he was now enabled to say, that if the motive was humane, the result had been fortunate. It was a happy circumstance that she then was tried, because, though convicted, her pardon immediately followed. (Hear, hear.) His noble relative (Lord Sidmouth) having heard the circumstances on Saturday, recommended her on the Monday to the mercy of the Crown, and her pardon was granted. He objected to the motion, as it might tend, if complied with, to excite suspicion on the administration of justice.

Mr. Alderman Atkins assured the hon. gentleman (Sir J. Mackintosh) that the Magistrates considered anxiously what method could be employed to prevent the trial, but found that it could not be done. Had the trial been postponed, it would only have been an additional confinement, which would in itself have been a punishment. He could assure the House that no means were used on the part of the City to provoke a prosecution or to urge its activity. Her trial was conducted with every disposition to produce an acquittal. Her defence was conducted by a counsel who had much zeal, and his exertions made considerable impression in her favour; but to the great disappointment of the court and jury, a verdict was necessary against her. Every comfort was administered to her in the afflicting situation in which she stood. The recommendation of the jury to mercy was received with heartfelt joy. All parties sympathized in her fate, and a liberal subscription was immediately entered into for her aid.

Lord Castlereagh trusted that the hon. member, when he saw that it was a principle of clemency, and not negligence or inhumanity, that led to the course which he had censured, would withdraw his motion. No suspicion could attach to the administration of justice in this case: and he hoped, therefore, that the motion for papers, which seemed to encourage such a suspicion, would not be pressed.

Sir S. Romilly felt extremely obliged to the hon. gentleman who brought forward this motion, both because he thought it important to the fate of the individual, and to the general administration of justice, that a satisfactory account of the trial should be laid before the House and the public. He was happy from what he had heard, that no ground of complaint existed either against the Government or the magistracy, but that the greatest humanity had been shewn by both. (Hear, hear!) He could not say the same, however, of the prosecutors: it was a public prosecution; no private person was concerned; no one had been bound by recognizance. It was said, that if she had not been tried then, she could not have been tried till another sessions. This might be the case, but what was the necessity for trying her at all? Why was her trial persevered in after her husband had been refused the royal clemency? A total want of reflection must be the only apology for the prosecution, considering the state into which the Court was put by being obliged to exercise the law of the land at the expense of the law of nature. There could be no material criminality in what this woman had done: it was well known that a woman was so much under the influence of her husband, that, except in cases of felony, she was not liable for her own actions. The prosecutors therefore had proceeded in the letter of the law, but had forgotten its spirit. When she had almost suffered death in the death of her husband, she ought to have been acquitted of the charge of favouring his escape. The worthy alderman had said that the jury had wished to find her innocent, but the facts were so strong that they could not make the verdict agree with their feelings. Nothing could put in a stronger light the inhumanity and impolicy of the prosecution; what could be more mischievous than to be called to execute laws in cases from which the feelings of mankind are abhorrent? Could any thing tend more to bring law and the administration of justice into odium? Accordingly, in this case, from the account which he had seen in the newspapers, every heart had rebelled against the sentence. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. B. Bathurst observed, that if it was to be held out to the public and the world, that there had been an abuse of justice, and a case of inhumanity, he trusted that all the circumstances would be accurately represented, and that foreign countries, to whom it was said the knowledge of the transaction would extend, might have the means of forming a correct judgment upon the matter. It would then appear, that the woman in question had been tried on the day stated for being instrumental in attempting to effect the escape, not merely of her husband, but two other felons, by one and the same act. Her trial had been brought on when she might have traversed the indictment at her own desire, and by the advice of her counsel. The judgment on conviction was one month's imprisonment, and this punishment had been remitted by the clemency of the Crown. These were the plain circumstances of the case, and it should be recollected, that when the prosecution was commenced, it was uncertain whether her husband had been executed or not. He apprehended, the prosecutors could have pursued no other course, and that the period of the trial had been considered by her counsel as that which was calculated to prove the most favourable to her interests.

Mr. H. Martin conceived that there would have been no difficulty in restoring the unfortunate woman to liberty without putting her upon her trial. If the prosecutor had declined to come forward, the witnesses might have been discharged from their recognizances. He should give his vote in support of the motion, not for the purpose of inculpating individuals, but to defend the character of justice and the decorum of judicial proceedings. However humble the person who had been the sufferer in the present case, he recollected none that had created so much disgust, or been received with such disapprobation in the public mind. The woman certainly, with regard to her offence, was not in a capacity to be supposed acting under the influence of her husband, and was therefore legally subject to conviction. The motion, however, in his opinion, threw no censure on the general administration of criminal justice in the country; but, on the contrary, if assented to, would tend to exalt and vindicate its character.

Sir J. Mackintosh would trouble the House with a very few words in reply to the observations which had been made upon this subject. He had not the slightest intention to impute blame to the conduct of Government, who he thought had displayed an alert and vigilant humanity. Neither did he ascribe any want of feeling to the worthy alderman of the city magistrates. He must still contend, however, that his complaint had not been answered. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bathurst) had failed in shewing any reason why a nolle prosequi was not entered by the law-officers of the Crown in order to prevent this odious, immoral, and detestable prosecution. (Hear, hear.) If not a violation of the letter, it was wholly repugnant to the spirit of British law. It was unnatural in the beginning; but after the Recorder's report, and before the day of the woman's trial, how was it that the magistrates, who then knew the day appointed for the execution, had taken no steps to apprize the Attorney-General of this calamitous coincidence? Here he thought there was serious blame imputable to them; but a third stage of the business remained, when the blame that attached to their proceedings was of a still more aggravated kind. When this unhappy woman was standing under accusation at the bar, why was not the legal remedy, with which he must suppose the presiding officer to be acquainted, resorted to? To have suggested to the prosecutor not to call his witnesses, would have been a smaller deviation from duty than to induce the jury to pronounce a verdict in violation of their oaths. He thought the lenity of the judgment no extenuation of the error of the magistrate; and, indeed, a harsher sentence would have been an indication of incredible cruelty. The punishment was in putting her upon her trial, in placing her at a criminal bar, a few hours after the death of her husband, with an orphan in her arms, and in a state of anguish and confusion of mind which must have disqualified her for making her defence. (Hear, hear.) God forbid that he should ascribe an intention on the part of the magistrates that this scene should be exhibited; he was not pleased to appear as an accuser: but he could have wished that their humanity had in this instance been less sluggish, and their sense of justice more alive. There had not been that unanimous manifestation of sentiment in the House which could induce him to withdraw his motion, and he should therefore press it, if only to mark the sense of the House with regard to the apparent negligence and insensibility which had led to this unhappy accident.

Lord Castlereagh declared, that with a view of precluding all difference of feeling on such a question, he was willing to give his support to the motion. (Hear, hear.) The motion was accordingly put and carried.

OFFICE ABOLITION BILL.—Mr. D. Gilbert brought in a bill, "to abolish the offices of the Wardens, Chief Justices, and Justices in Eyre, north and south of Trent," which he moved should be read a first time.

Sir J. Newport asked whether the hon. mover had contemplated the possibility of the Lords passing one of the bills for abolishing a few offices, throwing out the remainder, and then passing the bill for giving general compensations, so as to impose additional burdens, instead of furnishing relief to the country.

Mr. D. Gilbert did not think the case, although possible, was very likely to occur. He had adopted this course as the most eligible; and if the Lords should conduct themselves in so unbecoming a manner, he hoped that that House had the power to compel them to do their duty. (Order, order.)

Mr. Pansey reminded the House, that on a former occasion the highest authority in the other House had described the Sinecure Abolition Bill as neither more nor less than a measure to take away the whole influence of the Crown; and that the result imagined by his hon. friend was not so improbable as might be supposed.

Mr. Huskisson remarked, that the possibility of such a case had not escaped the attention of the committee. The House, however, was competent to legislate for itself. Great difficulties must necessarily present themselves in carrying such extensive changes into effect. It had lately been found impossible, in a single enactment, to regulate all the different offices of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland. If the Lords should adopt the course that had been supposed, that House possessed the power of correcting the evil. There were means to which he could not properly allude; but it was obvious, that it was competent for any hon. member to introduce a bill to repeal the compensation act, if the other House should pass it, and reject the abolition bills. It was not for the House, however, to act on a supposed disposition in another place; if they were to be deterred from measures which they considered right, on the anticipation of difficulties or impediments which might possibly arise in another quarter, they need never attempt to legislate at all.

Mr. J. P. Grant thought the difficulties were greater than the hon. gentleman seemed to apprehend. The Lords wishing to exercise their right of decision fairly, might either reject all the bills together, or take part and pass the remuneration bill with that part. Why should the House originate a difficulty when they had before them a plain course by which it could be avoided? But this proceeding was consistent with the whole plan and concoction of this business, which seemed as if purposely thrown into the shape most likely to render the apparent object unattainable.

Mr. Brougham was so desirous to get rid of the sinecures to be abolished by this bill, that it should have his support, notwithstanding that he disapproved of some parts of its contents. He had not yet heard it read, but he understood there was a clause to save vested interests. In the principle of that clause he did not concur, and would reserve to himself the right of objecting to it on the second reading.

The bill was then read a first time.

OFFICE REGULATION BILL.]—Mr. D. Gilbert brought in a bill "to regulate the offices of his Majesty's Exchequer in England and Ireland respectively," and moved that it be read a first time.

Mr. Tierney could not help thinking that the real object of this multiplication of bills was that none of them should pass. Three months had already been lost since the appointment of the committee, and the very introduction of the bills delayed until the month of May. What difficulty was there in comprehending all the measures in one bill? On the last occasion the Lords did not object to that arrangement; it was on account of their dislike of the principle of abolition that they rejected the bill. The month of June would arrive before the bills could pass through the forms of that House. Was it treating the Lords decently to send them up the bill at that advanced period of the session? He sincerely believed that the number of bills would be the means of getting rid of the business altogether. He could not conceive how it was possible for them to pass. He did not suppose that it had been the wish of those who prepared the bills that disappointment should be the result of their labours; but if they really wished that the measure of abolishing sinecures should be defeated, he was convinced they could not have adopted a better mode of accomplishing their purpose.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was aware that there had been an objection to the principle of the former bill in another place, but that was not the only objection made to it. Its including all the offices proposed to be abolished was thought a ground for rejecting it. He thought that a much better opportunity of carrying the measures the House had in view would be obtained by passing separate bills, than by putting so many objects into one bill.

Sir J. Newport was surprised that the right hon. gentleman should suppose that it would have a better effect to pass ten bills than one. It might be recollected, that in 1806 he had introduced a bill to abolish thirty-six offices, and to regulate about thirty more, and that the bill passed without any difficulty. When the member for Corfe Castle, who was not present, brought in his bill, it passed that House almost unanimously; and it was not on account of the form in which it had passed that it was lost in another place. Thus all the experience that the House had on the subject was entirely against the opinion of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Goulburn was of opinion, that having distinct bills before the House was an advantage, as it would afford them the opportunity of discussing them separately. The hon. and learned gentleman, and others who voted with him, who objected to the principle of compensation, surely could not be displeased that an opportunity was afforded for the consideration of that principle separate from the question of abolition.

Lord Milton wished to know what course the hon. chairman of the committee meant to pursue—whether he intended to pass the compensation bill, and send it to the Lords along with the first bills he introduced; or whether he would propose to pass all the bills first, and keep the compensation bill in reserve?

Mr. D. Gilbert said, it was his wish that the bills should proceed through the House, pari passu. Only the two he had now introduced were yet ready, the others he expected to be able to bring in to-morrow.

Mr. Brougham was afraid the hon. gentleman would be disappointed in his wishes to make the bills proceed pari passu. Unfortunately there was something in the nature of bills which rendered that impracticable. They could not move together, but must follow one after the other. Ten Bills could no more march through the House abreast than ten battalions of infantry. An hon. gentleman had said, that if the Lords passed the compensation bill, without passing the others, a bill might be brought in to repeal the compensation act; but suppose the Lords should not choose to pass this repealing bill, might not their Lordships say that they were very well satisfied with things as they were? He could see no reason why four or five of these bills at least might not be joined in one. No good reason why this was not done had been assigned, and he believed none could be assigned, except that which had occurred to many minds, namely, that this division into ten bills was nothing more nor less than a measure of stage effect. Finding that there was a general cry throughout the land against these odious sinecures, Ministers had fallen upon this method to try whether they could not obtain a little sneaking popularity. They wished to economize the measure as they did the money of the public. They wished to have it to say, you see what an excellent economical administration we are; here we are labouring night after night, passing bill after bill, and even trying to make ten move all at once, pari passu, for the public benefit. Unfortunately, however, it might be recollected, that the member for Corfe Castle had formerly brought in one bill which did all the business of these ten. An hon. gentleman had spoken of the advantage of having a bill for the compensations only; but there was no difficulty in putting all the other bills together, and keeping the compensation bill separate; in fact, as the arrangement now stood, it exhibited altogether a most discordant, unharmonious, and nonsensical measure.

Mr. Huskisson thought it rather singular that so much time should have been occupied respecting a mere matter of form, when it had been understood, more than one hour and a half ago, that subjects likely to occasion discussion were to be avoided. With respect to the delay in bringing forward this business, it ought to be recollected, that the report had lain six weeks on the table of the House; but it was not the fault of his honourable friend that the discussion had not been brought on. It had been retarded by circumstances which every one who heard him, lamented. The right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Tierney), who was now so forward in blaming the course in which it had been thought proper to proceed with this business, was as much dissatisfied with the proceedings in the committee. It appeared that he was actually afraid that the abolition of sinecures should be accomplished. He attended the committee only one day, and then he was disconcerted at seeing the business going on so well in the hands of the hon. chairman. He had now, however, resumed his good humour, because he supposed that the measure was put into a shape in which it could not be carried. For his part he was not of that opinion. He believed that the measure had now a much better chance of success than if the House had attempted to pass only one bill.

Mr. Tierney hoped the hon. gentleman would explain what he meant by saying that he was uneasy or disconcerted when he attended the committee. He had spoken with no disrespect of the motives of others, and he knew not what right the hon. gentleman had to apply such language to him. The only part he took in the committee on the day he attended (he ought, perhaps, to ask God to forgive him for attending it at all) was to put himself under the wing of the hon. member for Corfe Castle, who, he was sure, was sincere in his wish of abolishing sinecures. It was singular, indeed, if those who had formerly opposed all propositions for that abolition were now to be regarded as the only sincere supporters of the measure. He would repeat, that the measure would be lost by being divided into ten bills; he wished it to be put into a shape in which it might pass; but from the course which the business had taken he was convinced that the whole was a juggle.

Mr. Huskisson explained. He had said the right hon. gentleman was disconcerted at finding the business going on in the committee in the hands of his (Mr. Huskisson's) friends.

Mr. Tierney.—I have a right to call on the hon. gentleman to state what reason he has for saying I was disconcerted in the committee. What mark did he perceive of my being disconcerted?

Mr. Huskisson.—I do not know that the right hon. gentleman has any right to call upon me to answer these questions: but when I saw him attend the committee on the first day only: when I saw that he took no interest in the proceedings, and find that he comes down this day and calls all that is done a juggle, I infer that he was disconcerted.

Mr. Tierney.—I have but one word more to say. The House knows the value of the honourable gentleman's assertion, and what he means by my being disconcerted.

Mr. Gilbert explained, that when he spoke of forwarding the bills all together, he meant passing them through their respective stages on the same day.

The bill was then read a first time.

Sir J. Newport said, as the hon. gentleman meant to bring in so many bills, he would suggest to him the introduction of another, which, in his opinion, was very desirable—a bill to abolish the Board of Works in Ireland; on the inutility of which, a committee of that House had already pronounced.

Thursday, May 8.

CATHOLICS.—The Earl of Donoughmore presented petitions from the Roman Catholics of Ireland, praying to be relieved from their present disabilities. They stated, among other matters, that they had devised an expedient for removing the fears of those who were alarmed at the idea of foreign influence, and this expedient was, the making the nomination of their bishops completely and strictly domestic; and they entertained a confident hope that they could procure the consent of the head of their church to this arrangement. The first petition was from the great body of the Irish Catholics. The second was from the Catholics of the county and city of Waterford. There were two others on the table, one from the meeting at Lord Trimleston's, the other from the Catholic clergy. He had a letter from those noblemen and gentlemen who signed the petition at Lord Trimleston's, stating that, as their petition lay on the table, they did not think it necessary to petition again, and requesting that the subject might now be brought under consideration. The clergy had refrained from again petitioning for the same reason; but had requested that the Catholic claims might now be considered; and they had sent over two of their body, in order to render every possible assistance in effecting the object in view, and answering every question which this and the other House of Parliament might think proper to put to them. He would move that the first petition be read: and the ordinary course would be then to propose to their lordships to fix a day for taking the petition into consideration. He would abstain from that, however, at present, as an early day had been fixed for the discussion in another place, and it was desirable that the subject should not be under discussion in both Houses at the same time. Besides, he had hopes that the matter would come before their lordships in another shape—he meant by a bill from the Commons. He would much rather have it before them in that way than in any other; but in case he should be disappointed, he would then propose an early day for the discussion in their lordships' house.

Both petitions were then presented and read, and were in substance the same as the previous petitions; praying the House to consider the numbers, the property, the services, the loyalty, and sufferings of the petitioners, and to remove the remaining disabilities under which they laboured.

The Earl of Darnley said, it was not his wish to anticipate the discussion of this subject: he was not sanguine enough to believe, with his noble friend, that the result of the discussion in the other House would be favourable. But if the Roman Catholics should be again disappointed, he trusted they would not despair, but still look forward with confidence to the final accomplishment of the object of their wishes.

The petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

Thursday, May 8.

USURY LAWS.—Mr. Sergeant O'Sullivan brought in his bill "for repealing the Laws which prohibit the taking of Interest for Money, or limit the rate thereof," which was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

STEAM BOATS.—On the motion of Mr. Harvey, a Committee was appointed "to consider of the means of preventing the mischief of Explosion from happening on board Steam Boats, to the danger or destruction of his Majesty's Subjects on board such boats."

MILITARY PUNISHMENT.—Sir F. Bouverie, seeing the hon. and learned gentleman, the Judge Advocate, in his place, rose to call his attention to a circumstance of considerable importance, more particularly after the opinions which, he believed he was correct in saying, the hon. and learned gentleman had delivered last year in that House on the subject of military flogging. It was stated, in a paper which he then held in his hand, that a melancholy instance of the consequence of flogging soldiers had lately occurred at Carlisle, when a private of the 13th regiment of light dragoons having been flogged once, and received as many lashes as he could bear, was ordered to be brought out at a future day to receive the remainder of his sentence. In the interval, however, the unhappy man, alarmed by the recollection of his former sufferings, terminated his existence. This melancholy event, said the hon. baronet, was the more to be lamented, and deserved the more serious investigation, as the man's only offence was, that he had married a young woman without the consent of his officers. (Hear, hear.) It was said, that his character was exceedingly good; that he had served his country in many battles, in Portugal, Spain, and France; and that he was highly respected in his regiment. The subject to which the hon. baronet wished to call the attention of the learned gentleman was, whether he did not say it was illegal to bring out a man to be flogged a second time, when he could not bear the whole of his punishment the first time.

Mr. Manners Sutton said, that he did not know of the existence of any such case, and did not think it could have occurred. If the hon. baronet had no other information than this newspaper, he did not believe it. His opinion respecting military flogging was certainly the same as he had before stated; and, in fact, it had been adopted by the Commander-in-chief in practice, and was known to be his orders. He could only repeat, therefore, that he entertained very considerable doubts as to the truth of the statement contained in that paper: for if it had been true, it was most likely that he should have heard of it. After what had passed, however, he would make it his duty to inquire, if the hon. baronet would furnish him with the name of the individual, and the date of his punishment. (Hear.)

Sir F. Burdett was perfectly satisfied with this explanation. He certainly had no other information than what this paper contained. The name of the individual was not mentioned, but merely that he was a private of the 18th light dragoons. The statement was made in a weekly paper about 10 days ago. He had thought, however, that a regular return was made on these matters; and, therefore, that the hon. and learned gentleman would have been prepared to speak upon it, from his official information.

Mr. Manners Sutton replied, that the returns were made, but not in his office. If, however, such a case had been known to any office whatever, it was not likely that he should not have heard of it. He had no doubt it would turn out to be a perfect libel on those who were accused of having inflicted the punishment; and he regretted that it had been brought before the public on such slight authority, and before any regular investigation could be made.

MR. HERRIES' APPOINTMENT.]—Mr. Bennet, in rising to bring under the notice of the House the half-pay which Ministers had thought fit to be stow on the late Commissary-in-Chief, felt it hardly necessary to say that he was led to it solely by motives of a public nature, as he had not the honour of any acquaintance with the gentleman whose name was connected with the motion. It seemed that Mr. Herries entered the public service in 1798, as a clerk of the Treasury, and in that situation, and as secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he continued till 1811. In July, 1811, he was appointed Comptroller of Public Accounts, and in October following he left that office for that of Commissary-in-Chief. It was necessary to state respecting this last office, that from 1793 to 1809, it had been conducted in a manner which was considered to be prejudicial to the public service, and on complaint made by Sir John Moore and Sir Arthur Wellesley, now Duke of Wellington, it was wished to put the office on a new footing. Colonel Gordon, now Sir W. Gordon, was consulted, and he undertook to remodel the office, which duty he performed in a manner as creditable to himself, as it was advantageous to the public. From 1809 to 1811, Colonel Gordon performed the business of the office, and in the latter year, when Mr. Herries was appointed, he found the whole machine operating so regularly, that it might be compared to those engines in which the power of a giant is directed by an infant's arm. The merit of Mr. Herries consisted only in keeping it at work. What was the manner in which these gentlemen had been remunerated? Sir W. Gordon, who had established the system of Commissariat, had quitted the office of Commissary-in-Chief, and the salary of 2,555*l.* a year for that of Quarter-Master-General, a most laborious office, at a salary of 2,000*l.*, now reduced to 1,800*l.* a year. Mr. Herries, on the other hand, had received half-pay 1,355*l.* superadded to an office of 1,500*l.* a year—the Auditorship of the Civil List. He did not, however, in fact, receive more than 2,700*l.* a year. Thus for five years' service in the Commissariat and 13 years' service as a clerk, this gentleman had 2,700*l.* a year, 1,300*l.* for doing nothing, and the rest for doing little more than nothing. Now it was contended that the office of Commissary-in-Chief was a civil appointment, and therefore entitled to compensation. He did not wish to try the case on the precedents of extravagance, which had been inherited by lineal descent from Treasury to Treasury, (unfortunately there were too many instances of a lavish expenditure of the public money)—but he could prove, that the office was not a civil but a military office. On the commission of military inquiry, as appeared by the evidence, this officer being asked whether his office was civil or military, replied that it was military. The commission was issued from the War Office, the appointment was gazetted among the Staff. The Commissary was enjoined to obey orders from the King and Commander-in-Chief; and lastly, he was subject to the Mutiny Act. (Hear, hear.) If it was a military office, it would entitle the holder to half-pay. But what was the half-pay of Commissaries General in Chief—as Mr. Bergman, Sir James Kennedy. These gentlemen who had served in foreign parts, and the most unhealthy climates, who had shared the fatigues and dangers of the army, for the subsistence of which they provided by their activity, had 600*l.* a year; while this gentleman who had been seated snugly at home, on the very threshold of favour and promotion, had 1,350*l.* In the minute of the Treasury, fixing the remuneration to Mr. Herries, on relinquishing the office of Commissary-in-Chief, at 1,350*l.*, it was said, that if he accepted any other office, he should only receive so much of that allowance, as would make the whole amount to 2,700*l.* This was spoken of as if the appointment to another office were contemplated as a distant contingency; but on the very same day, this gentleman was appointed Auditor of the Civil List, for which he received 1,500*l.* a year. In that office there was little to be done, and persons with all securities as to character and talents, would be found ready to perform it at 500*l.* a year. (Hear, hear.) He hoped to hear some opinion from the Committee of Finance on this office. As he had shewn that the appointment of Commissary-in-Chief was military, it was known, that by the regulations of the service, when an officer on half-pay received any office, civil or military, his half-pay fell in. The indulgence to this gentleman might be contrasted with the rigour exercised towards those in lower situations. He held in his hand a letter from the Secretary at War to the colonel of a regiment, requiring the names of those lieutenants who held other civil or military appointments, by which their half-pay was forfeited. When these circumstances were taken into consideration, it should also be considered at what time this transaction had taken place. It was at a time when there was an universal cry of distress throughout the land—at a time when the rich were compelled to give their superfluities, and others their necessities of life, to the relief of their poorer brethren. At such a time, the grant of 2,700*l.* a year to a person, whose services had not been very long or very important, seemed an insult to the public. He did not say that some reward should not be bestowed upon this gentleman; but when the general misery and want were contrasted with this prodigal waste, the House would perceive that Ministers did not consider how they might save, but how they might squander, the money wrung from penury, on their favourites and adherents.—He concluded by moving a Resolution:

“That the allowing the late Commissary-in-Chief, upon the abolition of his office, to retain half his salary of 2,700*l. per annum*, as a retiring pension, was an excessive remuneration, regard being had to the length of his service in the commissariat department; and that the permitting him to hold an office of 1,500*l. per annum* in addition to the same, is an improvident expenditure of the public money, and establishes a precedent which this House conceives to be injurious to the public interest.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was willing to allow the hon. gentleman all possible credit for the independency of his motives in bringing forward this question; but he trusted what he had to say would satisfy every impartial gentleman who heard him, that in the arrangement by the Treasury, nothing had been done but what was conformable to strict and rigorous justice. The hon. gentleman had not, in his opinion, fairly stated the services of Mr. Herries, by designating him as a clerk. It was more than eighteen years since this gentleman became a servant of the public. Some time afterwards, when he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was appointed Secretary to the Treasury, he became his private secretary. He was afterwards private secretary to Mr. Perceval; and surely the hon. gent. must know very little of the important duties of such an individual, when he described his employment merely as that of a clerk. It was a situation of the greatest confidence, and one that in all times had usually led to great promotion and emolument. But, without entering into any comparisons of the rewards which other persons had obtained at other periods, who had executed such important duties, he should only say, that it did not appear to him that this gentleman was at all overpaid by what had been done for him. Mr. Herries, as he had said, had been fixed on by the discernment of Mr. Perceval, to be his private Secretary. He had afterwards proceeded to be one of the Comptrollers of the Army Accounts, at a salary of 1,500*l.* a year. In the year 1811, he was in possession of this office, and he resigned it to become Commissary-general, not on account of the removal of Colonel Gordon for the purpose, as the hon. gentleman insinuated, but because that gallant officer chose to relinquish the appointment, in order that he might resume his military career, which was more congenial with his wishes, and which he had quitted with regret when the situation of Commissary was proposed to him by Mr. Perceval. The situation as given to Colonel Gordon, differed very materially from that held by Sir Brook Watson, the duties of which related only to Great Britain, and had nothing to do with our armies abroad. But Colonel Gordon had to perform the united duties of both, which entailed upon him a more enlarged responsibility. Mr. Herries came to the office with all its arduous labours and responsibility, and he held it till 1816, when it was thought that a more economical arrangement might be made by reuniting the Commissariat as it stood at the beginning of the war, in the annexation of a part of it to the Treasury. He could tell the hon. gentleman, that by this arrangement 11,000*l.* a year had been saved to the public by a reduction of 42 officers from the former establishment. A still further saving had been effected by reuniting the whole of the department to the Treasury, as it was in former times of peace; Mr. Herries was in his friendship and confidence; but he had not been so fortunate as to contribute to his advancement in life. He was indebted to Mr. Perceval for whatever advantages he possessed: and surely it could not be denied that this gentleman was entitled to the consideration of his country, when it was recollected that he was the son of the father of the volunteer system, from which the country had derived that universal military spirit that had enabled us to bid defiance to the threats of invasion, and not very remotely led to those great results by which our prowess had been signalised all over the world. He had entered on the office of Commissary-in-Chief at a time the most arduous and important of any that had ever occurred in this country, and there he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) found him.—When his retirement came to be considered, it appeared to be clear, that as he was not entitled to half-pay, from not being a military officer, there could be no way of remunerating him, but by adopting some other mode, and it was decided that he ought to have a compensation not exceeding one half of his salary; and this he was deemed to have merited from having been 18 years in the public service, during which time he had filled so many important stations. He was, therefore, allowed to retire with one half of his salary; but with the consideration, that if he was called again to the performance of public duties, his whole income was not to exceed 2,700*l.*, and which he now obtained by his late civil appointment. It could hardly be expected by the House, that Mr. Herries should take upon himself the duties attached to the office of Auditor of the Civil List, for an increase of income of 150*l. per annum*.—That office had been appointed by Parliament on full consideration of the subject, from a conviction that it was the only way in which the expenditure of the Civil List could be controlled. The measure had proved effectual, and though under the old system, there had constantly been found an excess of expense, no excess had taken place since the change to which he had adverted had been made. For this Parliament was to be thanked rather than Mr. Herries or the Government; but it must be seen, that if Mr. Herries had not been named Auditor of the Civil List, some other person must have been appointed to that situation, and he knew of no gentleman more fitted to fill it with advantage to the public, from his character, talents, and extensive acquaintance with the world. This gentleman, when at the Ordnance, had exerted himself with much success, and the country had considerably benefited by his labours, but when the question as to what remuneration he ought to receive was under consideration, he thought it necessary to bring his services more distinctly before the House than he had yet done. The appointments of Colonel Gordon and Mr. Herries had been spoken of as being in every respect the same. On the first view of the subject, there certainly appeared no difference between them, but the duties which the two individuals had to perform varied most materially. In order to shew this, he would state what were the sums for which former Commissioners General had had to account, and what those were which were to be accounted for in Mr. H.'s time. Their amount during the last year Sir B. Watson held the office of Commissary-General, was 1,037,000*l.* In the last year of his successor in that office, they amounted to 1,069,000*l.* In the last year of Sir W. Gordon they rose to 1,193,000*l.*, having increased more than 100,000*l.* When Mr. Herries became Commissary-General, from the operations of the war having been extended to so many parts of the world, a great additional expenditure was the consequence. It amounted during the year 1814 to 10,173,000*l.*, and in the year 1815, the monies for which the Commissary-General had to account, rose to the sum of 15,873,000*l.*—When the situations of Colonel Gordon and Mr. Herries were compared in this point of view, he thought it must be seen, that though there was no difference between them in their rank of office, it was not just that their remuneration should be the same, when the disparity between the duties which they had to perform was so great. Mr. Herries had had to account to the House for upwards of 20,000,000*l.* of expenditure. Not only had he to procure vouchers from persons acting on their own responsibility to prove the application of the sums of which he had to give an account, but he was personally much employed in the laborious duties of his situation. Towards the close of the year 1812, and in the year 1813, when the war assumed a new character, in consequence of the French expedition to Russia, it became necessary not only to provide military, but also pecuniary means for an almost unlimited exertion. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), at the period to which he referred had had the honour of proposing measures to that House, which had been carried into effect (as he thought with great advantage to the country) and which had provided for unlimited exertions, and for a very considerable time. Such measures, however, would have been adopted in vain; they could have effected nothing, if some way had not been discovered of bringing the resources of this country to particular places at the proper time. He would ask those who remembered the debates which took place in that House ten years ago, whether it was then supposed that by any effort of activity a sum of 20,000,000*l.* could be realised for this country on the Continent, in one year? This could not be answered in the affirmative; yet, when the scarcity of bullion had increased, and when the exchanges had become more unfavourable to this country, under circumstances unparalleled in history—when it was the object of England to unite the armies of all Europe against France, Mr. Herries succeeded in contriving the machine by which this great object was triumphantly accomplished. He sent proper persons to the several parts of Europe to make the necessary arrangements, and these were so well adjusted, that in no instance had any of the military operations, then in progress, been retarded by a want of specie.—Wherever the armies of our Allies advanced, there the resources of England were to be found; and wherever our own army or navy was directed to proceed, abundant supplies were provided. None of our warlike operations, extensive as was their theatre, had failed for want of pecuniary means. This was in a great measure to be ascribed to the activity and judicious care of Mr. Herries. After this statement, would it be said that the services of that gentleman did not merit to be liberally rewarded? He contended that this was necessary in the case of an individual, appointed as he had been, to offices of confidence and importance, and in which he had acquitted himself with equal ability and honour. If such a course were not pursued hereafter, Government would have great difficulty in finding persons who could safely be entrusted with the expenditure of millions. He certainly thought his retiring allowance of 1,350*l.*, in addition to the income of the office he might now hold, was but a fair reward for his services. This was his sincere opinion; as such he submitted it to the House. Whatever might be their decision on the question before them of this at least he was sure, that what he had done in the case of Mr. Herries, would ever stand justified to his own conscience and his own heart.

Mr. Tierney allowed that all he had heard concerning Mr. Herries was in his favour; his merits were great and indisputable; he had discharged the duties of the important office intrusted to him ably and faithfully. The question, however, was, whether, the services of Mr. Herries being taken for granted, he had or had not received too great a recompense. He would not call the transaction a job, because he was anxious not to apply any unsuitable term to Mr. Herries; but he would say, that either that gentleman had been grossly overpaid, or other persons in the same or similar situations had been grossly underpaid. The right hon. gentleman had fairly stated the progress of the official life of Mr. Herries. It was true, that he began as a Clerk in the Treasury; it was true that his abilities alone had recommended him to the notice of the right hon. gentleman who had appointed him to be his private secretary; it was equally true, that for his abilities alone, he afterwards was made private secretary to Mr. Perceval; it was true, that persons so situated had always been held worthy of some provision; but none had ever received so great a reward as Mr. Herries; none had received 2,700*l.* a year. Besides, Mr. Herries had received his reward already; he had been appointed Comptroller of the Army, for which he was to receive 1,500*l.* a year for life. Surely, such a promotion was in itself a sufficient remuneration. Mr. Herries, however, chose to relinquish this situation in order to be Commissary-in-Chief, in the room of Sir Willoughby Gordon. Now, he (Mr. Tierney) was happy in being able to call Sir W. Gordon his particular friend, and he was perfectly acquainted with the exertions and services of that officer. He knew that to Sir W. Gordon was due the merit of inventing and arranging that complicated machine, the Commissariat-management. Mr. Herries had all the difficulties smoothed before him, and was not called upon for any extraordinary ingenuity; he had nothing but the increased labour which became necessary from the state of the war. He (Mr. T.) was ready to admit that this labour was greatly augmented by the course of events; but he could never consent to allow the criterion mentioned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the remuneration of a public servant was to be in direct ratio with the number of millions that happened to pass through his hands. This odd mode of percentage would be as inapplicable as it was unfair. For instance, his right hon. friend over the way (Mr. Long) had vast quantities of millions passing through his hands, yet his pay was but 2000*l.* a year; while Mr. Herries was to receive 2700*l.* Surely such an inequality must produce disgust; surely men in office would be apt to compare their own remunera-tions with those of Mr. Herries, and would think themselves ill-used or him grossly favoured. There was, in fact, no sort of proportion between the reward given to this gentleman and that intended for other persons in situations of greater importance. He would take the instance of the Prime Minister (on whom all the responsibility of administration rested); and yet by the new bill he was only to have 3000*l.* a year. What were the labours of Mr. Herries compared with those of Sir J. Kennedy and Mr. Beardman? and yet those gentlemen, after services of twenty years, received annuities of only 600*l.* while Mr. Herries obtained his inordinate salary after only five years' service. It was true, that the right hon. gentleman said, that Mr. Herries had been distinctly told that he had no claim to his half pay, but that it was given him in consideration of his particular merits. It really seemed as if the Ministers could not be content to abolish any office till they had created another of equal value, so that they might never lose a jot of their patronage. Gentlemen in that House were in the habit of talking so much about millions, that they forgot the value of hundreds; and yet he knew many gentlemen (and surely many members must feel the same) to whom 2,700*l.* or even half that sum, appeared a very considerable sum. One person he well knew to whom such a sum would seem no trifle; and he was sure that the mass of the gentry throughout England must, in times like the present, entertain a similar opinion. Must it not, therefore, be disgusting to these gentlemen to see such a reward carelessly given to such a rate of service, while they themselves were pressed down with the weight of taxation? As to the new-created office, he was more and more confirmed in his opinion—first, that it was unnecessary; and secondly, that, if necessary, it would be fairly and sufficiently remunerated by 500*l.* a year. The whole business of this boasted auditorship was merely to have an eye to the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, and the Master of the Horse. What was the fact? In the first place the Prince Regent was put on board wages, neither more nor less. (A laugh.) Then he had a Lord Steward to look after him, and the Lord Steward had a manager to assist him; but all would not do; they could not be trusted; neither could the Lord Chamberlain and his agent, nor the Master of the Horse, and his agent; so they must have an auditor to look after all six; and for this unnecessary ridiculous office he was to have 1,500*l.* a year. Under Mr. Perceval Mr. Herries received a salary of 300*l.* a year—no more; then his time was fully employed; but now, for not a fourth part of that trouble, he was to receive 1,500*l.* The Commissioners of Excise and Stamps had ten times as much to do. When he thought on this, he must pronounce the business to be a foul and gross job, and of Mr. Herries, but of the Government, who appointed him. He (Mr. T.) felt perfectly convinced that the Ministers would not have ventured to say a word in defence of such a bare-faced proceeding, if the present motion had come from any quarter except one which, like his hon. friend, was usually in opposition to administration. For his own part he did not consider it a party question. (A laugh from the Ministerial benches.) "Well," said Mr. T. "If you please, I do consider it a party question." (A laugh.) One thing at least I feel to be a party question, and that is, I feel it my duty to impress on the House my own firm conviction, that there never was an Administration which shewed such an indifference to the feelings and wishes of the people as is manifested by the present Ministers. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. T.) supposed that the present job, like another not long since, would be supported by a triumphant division, and then people, perhaps, would exclaim, "There, you are at your old work again, always making a fuss and talking nonsense about nothing! How can you waste your time in making motions which have no other effect than to drag members from their homes to vote against you, and to disturb the comfortable feelings of meritorious persons: and all this stir you are making about such a paltry sum as 2,700*l.* a year!" He (Mr. T.) wished from his soul that gentlemen would place their hands upon their hearts, and say whether they thought the present a justifiable remuneration. But alas! gentlemen did not come there to place their hands upon their hearts, but merely to vote. (Hear, hear.) He did not mean to attach any blame to Mr. Herries; that gentleman was not to blame for receiving the salary which was offered to him; the blame was with the Government, or rather it would be with that House if it should sanction such an appointment. He hoped to God, if the House did neglect its duty, that whenever an opportunity should occur, the country would come forward and shew to members, in the proper manner, its sense of their conduct.

Lord Castlereagh would separate the question into two parts: 1st. What was the proper retiring provision for Mr. Herries; and 2d. Whether, retiring upon half his former salary, any farther appointment should be given to him. As to the first question, the 1,350*l.* was not given to Mr. Herries upon the principle of half-pay. That principle was applicable only to officers who had a regular rise in the army. When this very consideration was under the view of Mr. Perceval, that scrupulous and conscientious Minister would not admit that the commissary-in-chief should be subjected to the principle of half-pay. He (Mr. Perceval) on the ground that there were no persons under the commissary-in-chief in a military capacity—that he was not in the way of regular promotion—and that his duties were detached from those strictly military, placed it in such a rank as to be connected rather with the Civil List. Mr. Herries had altogether served 18 years, 18 years in situations of great labour; and had he continued in that department of service, he would, in all probability, have soon risen to a situation of more than 1,500*l.* a year; but he left that kind of service, and was placed in a situation of 1,500*l.* Now, it should be recollected that this situation of comptroller of accounts, was a situation for life. From this permanent office he was removed to one of 2,700*l.*; one in which the greatest responsibility, the severest attention, and the heaviest charges were imposed upon him. His right hon. friend had added the important consideration, that in 1814, 10,000,000*l.* and in 1815, 15,000,000*l.* were put under the management of the commissary-in-chief. For those various and arduous charges, for all the operations he had carried on, he possessed the very highest qualifications. He admitted Colonel Gordon's merit, he willingly assented to all that had been said of him; but Mr. Herries was eminently qualified for that situation from his vigilance, activity, and perseverance, and entitled to the utmost confidence, since Mr. Perceval had selected him to be placed about himself. In this most laborious and highly responsible office, he continued for five years. Now, if the principle of half-pay were admitted, he would be found to have been treated as in the lowest class. In giving half-pay, the principle of proceeding was, than when an officer had served ten years, he should be entitled to half his salary; when he had served twenty years, to two-thirds; therefore, on this principle, they put him, since he had served 18 years, on the lowest scale. On the first part of the question, therefore, it appeared that Mr. Herries had not received a proper retiring provision. On the second question, whether in the event of his accepting another situation he should forfeit his half-pay, he could shew that such a rule by no means applied to this case. When he had retired, the question was whether he should give up 1,350*l.* for an active employment, that would return him only an addition of 150*l.* Now this would be to accept of an inferior situation to that he had formerly held, which was inconsistent with the practice in all such cases. It was well known, that when diplomatic services were paid by placing individuals in a different situation, was always a higher one than they had occupied, never an inferior one. Mr. Herries acted in foreign countries as commissary-in-chief, he had crossed the sea into various parts of the Continent, therefore he could not be reduced to an inferior appointment. In common justice, and in common liberality, he could not be called upon to relinquish his 1,350*l.* in consideration of being appointed auditor of accounts of the civil list. The right hon. gentleman opposite seemed to have viewed the appointment altogether as one part a job, and the other part a sinecure. He had shewn that the first was not a job; he would now prove that the other was not a sinecure. It was clearly established, by two Committees of that House, that the office of auditing accounts on the civil list was one of an important trust; and a noble friend of his considered it of the last importance, that the civil list should not be again neglected, so as to be brought before the House. Mr. Herries, then, had performed duties of an extraordinary nature; he was now called upon to undertake a duty of very considerable importance; for to superintend and correct the accounts on the civil list was an office out of the common line, and required a man of tried integrity and diligence. The question, therefore, was, (for he had discussed the subject separately), as to the proper provision for Mr. Herries on retiring, and whether he was bound to renounce that provision on being appointed to a situation of great consequence: the question was, whether since the salary of this last appointment did not exceed the whole amount of his former salary of 2,700*l.* he could be called upon to renounce the 1,350*l.* He thought it a fair appeal to that House, whether such a demand could, in common justice, be made: whether, considering the integrity and ability for which Mr. Herries had been distinguished, he enjoyed too high an allowance. Another point of view in which he would beg leave to represent the subject was, that by this arrangement an actual saving had been effected. It was found necessary to appoint an auditor of the Civil List, with a salary of 1,500*l.* Now, Mr. Herries received only 1,350*l.*: consequently 150*l.* per annum had been saved to the public. He, therefore, upon those grounds, very conscientiously appealed to the House, whether, since one was to be appointed to audit the Civil List, a situation of great importance, Ministers had not acted wisely in requesting Mr. Herries to undertake that trust.

Mr. Ponsonby maintained that the office of Mr. Herries was a military one, notwithstanding what had been said by the noble lord; but suppose he were to allow that it was merely a civil office, he would then ask where was the rule which entitled civil officers, who retired, to receive more than their half-pay? He might ask, indeed, what were the instances in which they were granted the full half of their salary? If Mr. Herries chose to take the office of Auditor of the Civil List, why were the public to suffer? He saw no reason why he should not surrender his half-pay upon having accepted that function; unless, indeed, there was some peculiar merit in his case, which entitled him to have a principle violated for his sake, which had never been violated for any other person. He doubted, however, whether the transaction proceeded upon any ground of merit; he rather believed the whole thing was to be traced to the influence of favour; and he thought the House was bound to pronounce upon it, that it was an improper use of the public money.

Mr. C. Grant defended the course which had been pursued on the same grounds as the noble lord (Lord Castlereagh) had done. The case of a civil officer who retired, he distinguished from that of a military officer on half-pay, by the hopes of promotion, which the latter was led to cherish when he was obliged to resign his half-pay. The comparison between the two services, he contended not to hold good, as the soldier was not considered to be rewarded by pecuniary advantages, so much as by the glory attached to his profession. The Treasury, in fixing the compensation due to Mr. Herries, were not bound to refer to the enactments of the Superannuation Act, because that act related to offices from which persons retired in consequence of ill health, length of service, or advance of years, whereas the office of Mr. Herries was abolished. The only question, therefore, was, whether the Treasury had, or had not exercised a sound discretion in the mode and amount of compensation. He thought that they had, and therefore that they had not incurred the censure of the House.

Mr. Bennet, in reply, read the answer of Mr. Herries in the year 1811, in which he declared that his appointment was the same as his predecessors, and that he held his commission from the War Office. He would repeat, that Sir James Kennedy had in the Peninsula endured in one month more labour, privation, and danger, than Mr. Herries during the space of five years, and yet he had only thirty shillings per day allowed him. During the time Mr. Herries held office he had 2,700*l.* He was afterwards allowed 1,350*l.* which was precisely half-pay. Colonel Gordon had been invidiously mentioned in the course of the debate, and it had been said, that he had voluntarily left the situation. He replied that he had not. He was required to give it up, and from a quarter which he could not refuse. Mr. Perceval offered him 500*l.* a year as a compensation, but in such a manner that it could not be accepted. Mr. Herries had retired upon half-pay, and had been appointed Auditor of the Civil List. Sir W. Gordon retained nothing but military rank. He has lost 700*l.* by the exchange. He might retire, but he could hold nothing but his rank. Yet his services were infinitely greater than those of Mr. Herries.

The House then divided.

Ayes . . 42 | Noes . . 93 | Majority . . 51.

[TITHES.] The order of the day having been read for a Committee on the Tithes-levying Bill, it was resolved, that the Committee have power—

“To extend the provisions of the bill to the leasing of lands substituted for tithes, or annexed to small livings by means of Queen Anne’s Bounty.

“To make provision for continuing current leases to the end of the year, in cases of avoidance of benefices, and for rateably dividing the emoluments between the late and the present incumbent.

“To make provision for ascertaining the payment of tithes on late crops occasioned by bad seasons.

“To extend the provisions of the bill to glebe land under certain conditions.”

The House then went into a committee, when these instructions were received, several classes were proposed and agreed to, and the committee was ordered to sit again.

Owen's Regulation-Bill.] Mr. D. Gilbert brought in a bill "to abolish certain offices, and regulate others, in Scotland," which was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 9.

Owen's Divorce Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Poor Laws.] The Earl of Liverpool rose, pursuant to notice, to move the appointment of a committee to consider the present state of the Poor Laws, and to report their opinion, whether any and what remedy could and ought to be applied to the evils of the system. Considering the importance of the subject, it might perhaps be proper that he should state the reason why he had not brought it forward at an earlier period. Observing that a committee had been appointed in another place for conducting this inquiry, he certainly had felt desirous to see what progress would be made in that investigation before he called upon their lordships to appoint a committee of a similar description. Great misapprehensions often arose from inquiries on the same subject going on at the same time in both Houses, and sometimes, inadvertently, that course of proceeding was attended with great advantages. In the present case, there was a case in which it was desirable to see what would be done by the committee of the other House, and for that reason he had delayed calling their lordships' attention to the subject sooner. It was irregular to allude to what had there been done; but whatever might be thought of their conclusions, one thing was certain—that a most valuable mass of information had been collected, of which their lordships' committee might avail itself; but from all that he had observed, and all that he had heard, it would be of great importance that, notwithstanding the labours of the other committee, the subject should be investigated by a committee of their lordships. The other House had no advantages for such an investigation which their lordships did not possess in fully as great a degree. There were many among their lordships as well acquainted with the practical effects of the system, and as competent judges of what measures ought to be adopted. It was not his intention now to enter into the discussion of the principles which ought to govern their proceedings, as these might be considered and discussed with more freedom in the committee; and till the Report was made, it might be proper to refrain from stating any distinct opinion on the subject: he was the more inclined to follow that course, because, however general the coincidence of sentiment was as to the effects of the system, and the evils that resulted from it, there was very considerable difference of opinion as to the proper remedies. The difficulty was not in tracing the source of the evil, but in finding a plan that would put an end to it. It was now generally admitted, that our system of Poor Laws was an evil; but then it was an evil which had existed for 200 years, and was so intermixed with the habits and prejudices of the people, that remedies which might at an earlier period have been easily applied could not now be adopted. He himself knew many persons, whose information on this subject was not less than their candour, and who upon first turning their attention to it had imagined that a remedy might be found without much difficulty; but when they came to probe the matter to the bottom, and to examine the subject in all its views and bearings, they themselves admitted, that they had found their schemes either such as could not possibly be adopted, or such as were highly objectionable. Under these circumstances, he thought that it might be attended with great advantage to have the subject investigated by a committee of their lordships, if those among them who were most conversant with it would attend and give up a great part of their time and serious attention to the investigation. He had conversed with several noble lords of that description, and he was happy to state, that he had received such assurances as afforded the best hopes that every thing would be done that could possibly be effected. This was a subject entirely unconnected with party views and purposes; they could have but one object, and every member of the committee must be desirous to discuss the subject temperately, and with a sincere and anxious wish to find that some effectual remedy could be applied. If it should unfortunately turn out that no such remedy could be applied, their lordships would, at least satisfy the public that they had done every thing that depended upon them for the accomplishment of so desirable an object. He concluded by moving, that a committee be appointed to consider the present state of the Poor Laws, and whether any and what remedy could be applied to the evils of the existing system.

Lord St. John did not rise to oppose the motion, and had only to regret that it was not brought forward sooner. This was an investigation which was likely to occupy a considerable length of time; and it might be doubtful whether it could be satisfactorily completed in the course of the session. The committee ought, in his opinion, not only to examine into the present state of the Poor Laws, but also into the mode in which they were administered; and to consider, whether some means might not be found to afford a more effectual relief to the Poor, and at the same time to diminish the weight with which the system pressed upon the community. The burden, no doubt, was greatly increased by the particular situation in which the commerce and agriculture of the country were at this time placed, but the inquiry could hardly fail of being productive of great advantage.

Lord Holland said, if none but those who were intimately acquainted with this subject bight to be heard upon it, then he ought to give no opinion; but though he was not peculiarly conversant with the details of the Poor Laws, yet he knew enough of their tendency and effects to enable him to say, with some confidence, that the motion of the noble earl, if followed up with diligence, and a proper desire to provide a remedy for the evil, would be one of the greatest boons that could be conferred on the country. He did not wish to speak now of the causes of the calamities under which we laboured; but great as were our other distresses, those which originated in the system of the Poor Laws appeared to him to be most alarming, inasmuch as they were likely to be most permanent. He did not intend at present to go into the general discussion: they had lately heard much of the visionary schemes of persons who were called Spenceans; but the real Spencean system was the system of the Poor Laws. He did not mean to impugn the motives of those who had framed these laws. The system originated in the purest motives, but had been attended with the most dreadful effects on the population, morals, and industry of the nation. The great evil of the system was this—that idleness and vice were rewarded at the expense of industry and labour; and certain individuals obtained an inordinate and oppressive control over the lower orders of the community. No time was better calculated than the present for an attempt to relieve the country, to a certain extent at least, from so pernicious a system. He agreed with the noble earl, that considerable difficulty existed in devising a proper remedy, and that the appointment of a committee held out the best promise of remedying it. He did not despair of that object being ultimately accomplished. The Reverend Joseph Few had, in a pamphlet which he published in 1800, suggested a remedy which, with some alterations, such as the extending the time beyond a period of ten years, might be rendered sufficiently practicable. These, however, were matters for the consideration of the committee, who ought to pursue the investigation with diligence, and to set about it immediately. This was a time of pressure, and therefore, a remedy ought to be applied, if possible. If the committee could not complete its labours satisfactorily by the end of the present session, it might, and he had no doubt would, collect a mass of information which would be extremely valuable for the purposes of any subsequent inquiry.

The Earl of Liverpool then said, that he did not know that it was necessary to mention names; but he suggested as members of the committee, the Earls of Aberdeen, St. Germain, Lauderdale, and Rosslyn, Lords Holland, Desdale, and generally all the peers who had attended the House in the course of the session.

The Committee was accordingly appointed, with power to choose its chairman, and was directed to meet on Monday at 12 o'clock.

Friday, May 9.

CATHOLIC CLAIMS.] Sir W. Scott presented a petition from the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Oxford, stating, that they had learned from the votes of the House, that the claims of his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects were again about to be brought under the consideration of Parliament; that they had deliberately considered the circumstances which were now alleged to be more favourable to the claims of that body; and that their original opinion of the danger of granting such claims remained undiminished: that they had not received proof of any change in the doctrines of those who professed the Romish faith, nor any reason to induce them to suppose that the rebellion could be removed with greater safety. They prayed, therefore, that the constitution of the country, both in church and state, might be preserved, as it now existed, and that those wrongs which we had inherited from our ancestors might be transmitted to posterity. Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Grattan rose, and moved that the petition of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, which was presented to the House on the 20th of April, 1816, be read. It was read accordingly.

Mr. W. Elliot moved, that the petition of the Roman Catholics of Great Britain, which was presented to the House on the 21st of April, 1816, be read. This being done,

Mr. Grattan rose again, and said, that as the question of granting the claims of his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects was one of the most important considerations that could come before the House, and as several hon. members on both sides would naturally wish to deliver their opinions upon it, it was not his intention at present to trouble the House at any length. It would be, on his part, a monstrous presumption to expect to be heard twice in one night on so extensive a subject; he should, therefore, claim the indulgence of the House, and reserve what he had to offer for a reply. The motion which he wished to submit to their calm and dispassionate attention was the same as had been proposed in 1813, namely, that a committee should be appointed to take the claims of the Roman Catholics into consideration, with a view to release them from their present disabilities, and to give every security to the Protestant establishment, and ultimate satisfaction to all orders of men; he said to give ultimate satisfaction to all orders, because it was hardly to be expected, from the nature of the subject, that immediate satisfaction would be given to every person: but the House must legislate so as to give ultimate satisfaction to all, and immediate relief to those who so justly and respectfully claimed it at their hands. The Report which his learned and most useful friend (Sir J. C. Hippisley) had caused to be laid upon the table had shewn them, that in almost all the countries of Europe there was a military and civil qualification for those who professed religions that were not dominant; that there was a certain connection between the clergy and the Government so as to preclude foreign influence. England was almost the only country in which those who differed from the established religion were deprived of the enjoyment of civil and military privileges. There was, however, every reason now to hope, and no reason to doubt, that securities might be given which would enable them to enjoy those privileges, and at the same time afford perfect satisfaction to all parties. There might be domestic nomination; there might be a veto; there might be both: and therefore the question was, whether we would refuse the Catholic claims, and exclude the security of our own church. We must determine now, whether we would exclude the Catholics from civil and military offices, and secure to our church and establishment a monopoly—that is, a monopoly of parliamentary seats, and of the highest offices in the country. The present question was, whether we would have any security at all. There had been a communication on the continent between the Pope and the clergy, and it could hardly be doubted, that if we persevered in refusing the Catholic claims, such communication must end with the incorporation of the clergy with the See of Rome, and the separation of the Catholic people from England. Could we still hesitate, then, to repeal the laws which disqualify Roman Catholics from civil, naval, and military appointments, subject to such restrictions as we ourselves may choose?—that is to say, such as we may think necessary for our Church and Constitution; or, in other words, necessary for preserving the Act of Settlement, and the Protestant religion. Let us shew the Catholic people that we are not the only intolerant country in Europe; that we are ready to give them all the privileges of a free Government, subject to such restrictions as may be deemed indispensable, so that they may enjoy all the advantages of our Constitution, while we retain all the advantages of our Church. This was the question which he intended to submit to their consideration this night; and, therefore, reserving to himself, as he before observed, the right of reply, he should now merely move, "That this House will resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to take into its most serious consideration the state of the laws affecting his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects in Great Britain and Ireland; with a view to such a final and conciliatory adjustment as may be conducive to the peace and strength of the united kingdom, to the stability of the Protestant establishment, and to the general satisfaction and concord of all classes of his Majesty's subjects." He would only add, that his desire was not in any degree to put the question out of their power before they were perfectly satisfied as to the security which might be deemed necessary. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Elliot seconded the motion.

Mr. Leslie Foster then rose, and addressed the House as follows:—Sir, it has been the lot of the right hon. gentleman to present this question to us in successive sessions, under various forms. This variety, it appears, is not yet exhausted, and the claims of the Roman Catholics have assumed, upon the present occasion, an aspect different, in some important particulars, from any that they have hitherto exhibited. In the last year, the Catholics of Ireland were divided into two parties: the one, principally consisting of their lay aristocracy, and those under their immediate influence, presented a list of a few hundred names; the other included their clergy, and the persons present at the various county and aggregate meetings which were held, and, it may be asserted, in truth embraced the great mass of the Roman Catholic population. The first class, in return for emancipation, were ready to acquiesce in any arrangements or regulations that should be found not inconsistent with their religion. The second, and more numerous, would hear nothing of regulations. The different securities which had been suggested, were by them considered as so many forms of insult, and unqualified emancipation alone was, in their opinion, worthy of acceptance: the smaller party were by them denounced as betrayers of the cause; their petition was denominated a scandalous document, and, as I am informed, was condemned in Dublin by a Roman Catholic Archbishop from his pulpit. The proposed security which excited all this indignation, was the concession of a veto to the Crown in the nomination of their Bishops. To-day we hear nothing of the smaller party. They observe a prudent, and, perhaps, a necessary silence; but we are distinctly told, that the great body of the Catholics, rather than agree to the detested measure of the veto under any form, prefer to continue without emancipation. I appeal to the right hon. gentleman, whether he does not know this from the letters which have been addressed to him; I appeal to an hon. baronet whom I see near him, whether he does not know it from the instructions and commands which have been imposed upon him; and I appeal to both, whether they do not know from the result of all the public meetings which have been held, that such is at present the feeling, almost universally, of the Catholics upon the subject. They come forward, however, with a new offer, and propose the domestic nomination of their Bishops, as an all-sufficient security to satisfy every Protestant apprehension. On a former night, when the petition was presented, we were informed that the Catholics are at this time in a peculiar disposition for arrangements; but it was afterwards distinctly acknowledged, and will not now be denied, that all their readiness is confined within the narrow limits of this offer: they are ready to appoint their own Bishops, and the Pope is ready to give up his claim to their nomination. And this is their proposal. I should proceed, Sir, to submit my view of the total inefficiency and inadequacy of such a measure to confer the security which any reasonable Protestant requires, but I must first perform the preliminary task of endeavouring to explain the delusive nature of the offer. It proposes no new thing, it proposes merely that the Bishops should be appointed for the future in the same manner as they have been in fact appointed hitherto. The nomination of the Roman Catholic Bishops has been for a long time as practically domestic as any possible arrangement can now render it. When a see is vacant, a recommendation is forwarded to Rome, from Ireland, of the individual who is to be appointed, and I understand that, within the time of memory, there have not occurred more than two or three instances of any difficulty in confirming the choice of this domestic nomination. The persons who thus nominate to Rome are, as I understand, a certain number of the Roman Catholic Bishops; how they are selected I do not pretend to know; latterly it is said, that by mutual courtesy they recommend, as of course, the coadjutor of the deceased Bishop. This coadjutor is selected by the Bishop in his lifetime. The transmission of the episcopal rank in the Irish Roman Catholic church is, therefore, in practice a mere matter of testamentary bequest, every Bishop taking his office under the will of his immediate predecessor in the See. Some persons I know propose that the election shall hereafter be made by their Deans and Chapters: the Bishops, I should think, would hardly consent to such an alteration; but if they should, the new mode will neither be more domestic, nor more conducive than the present, towards giving satisfaction to a Protestant; nay, it may even be supposed that the nature of the canvass, to which such elections must give rise, would be peculiarly unfavourable to the habits which the clerical character requires; and that, in some instances, the candidate might be indebted for his success rather to his talents for political agitation, than to a reputation for a tranquil, a charitable, and a religious demeanour. A more complete system of domestic nomination, however, cannot be proposed than that which exists at present. You can vary its form, but more domestic you cannot render it. The proposition, then, of domestic nomination is distinctly this—that the Protestants and Catholics having each much to require and much to give up, the Protestants are to code every thing that remains, and the Catholics are to make the single concession of remaining exactly as they are; or, in other words, that in consideration of our former repeal of the whole penal code, and of their admission to all civil privileges, for which no one concession was obtained; and, in further consideration of their being now admitted to a complete participation of political power, they are ready to acquiesce in this single but important regulation of their ecclesiastical discipline, that for the time to come their Bishops shall be appointed in the same manner as they have been for time past. Is such a proposal delusive, or is it not? Let me suppose us to act on such an arrangement, and let us discover, if we can, in what way we should be secured. But first, it is necessary to examine the nature of the danger which it is to meet. The Protestant sees with apprehension four millions of our people still mainly dependent for their habits and opinions, and more particularly for their impressions of the religion and government of England, on a great body of ecclesiastics, whom the fatal and mistaken policy of our ancestors had treated in such a manner, that it was not in human nature to expect that those ecclesiastics should make their flocks very much attached to the Government from which that treatment proceeded. The Protestant sees that body of ecclesiastics, who, till lately, were under absolute proscription, still an insulated and an unacknowledged, but most formidable power within the country, totally unconnected with the state, studiously independent of it, unattached to it by any of the ordinary motives of human conduct, but acting all the while on the education, the morals, the habits, the opinions, and conduct of the greater part of our population, more extensively than the Legislature and Executive powers united: it is their own boast that they can do so, and I am forced to acknowledge this melancholy truth. The Protestant sees further, this great ecclesiastical community, so powerful in command, itself submitted with unlimited devotion to the orders of a comparatively small portion of their own body—I mean their Bishops: and these again acting with an unanimity and steadiness in asserting their authority, and extending the common interest of their order, not inferior to any thing in the example of Papa Rome itself. I am far from blaming them for so doing; in their place I should act, no doubt, in the same manner. It is the nature of every great corporation to infuse a strong zeal into its individual members, for the advancement of its interest and power; and certainly of no other corporation that the world has ever seen, may this so truly be observed, as of the great ecclesiastical body of the church of Rome. In Ireland the Protestant sees a number of the Roman Catholic Bishops meeting annually at Maynooth, primarily for the regulation of the seminary; but he well understands that they do not separate without accomplishing the second but more important object of taking common order for the concerns of their Church; due deference being paid to the recommendations of a committee so conveniently assembled. Upon more urgent occasions he sees the whole body of their Bishops meeting in synods convoked by their own authority, and promulgating whatever decrees upon whatever subjects they think proper, whether it be a declaration of their own resolution to submit to martyrdom rather than comply with the enactments of a law at the time in progress through the British senate; or whether they take a wider range, and discuss the merits of the Gallican Concordat, censuring its principles, but justifying their adoption as a necessary compliance with the dreadful necessity of the times. Sir, the Protestant sees in this imperium in imperio, an anomaly which I shall presently endeavour to demonstrate is not permitted to exist in any other country, Protestant or Catholic. And when he looks around amongst our population for that extended charity and peace, that respect for British law, that attachment to British connection, which forty years of conciliation and concession, the repeal of the Penal Code, the communication of civil privilege, and the grant of pecuniary endowment for education, might naturally be expected, ere this time, to have produced; he looks in vain, and sees nothing but what tends to increase his dissatisfaction and his fears. He sees our people in too many districts acting in avowed defiance of the law, subverting the very foundations of society: and he sees them, when finally overtaken by justice, heroically ready to meet their fate, firmly convinced that they are dying in a good cause; while their associates, instead of regarding their punishment as a sacrifice to the offended laws, view it rather in the light of the ordinary operations of a campaign; and while their superiors are hoping that the examples of so many executions may strike a salutary terror into the guilty, they are no less congratulating themselves that the cause has lost only so few of its supporters. Let me not be misunderstood as imputing to their clergy the origin of these evils. They are the fruits of a sad course of events in Irish history, with which, through the faults of our ancestors, the Roman Catholic religion has been inseparably interwoven. I wish to be understood to speak of the errors of the present race of our peasantry, as rather being a continuation of the habits of their fathers generated by the misgovernment and calamities of the times, and tremendously enhanced by the bad qualities of the education which they receive—a supply of moral poison, for the particulars of which I need only refer to the Reports of the Commissioners of Education. A new system, both of books and of instruction, has at length been introduced, and let us hope that the Roman Catholic clergy will be amongst the foremost to assist its operation. Upon the spirit which they manifest, its success must greatly depend. The Protestant sees further, in too many districts, an increasing proscription of himself and of his creed; he sees the Protestant tradesman systematically and simultaneously deserted by his Catholic customers; he sees the Protestant farmer menaced in his habitation, and waylaid in his journey, until he seeks his peace in emigration, or buys it by his conversion. He sees a wide-spreading system of intermarriage of Protestants and Catholics, above all things encouraged by their priesthood, ending very generally in the conversion of the husband or wife, and securing almost universally the Catholicism of the children. He sees every where, from these concurrent causes, the diminution of Protestant numbers, the increasing insecurity of Protestant property, the steady career, the unbending intolerance of Catholic aggrandisement. He looks for some practical safeguard and protection for himself, when it shall be endowed (if it shall be endowed,) with the new strength and powers which it seeks; and he is told to be of good cheer, that this all-saving security is now provided, that the influencing and directing spirit, which he considers as propelling forward all that he apprehends, is to continue exactly as it stands, uncontrolled, as unattached, as insulated, and as alienated as ever. Such, Sir, is domestic nomination:—A mere continuation of this moral and religious imperium in imperio, exactly as it stands. No, not exactly; we are to make this alteration in its relations to the state; we are to add energy and power to the mass upon which it acts, and to sharpen and strengthen the weapons which it wields. Sir, such an arrangement is not our security, but our danger. But the Roman Catholics declare, that this is the only basis upon which they will treat, and we are told, even by Protestants, that because we have hitherto given up one half of what was sought for, and obtained no concession in return, that, albeit, we now reap the bitter fruits of our mistake, still we must, in consistency, give up all the remainder, just as gratuitously, and add it to what we have already thrown away. I know there are many gentlemen who wish to go into the committee on the avowed basis of domestic nomination, but hoping, when they get into it, to be able to manufacture something more effectual out of the principle of the veto. I suspect that they have conceived an exaggerated opinion of the efficacy of that measure, and have formed a most inadequate idea of the hostility with which the Catholics of Ireland at present regard every possible modification of that principle. The veto is a term well chosen for allaying what are called the prejudices of Englishmen, and persuading them that it would confer some practical influence on the Government, or afford some protection against some danger; but this is, in my mind, the whole service that this veto ever could perform, and perhaps, all that it was ever seriously expected to accomplish by those who first introduced it to the public. I scarcely ever met with an Irish Protestant who saw in it any security whatever, and for this reason—that the attachment of the great mass of the Irish Roman Catholic population, to the English laws, and their desire to maintain the political connection of the British islands, is, in his view, the only real security against an increase of Catholic power. Towards the production of these sentiments the veto would never advance a single step; it merely proposes to vest a power in the Crown, harsh and ungracious even to possess, and perfectly nugatory for any practical operation. The Government could have no previous knowledge of the individual named from amongst the ranks of a priesthood with which it has no contact, intercourse, or communication. But waving even this objection, and supposing the Government possessed of every means of information, it is the Bishop, and not the Priest, whose conduct, or whose power, or whose influence is of any real moment for him the veto would be a dead letter; once a Bishop he might well disregard it, he has done with it for ever. The moment his power of good or ill begins, any power conferred by the veto is to end. Observe also the ingenuity of the expedient which prepares the ordeal of the veto, just before, and not after, the manifestation of the conduct of the individual who is to be its object.—Of the conduct of the priest the Government can know nothing; of the Bishop, if they should know any thing to his prejudice, it will be too late. But, Sir, it is unnecessary to pursue further the discussion of the veto, because in the eyes of the Catholics it is just as objectionable, as to those of the Protestants it appears inefficacious. The Catholics meet you upon this point in limine. Their clergy have, within these few years, in solemn synod declared they cannot assent to it without incurring the guilt of schism; they have, at the same time, declared their readiness to lay down their lives rather than obey any Act of Parliament that may attempt to enforce it; and they have subsequently resolved, that in the event of the Pope being induced to assent, their own superior concern for the interests of their Church would prevent their submitting to it. Even after the principles of the veto had been recognized, and the terms of it, as contained in the Relief Bill of 1813, had been specifically approved of by the rescript of the Pope's vicegerent Monsigneur Quarantotti, the resistance of the Irish clergy was in no degree diminished. The Roman Catholic Bishop of Cloyne informs his clergy, in a published letter, "that he has read the rescript, that very mischievous document, with feelings of disgust and indignation." Another Bishop declares in like manner, "that he protests against it; and that while he has breath in his body he will continue to do so." The clergy of the diocese of Dublin proclaim "their unqualified dissent from the principles which it inculcates, and which as Catholics and Irishmen they view with disgust and abhorrence." The clergy of Cork declare "that it has excited the most unprecedented alarm among their flocks; and that it tends, in their judgment, to produce incalculable mischief, if not utter ruin, to their religion in Ireland." But it is unnecessary to multiply examples in order to illustrate what no informed person will deny, the abomination in which the veto is held by the Irish Catholic ecclesiastics. The extent to which it is detested by the great mass of the laity, a very few of their aristocracy alone excepted, is equally undisputed. The public meeting at Kilkenny declared Mr. Grattan's Relief Bill to be "a penal law, a law of persecution, which, if persevered in, would shake the empire to its foundation;" and the experience of all the county meetings and all the aggregate meetings, which have since been held, proves this sentiment to be rather strengthened than diminished. The right hon. gentleman has, indeed, admitted the extreme indisposition of these petitioners to any arrangement that rests upon this basis; but he suggests that it is for this House to legislate, and for the Catholics to obey; that it is for us to do, not what we suppose to be popular, but what we feel to be right; not what is agreeable to them, but what is good for the empire, secure of giving ultimate satisfaction, whatever feelings of present discontent may be excited. Upon ordinary occasions, there is no one, Sir, more disposed than I am, to admit that such a course is best suited, both to the dignity and duty of this House, but when you come to apply this rule to the enactment of a Veto, I am afraid you will find the case to be rather an exception, and it appears to me, that this point well deserves our most serious consideration. We must ever recollect, that almost every form of security that has been proposed, and peculiarly the veto, applies to the clergy, and not to the laity... it is, indeed, the character of every arrangement that has been suggested for Catholic Emancipation, that the concessions and privileges are exclusively for the laity; the conditions, restrictions, and regulations for their clergy.—It must, therefore, be first ascertained, that before the concessions are made to the laity, who are to receive the benefit, the clergy will afterwards fairly bear their part in performing the conditions, in consideration of which those concessions are to be granted. This must be understood as an indispensable preliminary, before we can stir a step; otherwise we might find ourselves in the distressing situation, of having given up every thing for nothing, and incurred every danger which was apprehended, without obtaining any one safeguard which had been held forth, because, when the performance of the conditions should be looked for, the clergy would plead their conscience and their religion in bar of the fulfilment. We should then have no alternative between acquiescence in their resistance, or an attempt to enforce the law by compulsion, which would instantly and inevitably assume the complexion of a religious persecution of the worst species. And this it is which distinguishes the enactment of securities, by the mere authority of Parliament, from the provisions of any ordinary statute. In common cases, the feelings of the individuals who are to be affected, may well be obliged to give way for the general good, and the common penalties of the law sufficiently provide for obedience; but, in a matter of religion, the case is different, and I can conceive no situation more embarrassing, than that of the Legislature, if, after having enacted ecclesiastical securities for the satisfaction of the Protestants, and procured their acquiescence in the measure of emancipation on the faith of Catholic performance, it should afterwards be found that the necessity of refusing compliance with the law, was become a point of religious conviction, upon the part of the clergy. Sir, it is no imaginary case that I am putting: the Irish Roman Catholic clergy never spoke out upon this subject, until a vote had actually passed this House, for going into a committee on the bill for their relief; and it is a curious fact, that the decretum of the Irish synod was promulgated in Dublin a day or two before the result of the first vote of the committee had arrived there. The synod must, therefore, have come to its resolution under the impression, at that time universal, that the large majority which had voted for the committee, would carry through the measure of Emancipation, upon the terms and conditions which were proposed, and the determination of the Bishops, convened in full synod, under these circumstances, was, that they could not obey such a law without incurring the guilt of schism, and that, with the blessing of God, they were ready to lay down their lives, if necessary, rather than comply with its provisions. Suppose that law had actually passed: the laity would have had every thing conceded to them, and upon the appointment of the next Roman Catholic Bishop, when you should come to apply the boasted securities, you would have had the tender of a candidate for martyrdom, in lieu of the performance of the condition, on which alone Emancipation had been granted. And now, Sir, that we have the renewed assurance of the feeling of the clergy being unchanged, are we to repeat the former erroneous course, with this single variation, that formerly the Legislature had the excuse of being under a mistake, but that, in the second instance, we should act with our eyes open; that formerly we should, at least, have thought it practicable to obtain the performance of the compact, but that now we should know it to be impossible, except at the expense of a religious persecution. And would any one recommend the experiment of tranquillizing Ireland, by even the semblance of a religious persecution? but here, in truth, you would not have the semblance but the reality. If the clergy should be refractory for conscience sake, I ask you, what course would you adopt. What course could you adopt, but either to acquiesce in their refusal, or to attempt, by force of some kind or other, to carry the law into execution?—Permit me, however, to do the clergy justice for their candour; they have now told us fairly the course they mean to pursue. It is for us, Sir, to say, whether we shall be so mad as to give them the opportunity. I hope I have made out the proposition, that if the veto is to afford the general principle, which, in the committee, it is hoped to mould into a security, we must not rely merely on the determinations of the Legislature, but that the dispositions of the Catholic Clergy must be a very principal subject of attention. Much stress, I know, is laid upon the assertion, that the Pope is favourable to the measure. How the fact is I know not. Certainly in his letter from Genoa, of the 26th April, 1815, his impression of the nature of concession upon the veto seem to fall very short of the measure contemplated by this House; the following are his words,—“In quibus mos est Candidatos Sanctæ Sedi commendandos designare, eorum notulam exhibeant Regiis Ministeriis, ut Gubernium si quis invidiosus aut suspectus sit eum statim indicet ut expurgetur, ita tamen ut sufficiens numerus supersit ex quo Sanctitas Sua eligere potest.” I see here no real power even of veto: the Government are to suggest, it is the Pope who is still to judge of the weight of the objections, and these are not to be pushed too far, lest there should not be a sufficient number of individuals left for the objects of his choice. If this were to be acted on, it would be an increase rather than a diminution of the papal authority.—We should confer on him a positive privilege of choice, in lieu of the present habit of acquiescence in the customary domestic nomination. But, whatever may be the feelings of the Roman Pontiff upon the subject, one thing is certain, that when it was believed that he was in favour of arrangements, the universal voice of all those who assembled at public meetings in Ireland declared, that they would shew they were Catholics, not Papists, and therefore not bound by his authority. When it was thought the Pope was of their opinion, the arrangements were treated as involving spiritual matters of high moment: when he was, on the contrary, supposed to be inclined to yield, he was represented as compromising the interests of Irish Catholicity, which he had no right to surrender; nay, the clergy have publicly resolved that, in the event of his being deceived upon this head, their superior knowledge of their interests in Ireland will not permit them to acquiesce. But, granting for a moment that the Pope and the Parliament, by a rare alliance, should overpower these difficulties, and carry the Emancipation upon the basis of a veto, let me ask, if another Pope were to arise a few years afterwards, who should perchance discover that his predecessor had been in mistake, and should inform the Catholics of Ireland that they had been perfectly right in considering the arrangements as matters of religion, is it possible to doubt, after the feelings their clergy have exhibited, that they would yield to his suggestion, and leave us to the alternative of abandoning the law, or resorting to violence, in order to enforce it? I am compelled to see in these late proceedings an additional proof that political objects, and those founded upon feelings not friendly to this country, are at the bottom with the efficient leaders of the Roman Catholics; and this inference is only strengthened by seeing that even the authority of the See of Rome has failed, (perhaps the only point on which it would encounter failure) when it has attempted to draw closer the bonds of amity between Ireland and Great Britain. When it is proposed, Sir, to go into a committee to inquire upon what terms we may safely accomplish what all admit to be a serious change in the Constitution, is it too much to require that it should previously be shewn to us, that some such terms are, in fact, within the means of attainment? We are not in a committee to search for a principle, but to modify the details of some principle previously suggested in the House. I have endeavoured to shew that none such can be found either in domestic nomination, or in the veto: and no other has been suggested. On a former occasion we were induced to go into a committee under abundant promises, that principles of security, satisfactory to all parties, would be proposed in it. The experiment was fairly tried; we went into the committee to see what could be had, and we found nothing but a veto. The mountains brought forth their mouse, an object of Protestant ridicule, and of Catholic abhorrence. It is clear to me that so long as the Catholics of Ireland continue in the feeling which has prevailed, it will be in vain to propose such terms as would make the proposition of investing them with political power, consistent with the views (I will put it on this practical ground) which have been entertained of their religion, in every part of Europe. And this leads me to an important part of the question hitherto not discussed amongst us, I mean the nature of the securities actually resorted to in other states. It is the more important that this should be fully understood, in order, that if the time should ever come when the Catholics of Ireland shall desire to obtain their objects upon the principle of conforming to those arrangements to which the Catholics have contentedly submitted in other parts of the world, the Protestants may, on their side, be apprised of the full extent of the terms on which they may reasonably insist. It is scarcely necessary to add, that for the materials of this inquiry I am indebted to the very valuable Report of that committee of which an honourable baronet opposite to me was the chairman. Amongst the Protestant states of Europe I find but two in which Roman Catholic Bishops are permitted to exist—Prussia and Great Britain. The example of the former becomes, therefore, the more important. In Prussia the power of appointing the Catholic Bishops is generally vested directly in the Crown; where the Crown does not directly appoint, they are nominated by their chapters, but the election is subject to the approbation of the sovereign. Even in these cases, however, the patronage is substantially in the Crown: for we are informed, that “upon a see becoming vacant, a commissary is sent to the chapter, bearer to it of a letter from his Prussian Majesty, by which it is directed to proceed canonically to the election of a new Bishop, and the name of a person is stated to them; and they are informed that if it is made in his favour, it will be agreeable to his Majesty; that this recommendation is uniformly conformed to: the chapter is aware, that as his Majesty’s approbation of their choice is indispensable, the surest mode of obtaining it will be to make the election recommended: otherwise the persons successively chosen by them would be exposed to endless objections.” But this is not the extent of Catholic patronage exercised by the Protestant King of Prussia: the House will perhaps be surprised to learn, that the Minister of state names the Priests to vacant churches, the bishops having previously approved of their admission as candidates for holy orders. Nor does the system of Prussian securities end here. “No bull of the Pope can be published without being submitted to the examination of the minister of the interior, by whom it is modified so as to be conformable to the regulations of the state.” And further, “All synods within the realm, must, as well as their decrees, be sanctioned by the cognizance and approbation of the state.” Sir, I am far from thinking it necessary, or even desirable, that the King of England should possess precisely the same powers; but if the Protestants should desire that he should have some of them, or all of them, as conditions of Emancipation, I would ask what spiritual objections could make those regulations incompatible with the Catholic religion in the Protestant kingdom of England, which are not incompatible with it in the Protestant kingdom of Prussia, and throughout the whole of its dependencies in Catholic Silesia? If there were any thing essentially incompatible with their religion in such arrangements, neither the Catholics of those countries nor the See of Rome could ever have acquiesced in them. The political inexpediency of the measure is another question, and one upon which, I suppose, that neither the authority of the Supreme Pontiff, nor of the petitioners, would govern the decision of this House; but that the absolute incompatibility of such arrangements with the tenets of their faith is a proposition which, after this example, no dictum of Pope or Propaganda can ever impose upon the mind of any being endowed with reason. Let it not be said that a sufficient excuse exists for their acquiescence in Prussia,—that a temporal stipend is in that kingdom connected with the spiritual preferment. To this I give two answers:—first, I should propose to annex a stipend as an indispensable part of any Irish arrangement:—secondly, it is clear that the mere temporal profit of the clergy in Prussia never could have induced the See of Rome to give up the power of nomination, if that nomination were a purely spiritual right. It is the very definition of simony, "dare aliquod spirituale pro aliquo temporalis;" a proceeding which I should be the last to charge upon the Roman Pontiff:—it is I, on the contrary, who defend him from this imputation, which gentlemen must necessarily cast on him, if they suppose him to have given up for a temporal advantage any thing that is indeed of a spiritual nature. It is plain that what he has surrendered is a mere temporal right, in consideration (if you will) of the temporal benefits conferred upon the Prussian clergy. In the same manner he might, if he pleased, agree in giving up the same powers to the Protestant of this country, either as an inducement to the Legislature to confer political power on the Catholic laity, or in consideration of a stipend for their clergy, if that should appear to others, as it does to me, an indispensable condition. In case this House, Sir, should ever enter into the consideration of securities, and think such arrangements expedient, I trust we never shall endure that any thing conceded to the Protestant King of another nation shall be refused to the Monarch of these realms. I have said that I should not desire to see our King in possession of all the powers exercised by the sovereign to whom I have alluded; I beg to be permitted to explain my meaning. I should object to it as an undesirable increase of the influence of the Crown. In that feeling I should be satisfied to give up so much of the authority of the Prussian precedent as relates to the lower classes of the clergy; and, instead of their being appointed by the minister of state, I should be better pleased to see that power exercised by their own prelates. As to the selection of the latter, if it should be thought a reasonable sacrifice to any Catholic jealousy, which might possibly be entertained if the original choice of a Bishop were to rest with the Government, I, for one, should not object to entrust it in all cases to their four Archbishops, to choose the next Bishop from amongst their own priesthood; but it must be on the express condition of the Crown having the power of translating to the sees of the greatest rank, value, and importance, such of the Bishops as it should prefer. This share of patronage, this ground of assurance that the general direction of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland should be in the hands of individuals who had proved themselves exempt from any ground of Protestant objection, I should insist upon as absolutely necessary for the State to possess; and in such an arrangement, coupled with a stipend proceeding from the exchequer, I should see far stronger grounds of hope for safety and stability, than in any securities hitherto discussed. I should also insist on the adoption of the Prussian regulations, in all their latitude, respecting communications with Rome, and respecting domestic synods. If I am asked why then will I not go into the Committee to discuss such arrangements:—my answer is, because it is impossible. Every objection which the Catholics of Ireland now feel to the veto, they would apply with tenfold exasperation to a project which they would consider as a mere purchase of the liberties of their Church: besides, it would, in my mind, be indispensably necessary that the consent, both of their clergy and of the Roman See, should be secured previous to any such discussion; and no person, I believe, will suppose that any of these parties are at present in a state of mind that would tolerate such a proposition. Permit me now to continue the view which I had commenced of the regulations adopted by the other Protestant states of Europe. In Denmark it does not appear that there is any Roman Catholic ecclesiastic of the episcopal order. The missionary priests are appointed by the bishop of Hildesheim, who exercises the delegated authority of a Vicar Apostolic, in relation to several states, in which he is not resident: in all instances, their appointments within Denmark and its dependencies are certified to the civil authorities for confirmation. In Sweden there is not any Roman Catholic Bishop, but there is one Vicar Apostolic, authorized by the diploma of the Protestant King, and exercising his functions subject to the provisions in the edict of toleration. In Holland, I should collect from the Report, that there is not any Roman Catholic Prelate; but it is required by the law of that country, "that no priest of that persuasion shall be permitted to exercise any of his functions, without being previously authorized thereto by a written act of consent and toleration; which act shall be granted in the towns by the burgo-masters, and in the country by the supreme authority of each district." It is observable that all regular priests, and particularly the Jesuits, are absolutely excluded from this admission. What regulations are to be adopted with respect to the provinces lately annexed to the kingdom of the Netherlands, do not appear to have been as yet settled. In the state of Hamburgh, there is not any Roman Catholic Bishop: the priests, like those in Denmark, are appointed by the Bishop of Hildesheim, but subject to the confirmation of the Senate. The government exercises the fullest authority over all publications of an ecclesiastical character, and the laws expressly prohibit all such without its previous sanction. In Saxony, the parent of the Reformation, there is not any Catholic Prelate, but there is one Vicar Apostolic; his functions seem nearly confined to acting as the Confessor of the King. On a late occasion, when it was desired by his Majesty to obtain the episcopal rank for the person who officiated in that capacity, it was necessary to resort to Argos in partibus infidelium in order to gratify his wishes. In Wurtemberg there is not any Roman Catholic Bishop, but there is one Vicar Apostolic; how he is appointed does not appear. Of Hanover the Report does not enable me to speak. Let us now turn to Russia, the only great State in the communion of the Greek Church;—a church more estranged from the religion of Rome than any of the western establishments founded by the Reformation. The Pope has, indeed, quite as much reason to be jealous of the hostility of the Greek Christian, as of any Lutheran or Calvinist, sharing as he does with the latter in almost every point of their difference from the doctrine of the Roman See, and having one or two others peculiar to himself. In his view, the Latin Bishop is a modern schismatic from the authority and doctrines of the primitive Eastern Apostolic Church, and I have heard more than one Greek Prelate pronounce him to be nearly as great a deceiver of mankind as Mahomet himself. And yet, Sir, we see this Latin Bishop, though still under the actual excommunication of that Church from which he has dissented, acquiescing in the Sovereign of Russia's appointing directly to the only Roman Catholic See within his dominions. I ask, are we to tolerate that a power thus recognized in the Russian Emperor, should be refused to an English King? Again let me ask, what spiritual objection can be urged?—for if it is indeed avowed that the indisposition proceeds from political motives, the Pope is the last person to whom I should attend upon the subject. I now pass to the Catholic nations, that we may inquire what regulations they have found it necessary to adopt against the authority of Rome; and here, instead of increased deference, we shall find nothing but augmented precaution. So that it may be affirmed that with scarcely an exception, there is not amongst them any state so small or so great, so near or so remote, so enlightened or so superstitious, but that it has set itself against the pretensions of the Papal See with a jealousy at least equal to that of Protestants themselves. In Austria we find the Catholic Prelates appointed by the Emperor; in Hungary by the King, and in the latter country they act without waiting for any Roman confirmation: in Austria and Hungary the coadjutors even are appointed by the Crown. As to the communications with Rome, all ecclesiastical statutes, ordinances, bulls, and rescripts, are submitted to the Provincial Government in the first instance, and afterwards, along with an Attorney-General's opinion, laid before the Supreme Tribunal, by which "their promulgation is prohibited, when they are found to relate to objects not essential to the legitimate ends of government, or obnoxious to the interests of the state." In France the King has appointed all Archbishops and Bishops for at least three hundred years; indeed, there is reason to suppose that the right is as ancient as the French monarchy itself:—"No state maxim," says Pithou, "can induce the King of France to tolerate that a foreign power, ignorant of the true interests of the country, or whose interest may be opposite to theirs, should appoint to the prelates. The patent of the appointed Prelates and their consecration are left to the Pope, but the choice of those who are to be consecrated is left to Kings. The right is inherent in the Crown, it is unalienable." As to the communications with Rome, a peculiar jealousy has existed in France. So late as 1768, we find the King's advocate pressing upon the Parliament, (See Report, p. 24.) the pernicious principles which the encroaching disposition of the See of Rome would cause to be disseminated, if the Parliament should not carefully examine every act derived from that source, before the publication should be recommended to the Crown." Perhaps we should have expected to discover in Spain more compliance in these matters; far from it. All Bishops in Spain are appointed by the King, who requires that the necessary bulls should be immediately transmitted by the Pope to the newly appointed prelate. The patronage of all ecclesiastical benefices appears also to have been in the Crown, until by a concordat in the middle of the last century, reciting the dissensions that had existed between his Majesty and the Pope, fifty-two benefices were declared to be in the gift of the latter. On the subject of communication with Rome, we find the kingdom of Spain as cautious as any of its neighbours. Every brief, bull, rescript, or pontifical letter, must be, in the first instance, transmitted to the Government for examination. Ecclesiastical persons offending against this provision lose all their temporal rights; nay even the attorneys employed are sentenced to expiate, by a ten years' imprisonment in Africa, the crime of having been concerned in such transactions. In Portugal the powers of the Roman See, both with respect to patronage and the intromission of its bulls, seem to have been matter of strenuous dispute.

The Portuguese Government, however, have never ceded to its pretensions; and so lately as 1811, we find a writer handed over to public prosecution for daring to defend them. The condemnation of this work by the royal censor of Portugal, contains language which we should not, perhaps, have expected from a Roman Catholic of that country: he speaks of "the iniquitous pretensions of the Popes to undermine the sacred authority of Kings and Bishops; and the despotism of the Roman Court, of which Portugal, France, Germany, and unhappy England more than the other powers, have complained." (Report, p. 371.) The King of the two Sicilies would not be found upon inquiry to be much more inclined to acquiesce; but I should not feel excusable if I were to trespass on the attention of the House, by a minute examination of the regulations which prevail amongst all the smaller states of the Catholic persuasion. I have already sufficiently adverted to those which are of the greatest consequence, and I shall content myself by referring to the Report itself such gentlemen as may desire further information on the subject. We have thus, Sir, looked round Europe, and seen Calvinists, and Lutherans, and Roman Catholics, and Christians of the Greek Communion, agreeing in two propositions:—first, that the patronage of the higher stations of the Catholic clergy must be vested in the state; and, secondly, that the most vigorous superintendence must be exercised over all their communications with the See of Rome. And, therefore, when the right hon. gentleman asks, whether this nation will continue to be the only great nation that shall persist in intolerance, I say, that his question rather ought to be, whether this nation will determine to be the only one in Europe which shall consent to place the Roman Catholic religion in a situation so free from all practical control, as to form a complete imperium in imperio within its bosom. And why, Sir, have all the European powers, and more particularly the Roman Catholic powers, felt it so necessary to guard against the introduction of the Papal bulls, purporting to expound from the highest authority the faith which they themselves profess? Because there are doctrines, peculiar to Papal Rome, insisted on in her early power and never abandoned in her extremest weakness, inconsistent with the legitimate and necessary authority of governments within their respective dominions, and therefore thus guarded against by all, or rather by all but England. These tenets of the Roman See have long been designated by the name of the Transalpine doctrine. That doctrine, on all sides, has endeavoured, with unwearied perseverance, to establish its dominion, but on all sides it has been so vigorously repelled, that at this hour there are but two spots in Europe on which it can rest its foot: and one of these spots is the Vatican, and the other is Maynooth. Whence, Sir, this singular result, that only in the centre of the British empire has Rome been thus successful? Because all other nations have contented themselves with regulating the Roman Catholic religion, which was practicable, but we insisted on abolishing it, which was impossible. We despised regulation, and persecution produced the effects which persecution never fails to produce upon any creed of man; the more it was assailed, the more it grew and the more it flourished. That fatal policy has long ceased to exist. Let us not, however, in embracing the wiser system of toleration, neglect those precautions of which the whole world has set us the example. We have heard much of the tenets of the Catholic Church,—its councils, its dogmas, and decrees. I have never been disposed, Sir, to lay so much stress on this part of the question as appears necessary to some gentlemen. I was willing to suppose that education and the superior reason of the age in which we live, must have had their tacit influence on the Roman See; and that although a decent sense of consistency might withhold its Pontiffs from formally retracting those principles which the pride, or the power, or the ignorance of an Innocent and a Gregory had imposed upon the world, we might well compound for their becoming matters of silent omission upon their part, and of generous oblivion upon ours; but when I advert to some recent events, I am almost forced to doubt whether I have not been rather too liberal in giving them this credit. I see the order of the Jesuits restored:—after all the experience of their incompatibility with the various governments of Europe—after having been expelled even from Russia—and after having been convicted by the antipathy of the human race, (if I may use the expression), I see the present Pope of opinion that the circumstances of Europe call for the revival of their order.—I see them accordingly sent forth, and journeying after the Transalpine doctrine so congenial to their spirit, I see them following its conducting light, and departing to visit Ireland, the house over which its star has stood.—There was one circumstance more than any other which had induced me to give to the Catholic religion a credit for increased moderation. I mean its late-born toleration for the diffusion of the Sacred Scriptures.—I thanked it, if not for its co-operation, at least for its endurance of the efforts of that noble association, which, amidst all the glories of our country, will stand forth, I am convinced, in after ages, the brightest ornament of our times.—I speak of the Bible Society of Britain, whose spirit, like the angel described in the Apocalypse, is now flying through the midst of heaven,—having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell upon the earth,—to every nation—and kindred,—and tongue,—and people. Alas, Sir! I give to that religion a credit which it had not deserved.—The candour and moderation which had disarmed even Portuguese and Sicilian superstition, have served but to sharpen the keen hostility of Rome. In a pontifical letter, addressed on the 29th of June last to the primate of Poland, I find the following denunciation of the Bible Society:—"We have been truly shocked at this most crafty device by which the very foundations of religion are undermined and having, because of the great importance of the subject, conferred in council with our venerable brethren, the cardinals of the holy Roman Church, we have, with the utmost care and attention, deliberated upon the measures proper to be adopted by our pontifical authority, in order to remedy and abolish this pestilence as far as possible. In the mean time we heartily congratulate you, venerable brother, and we commend you again and again in the Lord, as it is fit we should, upon the singular zeal which you have shewn under the circumstances so dangerous to Christianity, in having denounced to the Apostolic See this defilement of the faith so imminently dangerous to souls.—And although we perceive that it is not necessary to excite him to activity who is making haste, since of your own accord you have already shewn an ardent desire to detect and overthrow the impious machinations of these innovators; yet, in conformity with our office, we again and again entreat you, that whatever you can achieve by power, provide for by counsel, or effect by authority, you will daily execute with the utmost earnestness, placing yourselves as a wall for the house of Israel."—The Polish bishop, it seems, had deserved commendation, but the conduct of the Archbishop of Malines demanded a reproof.—The following are extracts from another bull, addressed to the latter prelate on the 3d September last:—"We are worn down with poignant and bitter grief at hearing of the pernicious designs not very long ago entered upon, by which the most holy books of the Bible are every where dispersed in the several vernacular tongues, and published contrary to the most wholesome rules of the Church, with new translations which are craftily perverted into bad meanings.—But we were still more deeply grieved when we read certain letters signed with the name of you, our brother, wherein you authorized and exhorted the people committed to your care, to procure for themselves modern versions of the Bible, or willingly to accept them, and carefully and attentively to peruse them.—Nothing certainly could more aggravate our grief than to behold you, who were placed to point out the ways of righteousness, become a stone of stumbling; for you ought carefully to have kept in view what our predecessors have always prescribed; namely, that if the Holy Bible in the vulgar tongue were permitted every where without discrimination, more injury than benefit would arise."—This document finally enjoins the Archbishop "to emulate the example of illustrious men which procured for them such honour, and consider how he might reprobate these his deeds by a solemn and formal retraction."—Such, Sir, are the sentiments of the See of Rome at this time; and I know not in what they differ from those which it entertained in the first moments of the Reformation. An elaborate work, in four volumes, has lately issued from the press of this country, to which I shall now beg leave to direct your attention:—"A Defence of the Ancient Faith," by Dr. Gandolph. In general, I feel as strongly as any one the injustice of endeavouring to affix upon a large party the sentiments of an individual; but this "Defence of the Ancient Faith" comes attended by some circumstances, which entitle it to peculiar credit. The publication appears to have been disapproved of, and its circulation prohibited, by Dr. Poynter, the ecclesiastical superior of the author. Dr. Gandolph tells us that "to this he submitted, expecting justice at Rome." To Rome he accordingly went, "where his character carried him through every difficulty, and he returned with the approbation of his works by the proper authority, that authority without whose approbation the Pope himself cannot publish." This authority, it appears, was the Master of Sacred Theology, and the Professor of the Sacred Scriptures, at Rome. The former states, "that the author has undertaken to explain and illustrate every point of doctrine which has given rise to controversy between Catholics and Protestants; and, as far as it is possible to succeed, has rendered the articles of the Catholic faith clearer than the light." He adds, "that after rigidly examining the whole composition, he is far from discovering any thing in it contrary to the pure faith and doctrine of the Catholic Church." The approbation of the other censor is still more decisive: he states, "that the author has carried the war of controversy into the fortresses of the enemy; and in that land, once the fruitful parent of saints, has triumphantly raised the Catholic standard of victory over his discomfited and confuted opponents; and declares that multiplied editions of this work, so worthy to be cased in cedar and gold, will be highly advantageous to the Catholic Church." This work, so sanctioned, exhibits such sentiments towards Rome, such feelings towards our established church, and such hopes and predictions of its downfall, such views of the British Constitution,—as might well induce a Protestant to pause before he could admit that principles like these can safely be admitted into the guidance of our councils, and the enactment of our laws. In order fully to appreciate these principles, it would be necessary to read the whole work; but the following few extracts may, at present, serve as specimens of its spirit:—"A Catholic finds not more difficulty in assenting to any truth the Church proposes to him as an article of faith, than he would in assenting to the oral testimony of God himself."—Vol. i. p. 429. The Reformation was "the sinful deed of lust, avarice, and pride."—Vol. ii. p. 130. "An impious withdrawal from their mother church."—Vol. iv. p. 19. "Its sole object was to render religion less adverse to the corrupt inclinations

from its foundation."—Vol. iv. p. 444. And we are then told that "the principles of Protestantism render her unequal to the contest, and she must either yield to the violence of these attacks, or again shelter herself under the immovable rock of Catholicity:—She must either resign her hierarchy, or see it again united in communion with the Catholic Church." In another part of the work we find a long and curious parallel between the authority of the Pope, and that of the King of these countries, shewing that as the principle of the King's government is strength, so that of the Pope is truth.—Vol. i. p. 410. The author's views of the British Constitution are thus expressed:—"In two points the British Constitution is absolutely defective as a government: first, inasmuch as it leaves the head of it without the power of acting for the general good without the consent of a third party. Secondly, by leaving the monarch occasionally dependent on the passions of the multitude. I have herein hinted that the monarch is likely to be the fountain of all that is good and wise, whilst the popular part of the government promotes all that is favourable to the passions.—Now, one good and virtuous monarch is capable of reforming a whole kingdom, if he have the means in his power. Every nation, therefore, would have this chance some time or other, under a regular monarchy. But a popular or representative government will infallibly pull in the opposite direction, because it will always be influenced by the baser passions."—Vol. iv. p. 230. Such, Sir, are amongst the tenets of a doctor of the nineteenth century, promulgated in the capital of the British empire, and,—in the opinion of Roman censors,—“worthy of being cased in cedar and in gold.”—But I have dwelt too long upon this topic. I know that many wish to see political power in the hands of the Catholics, from a conviction that it would naturally devolve into the hands of their aristocracy, and that they would become safer leaders of the party than those by whom it has hitherto been directed. I agree, Sir, in the opinion, that the Catholic Members of this House would, in general, be selected from the ranks of their aristocracy, and no one is more thoroughly satisfied than I am of their loyalty, moderation, and good sense; but, I totally disbelieve that they would become the efficient directors of the great Roman Catholic party—they would, I have no doubt, be permitted to lead, and be hailed even by shouts of applause, exactly so long as they would pursue the direction in which they should be driven; but if they should desire to lay aside their separate character—if they should be content to forget their distinctness as Catholics—if they should hesitate to move forward in the path of Irish Roman Catholic aggrandisement, I am persuaded that they would be denounced by their followers as worse than Orangemen themselves—and if their clergy should happen to lend themselves to the cry, I see not how these leaders could refuse to follow the impulse they would receive. Nor is this, Sir, a mere picture of imagination:—We have seen within these few years, Lord Fingal and others of his friends, the applauded leaders of the body; but afterwards, when they ventured to express a dissent from its proceedings, we have seen them assailed by imputation, and branded as seceders and apostates—and here their leadership expired. Equally founded in reality is the possibility which I have suggested of their clergy associating themselves with the laity in the condemnation of their aristocracy under such circumstances. In the last year, when the principal persons of their laity addressed the House of Commons in a manner which in our opinions was so honourable to their moderation—their petition was, as I have said before, condemned by one Roman Catholic Archbishop from his pulpit, while the very absolution which was given to it by another, indicates still more strongly the authority which their Church assumed in the matter. The following is the acquittal of the petitioners, as published by Dr. Troy, the titular Archbishop of Dublin:—that inasmuch as the petitioners in stating their readiness to admit and conform to regulations, confine such readiness to arrangements not incompatible with the principles of their religion, as they respect its faith and discipline, he does not feel that they who have signed the petition, have merited his displeasure by so doing. Now, it was known to all mankind, that the arrangement to which the petitioners referred was really the veto, which the Roman Catholic Bishops had declared could not be submitted to without incurring the guilt of schism—it is evident, therefore, that the saving generality of their expressions in a petition to this House alone preserved them from the displeasure of their ecclesiastical superior, while the plainer declaration of what he and they equally knew to be its meaning, would have drawn down the weight of that displeasure upon their heads. The history of Ireland presents a very remarkable instance of the lay aristocracy placing themselves at the head of the Catholic party; of their strong desire to cultivate the relations of amity with England; of their incurring the displeasure of their ecclesiastical authorities; of their consequent expulsion from power, and of the final desolation of Ireland, resulting from the measures that were pursued. In the year 1642, when the Irish had succeeded in possessing themselves of the greater part of the country, a general assembly of Catholic deputies, out of all the provinces of the kingdom, was summoned to Kilkenny. The plan of its formation, and the outset of their proceedings, are so similar to those of the modern Catholic Committee, that we must suppose the framers of the latter had the council of Kilkenny in their view. Like that committee, it consisted of their temporal peers, their bishops, and lay deputies, from the counties and towns of Ireland; and, like it, they openly protested, “that they did not mean that assembly to be a Parliament, but only a general meeting, to consult of an order for their own affairs, until his Majesty's wisdom had settled the present troubles.” The leaders of this council were the Lords Gormanstown, Taaffe, Castlehaven, Muskerry, and others, men of cultivated education, moderate talents, and a sincere disposition to make peace with England on reasonable terms, and terminate the existing disorders. When this council had concluded with the Lord-Lieutenant a cessation of hostilities for a year, in the view of accomplishing, within that period, a lasting pacification, on the basis of concession to the Catholics, their clergy endeavoured to prevent this reconciliation: overborne in the general assembly, they retired in a separate synod, and from thence declared, “that they were bound in conscience, absolutely, expressly, and clearly to set down in the treaty of peace, a special article for keeping in their hands such churches, abbeys, and monasteries, as they were then in possession of;” that is, of the Protestant churches, which, in the rebellion of the preceding year, they had taken care universally to occupy. In vain did the assembly depute their Speaker to reason with the synod, upon the consequence of clogging the treaty with a condition so impossible to be complied with. The lay assembly now came to issue with their Church, and concluded peace with England upon terms, to them sufficiently satisfactory. The progress of ecclesiastical pretension becomes not a little singular. In a new synod, the clergy proceeded to declare, that all persons who adhered to the peace, had violated their oath of association, and were guilty of perjury; they then excommunicated the Catholic commissioners who had signed the treaty, and all who were instrumental in it; and a further excommunication was fulminated against all who should receive or pay money under the orders of the Catholic council, and against all soldiers who should act under their orders. Nor was this an empty demonstration; the terror of the magistrates and the superstition of the soldiers reduced the council to sue to this assuming priesthood; but they sued in vain—the synod seized the persons of the Catholic Lords and other members of the council, and threw them into prison: they then proceeded of their mere spiritual authority to appoint a new council of ecclesiastics and laymen, upon whom they could rely, and commanded that the army should be subject to their controul. No description of the extent of their success can be more complete than that which is given by an eye-witness, the Nuncio Rinuccini, in his letter to the Pope:—“The clergy of Ireland,” says he, “so much despised by the Ormondists, were, in the twinkling of an eye, masters of the kingdom; soldiers, officers, and generals, strove who should fight for the clergy, drawn partly by a custom of following the strongest side, and at last the supreme council being deprived of all authority, and confounded with amazement to see obedience denied to them, all the powers of the confederates devolved upon the clergy." Shortly afterwards, when the murder of the king and the usurpation of Cromwell had thrown the Duke of Ormond into the hands of the Catholics, and when, for their mutual defence, he himself, aided by all the nobility of their persuasion, was heading the Irish armies against the English usurper; in this critical juncture, the laity again besought their clergy to support the Lord Lieutenant, or that the whole nation would unavoidably be ruined. For this purpose a formal letter was addressed to them, their answer to which was, a solemn excommunication; whereby, as they express it, "they deliver unto Satan all that should feed, help, or adhere to the lord lieutenant by giving him any subsidy, contribution, or intelligence, or by obeying any of his commands." The immediate effect of this their reply was, to paralyze all resistance to Cromwell's invading armies, and to let in that full tide of desolation which overwhelmed them and their flocks in one common ruin. Sir, it is impossible to deny that, from the period of the Reformation until the middle of the last century, the melancholy history of Ireland exhibits two great parties. Every thing British, and every thing Protestant, constituting the one; every thing Irish, and every thing Catholic, included in the other; and the possession of the land the prize of combat between both. Hence arose the policy of England, to support what was called the Protestant ascendancy, as being, in fact, her tenure of the country. Hence also the penal code—hence (what ought not to be confounded with it) the exclusion of Catholics from political power. During the last forty years a new system has been adopted, more suited to the spirit of our times and to the better feelings of mankind. In abandoning the former policy, a very fatal error would, however, be committed if this country should be led so far into the opposite extreme as to neglect the security, the maintenance, and, I will say, the encouragement of the Protestants of Ireland. I fear, Sir, that it is the more necessary to press this topic upon your attention, because I think I perceive a feeling in the minds of some persons in this country, that, as the Protestants have hitherto been too much favoured, so that for the future they should be positively repressed. I perceive also appearances in Ireland, too plainly indicating that equality is not the final term of attainment, but that ascendancy is an object not altogether out of Catholic contemplation. Hence the disposition to magnify their strength; hence, in the formal statement of their grievances we are told "that in numbers they are prodigiously increased, and are continually increasing beyond example in any other country. Already they compose the far greater part of the trading and manufacturing interests. The agricultural class, so powerful and influential throughout Ireland, is almost universally Catholic. They occupy the most valuable positions, whether for commercial or for military purposes; the boldest coasts, most navigable rivers, and most tenable passes, the most fertile districts, the richest supplies of forage, the readiest means of attack or defence." They go on to tell you that "numerically the Catholics constitute full five-sixths of the Irish population; that compared with the members of the established Church they are in proportion of at least ten to one—a proportion, be it observed, rapidly advancing of late years. In every city, town, and village, their numbers more or less preponderate. The open country is in their almost exclusive occupation. The gross population of Ireland at this day, is moderately estimated by the most competent judges at five millions of inhabitants. Of this number we may, without exaggeration, state the Catholics as amounting to four millions two hundred thousand; that is, equal to one-half of the united population of England and Wales. In fine, the Catholics are emphatically the people of Ireland." Such, Sir, is the Catholic declaration. I quote from their statement of the Penal Laws. In the same manner the numbers of the Protestants are depreciated in every publication, and at every meeting. What is of yet more importance, it is sought to give them a bad name—it is sought by every effort to impress upon this country that they are the oppressors of their peaceable and suffering countrymen. Feeling, Sir, as I do, of the utmost moment that the House should be enabled rightly to estimate the Protestant character in Ireland, may I beg your attention to the history of our origin, as well as to our actual situation? When gentlemen are told that one-fourth of our population is Protestant, it may possibly occur to them, that the Reformation proceeded in Ireland in the same manner as amongst other nations, that it made a certain progress amongst the people, and then was arrested. Nothing can be more different from the fact. The Reformation never made any progress amongst the native inhabitants of Ireland. If you were to look merely to the Irish Statute Book in the reigns of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, you might indeed suppose that the separation of Ireland from the church of Rome proceeded pari passu with that of England. But during the reign of Henry, the reality of the English sway extended but a few miles from Dublin. "His Highness's rebels," as they are emphatically called in the parliamentary language of the day, were in the undisturbed possession of almost the whole island, and it was to them a matter of the utmost indifference what laws a parliament in Dublin might think proper to enact. The generals of Elizabeth cared but little for conversion, and the campaigns by which they effected the final subjugation of the people were not of a character to soften their feelings of hatred for the English invaders. Their conquest was completed without the Reformation having advanced a single step; no ray of that illumination, which in this country prepared the minds of men for its reception, had penetrated the thick darkness in which Ireland was buried, and it still remains for us to inquire who and from whence are the Protestants of Ireland. Elizabeth had frequently inflicted the forfeiture of land as the punishment of broken faith; but she changed only the proprietors, not the people—the condition of the country was nothing altered. It was James who conceived the project of changing the population of a great part of the island, and of introducing a new race of men, who, from religion and their race, and the continual necessity of self-preservation, should for ever be attached to the interests of England. The rebellion of Tyrone had furnished an excuse for considering the province of Ulster as forfeited to the Crown, and James proceeded to fill it with English and Scotch undertakers. It was an age of foreign adventure—the establishment of colonies was peculiarly the fashion of the day, and thousands who would otherwise have emigrated to the rising settlements of America, preferred the less remote plantation which was thus offered. In a little time the northern province assumed a new aspect—the settlers imported with them the habits of previous civilization. The Irish tenures of tenancy at will, aggravated by being also a tenancy in common, containing in themselves a perfect antidote to improvement, were laid aside. Freehold leases, farm-houses, law and industry, were every where introduced, and Ulster speedily presented a picture of the results of human labour. James was pleased with his success, and he was proceeding in the same manner in Longford, Westmeath, the King's and Queen's Counties, parts of Wicklow, Wexford, and Sligo, when death terminated his designs. These are the districts which, notwithstanding the wars and massacres that succeeded, have from thenceforth continued the seats of Protestantism in Ireland. James did not intend to drive out the ancient inhabitants altogether. On the contrary he allowed them a certain portion of the land for their future habitation. It must, however, be acknowledged, that the measures were the conquerors themselves—that the sword was thrown into the scale, and that the colonists took for themselves whatever was arable, plain, or fertile, and allotted to the Irish their share almost exclusively in the mountains. The diminished numbers of the natives, reduced by their unparalleled losses during the campaigns of Lord Mountjoy, and by the dreadful famine which succeeded, opposed no further resistance to these unwelcome intruders. They accordingly retired to the mountains which were assigned to them; but they regarded the heretical robbers with abhorrence, and held themselves in readiness for exacting a bloody retribution. In 1641 they did exact it. The population of the Protestants in their fertile plains naturally increased with rapidity, whilst that of the Catholics in the mountains as necessarily diminished: hence are we to account for the great majority of the former at this day in the northern province; a proportion in several places so great, that I could name extensive tracts in which there is scarcely a Catholic to be found. The line between the two nations has, in later times, become less defined—many Roman Catholics have descended into the plains, principally to become labourers to the Protestants, and a few Protestants have ascended into the mountains on agricultural or commercial speculations; but it is nevertheless true, speaking generally, that in the province of Ulster, and more or less in the other counties which I have specified, the Protestant holds the plains—the mountains are inhabited by Catholics—and the two parties are, in all the essentials which constitute the character of a people, still distinct. The character of this Protestant yeomanry is peculiar and striking; with very little resemblance to that of their Catholic neighbours; and yet not very like the nation from which they are derived; if I might venture to express an opinion, perhaps too partial on this subject, I should say they had improved by transplantation, and that no part of these islands can produce a more industrious or a more generous—a more intelligent and loyal population. The casual observer can easily distinguish these districts from those of the west and south by their superior improvement. Let not this, however, be too hastily assumed as a circumstance of disparagement to the latter. The northern districts have had all the advantage of the skill and knowledge of the early settlers, and, what is of more consequence, were afterwards, by the religion of their cultivators, exempted from the barbarising operation of the Penal Code. It is a part of the system to endeavour to bring these people into discredit, to represent them as an Orange faction, as men leagued for unconstitutional purposes, and thirsting for the blood of their Catholic fellow-subjects. I deeply regret that we should have any distinctions of this nature; I wish we had neither Orangemen nor Ribbonmen. But after expressing my regrets at their existence, and my hopes that their own good sense will finally extinguish them, I cannot therefore acquiesce in the unbounded misrepresentation that daily takes place upon this subject. The spirit of the Northern Protestants, for a great number of years, has appeared to me almost entirely defensive. I can speak on this point from some opportunities of observation, from a long knowledge of the districts to which such feelings are principally attributed; and I can declare that among the very numerous trials which the unfortunate feuds of Protestants and Catholics have brought under my view, I can recollect but a single instance in which the Protestants were the aggressors. Such infinite misrepresentation has prevailed upon this point, that I hope I shall be permitted to describe the true nature of these unfortunate disensions. Ever since the battle of the Boyne, this Protestant population has been in the habit of its annual commemoration. Their fore-fathers, who were contemporaries with that event, saw in it the confirmation of the titles to two-thirds of the property of Ireland, which the Catholic Parliament had confiscated; they saw in it the reversal of the attainder of two thousand five hundred Protestants, which that Parliament had inflicted; and they saw in it their own preservation from a renewal of the scenes of 1641, of which their province had been the theatre, and which many of them were old enough than to recollect as eye-witnesses. It was, in their opinion, a day much to be remembered; and on that day in each succeeding year almost the whole Protestant population assembles in solemn processions, unarmed in every instance that I have known. We must all be aware how easily a pageant of this nature is continued, and with what difficulty laid aside. Of late years these exhibitions are considered as studied insults by the Catholics. The Protestants, repairing unarmed to the places of assemblage, are attacked by superior numbers—they take refuge in a house—they find arms there: the house is attacked, and shots are fired from within. On some occasions the Protestants, rescued by their friends, have sallied forth and retaliated severely on the assailants. Lives have thus been lost, and houses burnt. This is a shocking state of society: it is right, however, that the blame should duly be apportioned. At the next assizes the Catholics are indicted for the riot, and necessarily found guilty of the misdemeanor; the Protestants are prosecuted capitally, and it is in vain to expect that any juries will condemn to death, when it appears that they were previously attacked. I am sure, Sir, that it is the common feeling of every one whom I address to wish that the good sense of the Protestants should voluntarily discontinue processions and distinctions, which, however harmless in their intention, produce so much practical offence; but I trust that, on the other hand, no misrepresentation of their consequences will lead this House into the dangerous mistake of considering the Protestants of Ireland in any other light than as the surest stay of British power—the firmest bond of the connection of the British islands in all time, past, present, and to come. To preserve this connection through the medium of Catholic sentiment, rather than of Protestant preponderance, has been the generous aim of British policy now for nearly forty years. Within that time the Penal Code has been abolished, and the enjoyment of every civil privilege has been communicated. If there are any Protestants who regret it, never will I share in their feelings. To this, however, has been added the elective franchise—a great practical participation in political power; and it is now proposed to complete the experiment, and effect a vast change in the Constitution. An intimate union between the Established Church and the Civil Administration has since the Revolution been considered as one of its essential principles. We are now desired to abandon that mistaken doctrine, and to view an accordance with our religious establishment as no longer a necessary qualification for administering the government; we are henceforward rather to consider our ecclesiastical establishment as a list of pensions; to reduce the United Church of England and Ireland to the mere rank of a more favoured priesthood. All this may accord with the practical indifference to matters of religion, which prevails in some other nations, but it has not hitherto been the British Constitution. We are invited, Sir, to make this trial in the hope that ambition will be disarmed, in proportion as power is brought within its reach—that desire will be repressed by the nearer prospect of enjoyment—and that peace and good-will will be established in Ireland by undaunted perseverance in a course, which, so far as it has been hitherto pursued, has produced the contrary results. We are invited to put our trust in the abstract gratitude of great multitudes, but to neglect the conciliation of the interests of the ecclesiastical community from which their impulse is derived. We are told that to bind that community in any manner to the maintenance of the new order of things, by any of the motives of human conduct, would be a most unstatesmanlike proceeding; but that for our safety we may adopt the happier expedients of insulting its members by the tender of degrading oaths, or irritating them by a peevish opposition to their appointments; or we may look on at the domestic process of their assigning to each other their several ranks and stations. These, Sir, are the securities which are offered. For me they are not sufficient, and I enter my protest against them.

Mr. C. Yorke was anxious to deliver his sentiments again on this question, and to state the impressions now made on his mind. His view of the subject lay in a narrow compass. The time was now arrived for an absolute decision of the House. The present circumstances of the country pressed upon them to put an end to it, one way or other. Every one should now be ready to give his verdict. His own, being a kind of special verdict, might not meet the ideas of many. He had always felt the greatest difficulty as to the foreign jurisdiction, and nothing could make him give way without a proper security for our national church. On former occasions, when this question was agitated, we were at war, and almost all Europe was under the power of France, who had made the Pope her prisoner. He saw then no probability of coming to any practical understanding with his Holiness; therefore he had always opposed going into a committee. He had, however, no wish to negotiate with the See of Rome, as we were not bound to apply to it. The true way of proceeding might be for Parliament, in its own wisdom, to decide without any reference to papal authority, which, he believed, was not founded in history, in religion, or in reason; (hear), but he perceived that it was impossible to treat satisfactorily with the Catholics, without the intervention of the Pope. We knew that, on other occasions, we were told they acquiesced; but then they found that they could not take the oath, and the regium placitum was objected to. The Pope was now re-established in his independence; and, therefore, we could enter into a negotiation with him. This circumstance certainly placed the petitions in a more favourable light. He hoped to hear distinctly what was meant by domestic nomination. As to the oath of 1813, if the Pope regularly sanctioned it, he should so far be satisfied. He had never insisted on a veto, in the way that plan was sometimes described, but only for some means by which the Irish bishops could be taken from the mercy, and sole jurisdiction, and authority of the Pope. If that could be satisfactorily done, the mode of doing it did not appear so material. He had before said he was surprised that the Irish Catholics did not take the nomination on themselves, through their chapters and bishops. He had thought that no reasonable Catholic in Ireland could have objected to that: but it was necessary that such a nomination should be purely national, and that the electors should swear to appoint persons of good character, proper qualifications, and loyal principles. It should be a fair though not a numerous body of electors, and the mode should be regulated by the act. If the consecration by the Pope was necessary, the Pope should bind himself to institute the person so elected: and he thought that his Holiness should agree to give authority in such cases to the four titular archbishops. He could see no more objection to this mode, than, as he understood, there was in the kirk of Scotland, where the clergyman was always chosen who was regularly presented by the patron. The petitioners took no notice of the regium placitum, or the right of inspecting bulls and other communications from Rome. He hoped, however, that they would not object to that power, which, to him, appeared to be indispensable. But two points were to be considered—what was our security that a negotiation would be carried on in a direct manner, and, then, what probability could we entertain of its final success? He hoped the measure of emancipation would not be attempted to be carried into effect on our part, till we had the sanction of the see of Rome to the acceptance of concessions on the part of our Catholic brethren. He would not proceed one step in definitive legislation till this point was gained. We should first know whether the Pope wished to negotiate, and on what conditions, before we offered rights or privileges, and upon the issue of his declaration should depend our passing of a bill. A clause might be introduced empowering his Majesty's Government to enter into treaty with the see of Rome, and placing the whole measure on the footing, that none of its provisions should take effect, except in the event of an authentic ratification by the Pope of that part of it which depended upon him to allow the Church, of which he was the spiritual head, to accept or reject. There appeared to him no difficulty in such a negotiation, nor any danger in entering upon it. The commencement of the operation of the bill would thus be simultaneous with the promulgation of the Pope's accession to its conditions. On these principles, he should be satisfied to go into a committee; but if a bill was to be the consequence of such a proceeding, he would not pledge himself to support all its provisions. He would go as far as he in prudence and conscience could go—he would not stand upon trifles—he would not resist important concessions; but still his assent would have its limits. He was willing to allow the eligibility of the petitioners to almost all offices, but he would fairly state at once, that he should have a difficulty in admitting them to seats in Parliament, and into the high efficient offices of the Crown. (Hear, hear.) The number of offices which he should be willing to give, or disposed to withhold, would depend upon the securities to be rendered, or the degree of danger to be apprehended. If there was little or no danger, there should be few or no restrictions. He felt it difficult to say how many offices should be refused. If the Catholics of Ireland were like the Catholics of other enlightened kingdoms, his scruples would be very much lessened, or even entirely removed; but although he regretted to state, he would not shrink from stating, that the Roman Catholics of Ireland were the most bigotted in Europe. In France and Germany the Catholics were three centuries in advance of those of Ireland, with regard to liberality and moderation. To bring the points of comparison nearer home, he would say, that the Irish Catholics were behind their brethren on this side of the water. He should be understood only as speaking of those of a certain rank and of certain prejudices. Were all the Catholics like the Shrewsburies, the Cliffords, and the Howards, on this side of the Channel, and the Barnwells, and Plunketts, on the other, he should have no difficulty, and would desire few restrictions. The propriety of enacting these restrictions in detail would depend much on the opinions that might be expressed by the members from Ireland. He was satisfied that men of property, men of character, men of rank, influence, and information on the temper of the Catholics, and men having a deep interest in the question of their being admitted to all the privileges of the constitution, would not lend themselves to support measures of concession if they conceived them to be dangerous (hear, hear); and that they would see them to be dangerous, if they really were so. But whatever might be the ultimate difference of opinions, it was obvious that this was the proper time to take the subject into consideration. We were now at peace with all the world; we had attained a great and a secure eminence among the nations of Europe; we had overturned the throne of the most inveterate enemy of this country, who endeavoured to find an ally in the discontents of our own subjects; no danger threatened us from without, and we should therefore prevent, by liberality and conciliation, those dangers which might arise from impolitic restrictions at home. He should, therefore, vote for going into the committee, and would agree to a bill, to be sanctioned and ratified by the see of Rome. Such a measure, he was persuaded, would do no harm; and while it brought all the inhabitants of the United Kingdom to a proper understanding with each other, would, he trusted, be so formed, as to allay all heart-burnings, and admit every one to taste the benefits of our unrivalled constitution. We had attained high and distinguished success in our late contests, which threatened our existence as an independent people; but we were no sooner out of one difficulty than another met us, for which, to ensure our security and glory, a new remedy must be provided. "Nulla magna civitas diu quiescere potest. Si foris hostem non habet, domi invenit: ut prævalida corpora ab externis causis tuta videntur, sed suis ipsa viribus onerantur."*

—In order to prevent any decay, and to secure our internal stability, we should endeavour to conciliate our fellow subjects, and to allay all political animosities. He did not believe that concession, however far carried, or however much restricted, would please every body, or satisfy the wishes of all parties. He could not even hope that what he had said would meet with the views of either side of the House; but he was inclined to press upon Parliament to take the subject into earnest consideration, to decide upon what was just and proper, and to leave the result to Providence. (Hear, hear.)

Sir J. C. Hippisley took a view of the facts recorded in the Report relative to the regulation of Roman Catholics in foreign states, and observed, that great pains had been employed out of doors to weaken its authority, and to make it appear a garbled selection, compiled to attain a particular object. The Vicar Apostolic of the middle district (Dr. Milner) had thought proper to attribute that Report wholly to him, in which he had been followed by Mr. Lingard, a clergyman of the Roman communion; both of whom had contended that the Government had no right to interfere with four millions of its subjects. Mr. Lingard, however, who now opposed the veto, had once stated, that it was perfectly consonant with his views, and that he had drawn up a plan of nomination, subject to the control of the Crown, to which, in his judgment, no Catholic could have objected. Having dwelt at some length on these glaring inconsistencies, and their injurious effects upon the cause of the petitioners, the hon. baronet remarked on the many anomalies that existed in the present system, such as the admissibility of Irish Catholics to offices from which English Catholics were excluded, and the total exemption of Scotch Catholics from any disabilities whatever. (Hear.) These points, he thought, required investigation, and a committee alone could adjust them. He was sincerely disposed to alleviate the condition of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, but he should insist upon the strongest guards and securities for the establishment.

Sir H. Parnell rose to answer some parts of the hon. gentleman's speech, who spoke from the second bench opposite, (Mr. Foster,) and to satisfy some of the scruples of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Yorke), who spoke afterwards. The speech which the latter right hon. member had delivered gave him great satisfaction, from its candour and conciliatory temper. With regard to domestic nomination, he would shew that the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was mistaken, and that the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Yorke) ought to be satisfied. It would give, he was convinced, security to Protestant interests, and should allay the alarms of Protestant apprehensions. It had been stated that it was the practice for each bishop to elect his coadjutor, who was to be his successor. No such practice existed. When a bishop, from age or infirmities, was unable to discharge, to the full extent, the duties of his office, and to superintend the direction of his diocese, he had it in his power to name an assistant; but this was not resorted to except in cases of necessity, nor was it at all general. There were only three coadjutors of bishops at present in the whole of Ireland, and these had been elected because the painful and laborious duties of the episcopal office could not be performed without them. He would state the practice usually followed in filling up a see on the occurrence of a vacancy. It was common on such occasions for the bishops of a province to assemble, and to consult the opinions of the clergy of the vacant diocese with respect to a successor. They named three individuals whose qualifications they thought sufficient for the office, and whose life, opinions, and temper, entitled them to such a distinction; and those three names being transmitted to the Pope, his Holiness generally fixed upon the first in the list. He did so, however, not as a thing to which he was bound, but as an act of voluntary courtesy—not as a duty, but as an act of discretion. Some people expressed great objections against this power in theory; but no practical evil had resulted from it. For the last century, the nomination of bishops had been free from improper influence, and productive of no mischievous effects. But as evil consequences were apprehended, and as there was no security that a foreigner should not be elected, or a canonical institution to a native refused, with even a

keeping of the see vacant, domestic nomination by a fair body of electors was now proposed; and the petitioners expressed their belief that a concordatum could be obtained from the Pope to grant institution to no one not elected at home. This would remove foreign influence in the appointment of bishops in future; this was as much as the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Yorke) expected on this point; and with this, he hoped, he would be satisfied. In this respect, then, he might call the measure, in opposition to what had been said by an hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), a new one. The Catholic bishops went further, and tendered an arrangement which, he thought, would be satisfactory to all parties. They agreed, that no person should exercise the office of a bishop who was not a native, and that no person should be elected to that office who was not of peaceable disposition and loyal principles. In addition to this, they agreed to take an oath (to be inserted in the bill) "to defend to the utmost of their power, the settlement of property in Ireland, as now fixed by the laws; that they would be loyal subjects; that they would not attempt either by open force, or secret fraud, to subvert the establishment in Church or State, and that if they knew or heard of any conspiracy or contrivance to do the same, they would immediately disclose it to his Majesty's Government." This was the oath which they were willing to take; and they trusted it would be considered a sufficient security. With respect to the details of the bill, he would not now enter into them, as the committee would be the fitter place. The Catholics would submit to any regulations that the House should order, which might not be inconsistent with their substantial claims. A right hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) had required some tangible proposition before they entered into the committee, and what he now stated, would, he hoped, be considered as such. In tendering domestic nomination, they had acquired a claim to the vote of the right hon. gentleman for a committee. He did not believe that the committee could be refused, as he had heard no reasonable objection against it; and he trusted that the House would see that the time had now come for a deliberate consideration of the question, and for settling the points which were necessary to give satisfaction to all parties. (Hear.)

Mr. Webber said, no qualifications, no system of arrangements that have been or could be devised, could, in his view of the question, in the least remove or mitigate the enormous mischiefs which must attend the success of the proposed measure. He therefore had little to say on the subject of those arrangements. The veto would be the deliberate and express admission of the exercise of Papal power within this great and hitherto independent empire. It would be the admission of that power in the very instance in which it had been resisted, even when the Roman Catholic was the established religion; and in direct contravention to the statutes of provisors and premunire which still remain the forgotten or insulted laws of the land. Domestic nomination was as objectionable in principle, and more objectionable and dangerous in practice. It would establish a numerous corporation spread over the country, possessing extensive powers, still more extensive influence, independent of and unconnected with the constituted powers of the state, necessarily dissatisfied unless the church establishment were to be conceded, and therefore under a permanent principle of sympathy with the discontented and disaffected.—That an extension of privileges had been sought with eagerness, with an unremitting importunity, which never before attended the constitutional pursuit of any other public object, he was willing to overlook or excuse. If intemperance or clamour had proceeded to menacing and insulting demand, it was not with the Roman Catholics that the disposition of so treating the question originated. It had been suggested by the wild declamations of unprincipled or inconsiderate partizans, and the misrepresentations of what persons of deserved weight and authority had said in their behalf. Hence the fallacious misapplication of terms, which, in violation of every degree of truth and candour, had now got into established use in speaking of this question. Toleration, religious liberty, were said to be violated by withholding political power—as if those terms were not applicable only to the freedom of religious faith, and the exercise of religious worship. But these abuses of terms were trifling and venial, compared with that by which this measure had been artfully and delusively designated. The term emancipation, in the outset, suggested a prejudice, and summoned our best feelings to its support; it assumed the fact of a pre-existent state of slavery, from which to be emancipated. This term, familiarly adopted by their Protestant advocates, had encouraged them to believe that such really was their unmerited condition. His right hon. and learned friend, the representative of the University of Dublin, was actually reported as having so spoken of their condition in debate—as representing them as standing in chains behind the backs of their Protestant fellow subjects. He would state the words of that most able and zealous advocate of their claims, as acknowledged by himself. "They are not slaves, as some of their absurd advocates call them, but free men, possessing substantially the same political rights with their Protestant brethren, and with all the other subjects of the empire—that is, possessed of all the advantages derived from the best laws, administered in the best manner, of the most free and most highly civilized country in the world." This was the condition of Roman Catholics under this Protestant government, with the addition not only of the most perfect toleration of their religion, but having an exclusive seminary for the education of the clergy, supported at a great public expense. Did Roman Catholics in Catholic states so treat or so tolerate Protestants? Some degree of toleration, but none of maintenance, had been admitted in revolutionized France, and in part of the Austrian dominions. It had been made a basis in the new constitution of the lately established kingdom of the Netherlands. But wherever it had been in any degree admitted, Papal censure had followed, and condemned and remonstrated—asserting and denouncing that fundamental principle of intolerance from which all their persecutions have arisen—"that out of the pale of their church salvation cannot be found." See the late Papal rescript, respecting permission of the use of the Holy Scriptures in Poland, and the inveterate opposition which in these kingdoms—even in this metropolis—they give to all schools where under any modification, it is permitted. Such was their notion, and such their principle of toleration!—Such their construction of the toleration they claimed, and of the toleration they admitted. That which they claimed, included political power in its fullest extent: that which they admitted, excluded even the use of the Holy Scriptures. Candour, therefore, must allow that this was not a question of toleration or religious liberty, or a cause of emancipation. When the penal code existed, there might have been some pretence for the constructive application of that term. But that code had now no existence. It was enacted mostly in the 2d and 8th of Ann, and was finally repealed in 1793. Its name and the memory of its severities only had remained. The former for misapplication to the disqualifying statutes which were completed and made fundamental of our Constitution at the time of the Revolution. The latter to excite a false feeling, and to preserve and transmit hostility and vindictive resentment against the descendants of those who enacted them; who found them—as far as their agency was required, did not execute them, and finally repealed them with acclamation. No person who heard him, had felt more objection to their principle, or more regrets that under any provocation or excuse they were adopted. But he could do so without falling into the unjust and vulgar error of unqualified condemnation of our forefathers, without taking into consideration the provocations under which they acted respecting themselves, and the motives which actuated them for the security of their descendants.—[The hon. member then took a view of the rise and progress of the Popish religion and power, and having enumerated the several statutes passed against the Roman Catholics to the period of the Revolution, he observed, that it had been formerly argued, and very much at length, that the whole of that constitutional settlement was embodied in the Bill of Rights and the Act of Settlement, and much erroneous argument had been built on this strange error.] The Bill of Rights, indeed, was the head and principle of the different acts which, between the first of William and Mary, and the Act of Settlement of the Crown, the 12th and 13th of William, formed together the system and body of this great fundamental settlement; and Mr. Burke, speaking of that act as the representative of the whole, calls it "the corner-stone of our Constitution, as at that time declared, explained, and in its fundamental principles for ever settled." We were now called on to take down this corner-stone, to unsettle that which he had declared to have been for ever settled. But it had been delusively, and strongly and triumphantly argued, that because the Bill of Rights only provides for one part of the exclusion which the whole of these statutes embrace, that therefore no more was intended at that time than providing for the Crown being Protestant; and that the other exclusions, represented as resting solely on the statutes existing before the Revolution, were little adverted to, and manifestly left for revision to future legislatures. So persons of high authority in both Houses were represented to have distinctly asserted and argued. Was it not monstrous, that such persons should so shut their eyes against what appeared so open before them, lying together within a few pages of the statute book! The statute of 1st William and Mary, chapter 1, which recognizes the convention as a parliament, repeals the statute of 30th of Charles II. as far as relates to members of either House taking the oath of supremacy and allegiance, and substitutes other oaths in their place; and the 4th section of that act directs them to be taken, and the declaration against Popery, as set forth in the 30th Charles I. to be made with like formalities by the members of both Houses of Parliament. So that, were the exclusionary statutes antecedent to the Revolution all repealed, the exclusion from the legislature would remain in full force under this first statute of that great era. The 1st of William, chapter 5, sets forth and directs the coronation oath, and enjoins the declaration against Popery to be made at the same time. Chapter the 8th again recognizes the declaration, and directs it to be made by all persons in office, ecclesiastical persons, and naval and military officers. So far, therefore, it is provided that the Legislature, the Crown, and the Government, and all its subordinate instrumentality shall be exclusively Protestant. But, to shew how decided was this intention and determination, they proceed and endeavour not only to exclude Popery from office and trust, but even to expel it from the land: for chapter 15, empowers justices to tender the oaths and declaration to all Papists. All this, independent of the Bill of Rights, or the key-stone of them all, which, commencing with the recital,—"That whereas the late King James II. by the assistance of divers evil counsellors, &c. did endeavour to subvert and extirpate the Protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of the kingdom"—afterwards makes a strict limitation of the Crown, debarring all Papists, or persons marrying Papists, from succession to it, and provides that every king and queen shall take the declaration against Popery as contained in the 30th of Charles II. Thus, this great exclusionary statute of 30th Charles II. which it had suited the purpose of some eminent persons to treat so lightly, and to represent as so considered by the framers of the Bill of Rights, was deliberately adopted and incorporated by them into every one of those five enactments, which, clustering round the Bill of Rights, with the Act of Settlement, form the code of our great constitutional charter—and altogether, with decisive and emphatic solemnity, pronounce—that the Government shall be Protestant,—the Legislature shall be Protestant, and the King shall be Protestant. That was the Constitution which Mr. Burke said “was declared, explained, and improved, and in its fundamental principle for ever settled.” It was, therefore, finally established, as a matter never to be infringed on, that the Roman Catholics should be excluded from all power in this country. He admitted that there were in all ranks great worth and merit; he admitted this respecting the Roman Catholics. It was his object to support, as far as in his power, whatever rewarded their merit; but it was an object of still greater moment to protect the constitution of the country from violation. He admitted that their zeal and benevolence were very great; but from their very zeal and benevolence was the danger to be apprehended. Popery was not a dominion of a temporal nature: it brought the minds and the actions of men into a state of subserviency that was quite unknown in any other kind of government. The sacraments and rites of this religion violated every principle of reason and every dictate of humanity. Marriage was formed and dissolved in a peculiar and cruel manner. When it was dissolved, it was declared to have been void ab initio. It prohibited marriage to the seventh degree of affinity; and for a marriage of this degree a poor unfortunate woman, to his knowledge, was deprived of her husband. This couple were living happily together, and had three children. The man had been married again, and the woman had been turned out on the world—herself a virtuous wife without a husband—her children, though born in wedlock, bastards, and without a father. One might suppose this a solitary case, and the arbitrary act of an unfeeling and tyrannical churchman; on the contrary, he knew him and his parochial conduct before he was a bishop—and he knew not of any church a better or more humane man, or a more pious and zealous clergyman. The great and decisive objection to granting power to the Roman Catholics was their doctrine of exclusive salvation. This doctrine was most firmly believed by the most benevolent of them. All the horrors of Mary’s reign were prompted and sanctioned by men of the greatest piety and benevolence. Exclusive salvation hardened the feelings and deluded their minds, so that they were not influenced by morality or piety. They had morality and piety; but in acting upon their exclusive principles they forgot both. That this was a tenet of their religion was incontrovertible. It was avowed by Dr. Troy and Dr. Milner; and in the publication quoted by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), those doctrines were all recognized in their utmost extent.—He then read from a publication in 1809, by Delahogue, professor of theology at Maynooth, that exclusive salvation belonged to the Roman Catholics; and that Protestants were particularly excluded, because they had originally been Roman Catholics. The tract was entitled, De Ecclesia Christi, and was a class-book at Maynooth College. This point, whether the doctrines were right or wrong, was of the utmost importance in the present question. It proved the danger of admitting men believing such a doctrine to a participation of a Protestant government.—He mentioned the case of Lord Bristol, in the time of Charles II. In a debate in the House of Lords, that eminent and conscientious man stated the opposite and conflicting principles under which he was placed. He admitted that his sense of duty as a peer of Parliament, called on him to vote for the measure, but that his sense of religious obligation called on him to oppose it. And what did he do? He abided by his religious obligation. He could not have acted otherwise; and hence Mr. Locke, in his Essay on Toleration, was for excluding the Roman Catholics from all toleration. God forbid that he should go so far; he would tolerate intolerance, but he would not give power to intolerance. (Hear, hear.) The Roman Catholic religion was a superstition that had desolated the world, and deformed Christianity; and would they give power to what had done so much mischief in the world? What was the history of this superstition? For nearly three centuries the most powerful princes of this country exerted their civil authority in vain against the Papal power. It entailed discord at home, and degradation abroad. At length it was excluded from all power; and the consequence was, a period of science, and wisdom, and happiness, beyond the most sanguine expectations. From this era we enjoyed peace at home and glory abroad.—The next subject to which he would advert was the coronation oath. It contained these words, “That I will uphold and maintain”—not the Church, but—“the Protestant reformed religion.” He would appeal to any man whether the King, by exposing the Protestant reformed religion to danger, acted according to his oath. The Roman Catholics were, from conscience, hostile to the Protestant religion; and was not conscientious hostility dangerous? He would ask the hon. baronet (Sir H. Parnell), and the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Grattan) why they proposed securities? In the name of God what was the meaning of securities, if there existed no danger? (Hear, hear.) (The hon. gentleman was proceeding in this strain of reasoning, when the impatience pretty general through the House led him to apologize for continuing so long; this was his first speech upon the question, and he was anxious to express his conscientious conviction. He could never give his consent to admit the petitioners into the legislature, or into the high efficient offices of the State. If he entertained any prejudices upon this subject, they were prejudices which he should carry with him to the grave (Cries of hear, hear, from the Opposition.) His opinions, however, were deliberately and conscientiously formed; they were not prejudices, and the opinions of those gentlemen would appear to be from their cheers, and those opinions convinced him that no power should be given to Roman Catholics. To act otherwise, and to grant what was now demanded, would lead to Catholic ascendancy here, and to revolution in Ireland (hear, hear); it would be to rip up the fundamental statutes of the country. It would be precisely a counter-revolution. According to his view of these claims, the "be all and the end all," if the petitioners succeeded, must be a representation of the Catholics, as such, in the legislature of the United Kingdom. Now he would refer the House to three particular periods of our history, in order to shew that those claims were progressive, and that whenever the Catholic constituents formed the majority of electors scarcely one Protestant member was returned. In the Irish Parliaments of 1613, 1639, and 1689, the composition of each of which was regulated by spiritual interference, there were not above six Protestant members chosen. How could it be doubted that the same motives still existed, or that they did not exist in equal or greater force, considering the advances which had been made towards the object which they appeared to have uniformly had in contemplation? He asked, therefore, whether it would be wise or politic to adopt measures which would, sooner or later, lead to a transfer of the Irish Government from Protestant to Catholic hands? Was it certain, in such an event, that the Church or the State itself, as by law established, could be considered as secure? (Hear, hear.) He could not sufficiently express his astonishment, that such a project should ever have been entertained in a British Parliament. He trusted, however, that too much of the character of their forefathers remained, to suffer the possibility of its adoption. But if they decided against the sense and opinions of the most sound and reflecting part of their constituents, he should trust to the wisdom of the hereditary council of the nation. If the revolutionary spirit should find reception there also, his last hope would rest on the firmness of the illustrious personage at the head of the Government, who would recollect that the sacrifice of religious principle, or the adoption of a temporizing spirit respecting it, had never yet prospered:—he would recollect that Henry IV. had his Sully too—wise, provident and attached, that under his advice (and he was at least as sincere a Protestant as any minister of later times) he compromised with Popery, and submitted to it, and that the consequence was, the loss of his life and the extermination of the numerous Protestants of France.—The question should be closed—"The isle is frightened from her propriety." He had stated the principles on which it should be closed; let those who encouraged the agitation of it, reflect in time on the evils it had already produced, and the horrors that might ensue from it.

Mr. W. Elliott observed, that he hoped the little which he had to offer would plead his excuse for the trespass he was about to make on the attention of the House. He could not avoid commencing his observations by some notice of the pamphlet which had been referred to by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. L. Foster), and of which the author was understood to be Dr. Gandolphy. It was true that this pamphlet had been printed, and had received the approbation of the master of the sacred palace, who did not understand the English language. (Hear, hear.) Dr. Gandolphy had consequently incurred the censures of the Church; and although the removal of the interdict had been surreptitiously obtained, he was at present actually suspended. (Hear, hear.) When he adverted to the other parts of the argument of the right hon. gentleman, he could only understand his proposition to be this:—that we had so long exercised dominion over Ireland, and arrived at length at such a system of misgovernment, that no alteration could be attempted without danger, and therefore it was most advisable to continue the restrictions. It was very true, as had been remarked, that we could not satisfy all the Catholics; but he believed it also to be true, that the longer the delay in giving satisfaction, the greater would be the controversy respecting it. Upon the subject of security, the principal ground of difficulty in this question, he could not suppress his old opinion, that the repeal of these obnoxious laws would in itself be the best security. Different opinions, however, had been entertained upon this subject; but he, for one, had acquiesced in the conditions proposed in the session of 1813. His acquiescence in those conditions was founded upon a conviction, that the removal of civil restraints upon so large a portion of the community, was the surest means of healing those dissensions, and extinguishing those passions, which poisoned the happiness and troubled the very elements of society. (Hear.) He thought the success of this question important, inasmuch as it would not only satisfy just and reasonable claims, but as it would tend to shew the Catholics themselves what, in any state of the laws, they were likely to obtain. Those who agreed with the views taken by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. L. Foster), must proceed upon the supposition that the empire might safely remain in its present state. It was with this opinion he desired to argue; it was this principle which he was anxious to controvert. (Here the right hon. gentleman was indisposed for a few moments, but was encouraged to proceed by the general cheerings of the House.) He had never endeavoured or sought to place the argument upon principle of abstract rights. He still regarded it as a question, the determination of which was subject to the discretion of the sovereign legislative authority. It was, in fact, like all other disputed questions of right in church or state, one upon which the chief power of the state must decide, as it did even in cases of church property; because, however identified the church and state were by the constitution, the state always acts as the governing party. He was willing to admit that it had become a fundamental principle in the constitution, that the crown should be Protestant; but subsequent and incidental laws were of equal authority in regulating the application of that principle, and would be classed among the most enduring and beneficent statutes of the present reign. (Hear, hear.) At the same time he could not but embrace this opportunity of remarking, how important it was for the Irish and the English Catholics to act in concord, as to the means and instruments they employed in producing any impression on the public mind. The principal objection to the motion of his right hon. friend (Mr. Grattan) was founded upon danger. To him it appeared that danger already existed, and that its increase must depend upon the mind and disposition of the population from whom it was apprehended. To allay irritability, not to excite it, would be his means of suppressing the danger arising from such a cause. He would not go into all the painful details of hardship and oppression—such as the necessity of a British Catholic officer being obliged to go to Ireland to obtain promotion; but he would generally call the recollection of the House to that ancient stock of English nobility and gentry, upon whom these laws pressed with most severity, and against whose loyalty or domestic virtues, not one suspicion had ever yet been breathed. (Hear.) It was his most earnest wish that the House should go into the Committee, with a view to remove all animosity between the different classes of our countrymen, and to bring the inhabitants of all parts of the empire to a better understanding of each other, to the promotion of mutual charity and forbearance. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. B. Bathurst spoke against the motion. Strong arguments, he said, had been urged against it, and none of them had been yet contradicted by any sound reasoning. They were called upon to go into a Committee, there to discuss that which had been already discussed, and against which they had so often pronounced their opinion. In point of fact, to accede to the motion, would be to give up the whole question. They might be as well openly and fairly called upon to concede the claims, without any security; for if they went into the Committee, the only choice would be between the veto and domestic nomination. One of the most extraordinary assumptions in the arguments on this occasion was, that we had come to such a state that some change must be made in the laws respecting the Roman Catholics. For his own part, he denied this in toto: and maintained, that unless they were prepared to overturn the fundamental principles of the Constitution, they could not accede to those measures which the petitioners now demanded.

Lord Castlereagh regretted that he should be placed in the painful situation of differing from those for whose judgment he entertained the highest respect, and he should therefore offer what he had to submit with the utmost diffidence. One of the difficulties attending this discussion was, that it was scarcely possible to adduce one new argument or one topic, that was not already exhausted on either side of the question; but it was not the less necessary, in his opinion, that parliament should, with all convenient speed, deliver itself from the agitation of this painful subject, and the feelings which its renewal necessarily created. He believed, indeed, that parliament could not confer a greater benefit on society, or add a greater security to the country. The danger which it involved was not one of an ordinary kind, that could be faced and surmounted at once: but one that hung about the empire, presenting itself in forms which it was not possible to anticipate, or to provide for. The House would look back to the bill which had passed a second reading, and was stopped in the committee. They would recollect the difficulties presented in another place, where an attention to ecclesiastical interests might be supposed more particularly to prevail. Under circumstances which called forth so much difference of opinion, to keep any question in suspense for a long series of years, to be periodically agitating the public mind with it, would be a most injurious course of proceeding: but how much greater was the danger to be apprehended, when the question was one which interested the religious feelings of the country? It was, above all, to be recollected, that there was no probability that this question could be laid asleep by persisting in a system of permanent exclusion. In the present state of the world, that was not practical in any country, and certainly not in this. He would not cite the example of any particular state, but would refer to the general system of the governments of Europe, and the feelings of the people, to prove that such measures were no longer supportable. On such a question as this, it was well to look at the conduct of other nations, and to compare the present spirit of legislation in Europe with the past. It was well known that there was a time when the power of the Pope was great in temporal as well as in spiritual matters, and when his alliance was an object of importance to the princes of the continent; but in these latter days his political power was incapable of exciting alarm. This alteration in the affairs of the world was too important to be overlooked in considering the question of exclusions. At former periods of political arrangements, the state of religion made an important feature in all negotiations. On the conclusion of the treaty of Westphalia, it formed a great principle in adjusting the claims of different States; and in the settlement of the affairs of Germany, a regular balance was established of Catholics against Protestants. So far, however, was the spirit of governments now removed from this jealousy, that in the last settlement of the affairs of Europe, at Vienna, the question of religious difference was never once mentioned as a ground for any such precautions. Indeed, he could state, that there prevailed not only a disposition not to interfere in such questions, but on the contrary, to place religion on the footing of political equality.—This principle of equality had been even introduced into States in Germany, in which the Protestant religion was the dominant mode of faith: and though there had occurred instances of disputes between the governments and the Pope, there had not been any contests between the different religions within the State, nor any other evil consequence from the system adopted. From all this, then, he had a right to draw the inference he had already stated, namely—that in the present state of public opinion throughout Europe, as well as in this country, the question now before the House could not be put to sleep on the principle of maintaining the system of exclusion. It had been said, that a change had taken place in the Protestant mind on this question, and that the disposition to be severe in restraints was greater than it lately was: but he would put it to the House to consider, whether it did not appear that the change in this respect, to whatever extent it might exist, arose more from a feeling of disapprobation at the conduct of the Catholics themselves, than from any supposition that the removal of the restrictions under which they labour was a measure incapable of being reconciled with the safety of the Church and State. An honourable friend of his (Mr. Foster) had, with great ability, stated much with which he agreed, and also much with which he disagreed; but much of what he had stated as objections were, in his opinion, reasons for supporting the measure. What he had urged respecting the see of Rome maintaining what was called its ultra-montane doctrine was true, but of no importance to the present question. It was true, the Jesuits had been restored; but that was in countries where they were popular, and where the Pope could not do any thing better calculated to tranquillize the people; but was that any reason that we should persevere in maintaining what it was a fault in our ancestors to establish? That important chapter in his hon. friend's speech, that picture of religious animosity and want of charity in Ireland, which he had drawn so ably, and coloured so highly, was to him an additional and powerful reason for acceding to the motion. It was not to please the Catholics that he recommended this course, but to place the State in a situation of safety. (Hear, hear.) He was confident that we never could rely on the existence of a sound mind in Ireland, until measures of conciliation were frankly and unequivocally adopted. He was perfectly satisfied that the introduction of a few Catholic peers and commoners into Parliament would be productive of no danger; but that, on the contrary, their presence there would furnish them with the best means of operating beneficially on the minds of the population of Ireland. It was to be regretted at present that the State had not sufficient channels through which it could communicate with the people. If there were Catholic members in that House, they would have an influence over the people of Ireland which they did not now possess. He knew that in the minds of many there was a great repugnance to farther concessions, and that there were many difficulties to be overcome: but if they were even greater, he would proceed with the measure, so much was he persuaded of its utility: for it was no proof against the policy, or justice of a law, that it had been passed with reluctance and pain. While he went along with his hon. friend in a great part of his argument, he was not to be deterred from his purpose by representations of the intolerance of the Church of Rome. What he looked forward to as the most important advantage of conciliation, was, the complete settlement of that question which, while it was kept in suspense, afforded full scope to the malevolent spirit of every agitator.—He would now draw the attention of the House to the subject of securities; and he was happy to observe, from what his hon. friend had said, that on that point there was little difference of opinion between them, except as to the extent of the difficulty in obtaining the securities, which he could not help thinking far less than it had been represented. He perfectly agreed with his hon. friend, that unless every security which oaths could afford were given, the relief that was asked ought not to be granted; but he believed that the Pope had no objection to the oath which had been proposed, and that he was not likely to object to any other that might be framed on the same principle. He was also of opinion, that no intercourse should be permitted to be held with the See of Rome unknown to the Government, with the exception of the confessional communication. It appeared that the regium acquiescat, or the right of inspecting Bulls, was exercised by every Catholic State, and it was indispensable with respect to this country. It was a security which the Government owed to itself: and he had understood that, whatever objection there had been to the appointment of the clergy by the Crown, there was no objection whatever in Ireland to this species of security. With respect to the authority which his Holiness ought to retain over the Catholic clergy, his hon. friend had stated that in Prussia, and other Protestant states, the Government had the power of appointing to ecclesiastical situations in the Catholic Church. That statement was certainly correct, and therefore, as a matter of conscience, no Catholic could object to the right of appointment being in the British Government. They might be afraid of the extent of the influence; they might dislike the exercise of the power of the government in that way; but as to the Catholic conscience, that was unaffected by any interference of this kind: for such was the decision which the see of Rome had pronounced upon it. In touching on this point, he could not refrain from referring to M. Quarantotti's rescript. That document had been much criticised in Ireland; but it was certain that it was made with the full authority of the church of Rome. There was a fact with respect to that rescript which was not generally known; it was issued ex cathedra, under the impression that the relief bill of 1813, had actually passed through Parliament, and become the law of this country; but if any doubt could have existed on the subject, it was put an end to by the head of the church of Rome. The Pope had himself decided the question, having shewn, through the medium of Cardinal Litta; that the rescript contained no direction contrary to the conscience of any good Catholic. He did not understand that the system of nomination, authorized by the rescript, was so objectionable in Ireland as his hon. friend had stated it to be. He should regret if that respectable body, the Catholic Bishops of Ireland, had come to a final determination against any plan of that kind. He had found them ready, at a crisis of great difficulty and danger, to give a loyal and zealous support to the government. But, with all respect to those venerable persons, he must say, that it was painful to perceive in them that weakness of human nature which produced a yielding to popular clamour: for, had the measure been against their consciences, ten of that respectable body would not have given him to understand, several years ago, that they were ready to agree to it. They had, it was true, since started objections: and some of them, he was willing to acknowledge, appeared to be not unfair; but though they had declared a preference for domestic nomination, he still did not believe that there existed any sentiments in their minds which would create a repugnance to what parliament might decide, and the see of Rome sanction. Notwithstanding all that had passed, there was therefore no reason to refrain from giving as a boon that which might appear fit to be granted. If, after they had done what they conceived to be just and right, the boon should not be received with thankfulness, he would trust to time for the creation of a better spirit.—Another hon. friend (Mr. Yorke) had gone a great deal farther with regard to the encouragement of domestic nomination than he was willing to follow him. He, for his part, would have the appointment of the bishops to be made with the knowledge of the crown. He was aware of the nature of the oath; but there were many cases in which the state might have grounds for setting aside the choice of a person to whom the bishops might see no objection. No reason could be assigned why the Catholics of Ireland might not place as much confidence in the liberality of this government, as the Catholics of other Protestant countries did in their governments. He therefore thought that this question of nomination was not likely to create so much difficulty as had been supposed. With regard to the mode of election, if it were to be in the whole chapter, it would introduce a spirit of democratic contest, bad in any country, but particularly so in a country like Ireland. If the election were confined to the bishops, the evil would be greatly diminished, but it would not be wholly removed. Much stress had been laid on the repugnance which the Catholics had shewn to the veto. He regretted extremely that that word had been ever employed on this subject. The effect of a name was often very mischievous, and veto was a forbidding word. This government, however, ought to have the same knowledge of the persons to be elected, as was given to the other governments of Europe in a similar case. He was very much disposed to go along with his hon. friend, in thinking that a period ought to intervene between the declaration of Parliament in favour of this measure, if it should be adopted, and the actual enactment of a bill. The see of Rome would then have time to give its decision upon what had taken place. When the preliminary resolutions had received the sanction of the Pope, and the sanction of the legislature, all pretence of cavil would be removed; and the law would go into operation in Ireland as easily and as tranquilly as a turnpike-act. Though he should prefer this mode, yet he would not hesitate to proceed without it, because the opinion of his Holiness had been already so decidedly given as to leave no doubt upon the subject. It had been said, that the numbers of the Catholics were as ten to one: he never before had heard them stated at more than four to one. Be this as it might, he believed that the landed property of the country was almost all in the hands of the Protestants. On the principle of giving security to property he had supported the Union; because it tended to take Ireland out of the situation of a garrison. It was not the introduction of Catholic gentlemen into Parliament that would do any harm: on the contrary, their presence would conciliate and soften that spirit of animosity which prevailed in Ireland. There was no danger of a Popish parliament; but since the laws had been relaxed, we had to incur the danger of Catholic influence, without Catholic responsibility. The Catholic gentleman, sitting in that house, would have a character to maintain; but the Protestant, chosen by Catholic interest, might come, rather like a pandar of Catholicism, or a false Protestant; and, in that view, would be far less respectable, and more dangerous, than the son of a Catholic peer or a Catholic gentleman, who would be more worthy of sitting there. His firm conviction was, that this great question could never be brought to a proper conclusion, nor full effect given to the energies of the country, until they had the Catholics among them—(hear, hear)—until they were with them, side by side, to fight the battles of the constitution in that House, as they had already fought the battles of the country in the field. (Hear.) Till this measure should be adopted, they could never have any repose in legislation. He implored them, therefore, to go into the Committee, and to put an end to those heart-burning and afflicting discussions, which were constantly agitating the other country, and which were annually revived in this, by incorporating the Catholics with the constitution. (Loud and continued cheering.)

Mr. Peel rose, and spoke as follows: Sir, it is not without great reluctance that I rise to address the House.—I cannot but perceive an indisposition to listen to those who concur in my view of this question; I may subject myself to the imputation of presumption by endeavouring to reply to my noble friend; and, above all, I have the painful task imposed on me of avowing my total dissent from the opinions which he has delivered. But, Sir, I have a public duty to perform, and cannot be deterred by any considerations from performing it. It would tend to impede the freedom of discussion, and prevent the discovery of truth, if the arguments advanced by men of superior abilities were exempted, through the deference or apprehensions of others, from being fully and minutely canvassed. I must, in the first place, call the attention of the House to the course of proceeding which has been adopted by the advocates of the Roman Catholic claims. Towards the close of the last session, on the 21st of May, we were called upon to give a pledge, that early (observe) in the present we would take into our serious consideration the laws affecting the Roman Catholics; and it is not until the 9th of May that we are invited to enter upon the discussion. We have at length entered upon it, and we are arrived at this stage of the debate, without having heard, from the proposer or from the supporters of the resolution which has been moved, one single word with respect to the distinct nature of the proposal which is to be made in the Committee, should the Committee be granted. The resolution proposed by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Grattan) is that which was moved previous to the introduction of the bill of 1813. It proposes “that we shall take into our most serious consideration the state of the laws affecting his Majesty’s Roman Catholic subjects in Great Britain and Ireland, with a view to such a final and conciliatory adjustment as may be conducive to the peace and strength of the United Kingdom, to the stability of the Protestant establishment, and to the general satisfaction and concord of all classes of his Majesty’s subjects;” and I leave the House to judge from the speeches that they have heard from the supporters of this motion—above all, from the speech of my noble friend—what prospect there is that, from the adoption of this resolution, any satisfactory proceeding can result. The House will bear in mind that it was in pursuance of this resolution that the bill of 1813 was introduced; that bill which gave satisfaction to no class of his Majesty’s subjects, but was most reprobated and rejected by that very class for whose benefit it was intended. By that bill every political privilege and capacity was conferred upon the Roman Catholics, with two exceptions; and certain restraints and conditions were imposed, with a view of securing the state and the Protestant Establishment from any danger which might result either from the appointment of improper persons to be Roman Catholic bishops, or from an unfettered communication between the Roman Catholic Church and the See of Rome. Sir, the Roman Catholic body of Ireland declared they could not accede to the terms on which it was thus proposed to grant them political privilege. The Roman Catholic prelates resolved that they could not be parties to the ecclesiastical arrangements without incurring the guilt of schism, and the Roman Catholic laity declared that they would prefer their present state of exclusion to the removal of that exclusion on the conditions proposed. Now I distinctly understand from my noble friend, that he thinks the same securities which were required by the bill of 1813 must be now demanded. My noble friend has shewn that greater securities are taken by every state of Europe, and has proved, on the authority of the See of Rome, that it is not incompatible with the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church to admit an interference on the part of the Crown in the nomination of Catholic Bishops, and to allow an examination of the correspondence between the See of Rome and the Roman Catholic Church. But will the Roman Catholics of Ireland admit of either one or the other? Will they consider that to be a final and satisfactory arrangement, of which securities they reject with abhorrence form an essential and indispensable part? They cannot do it with any regard to truth or consistency—nor will they. To the authority of my noble friend, who thinks they will, I oppose the authority of the Roman Catholic prelates, and the Roman Catholic body at large, who have spoken in terms as unequivocal as language can supply. You may enact these securities if you will—you may even compel obedience—but will this be in conformity with the resolution you have moved? and will this be the satisfactory and tranquillizing arrangement which you are desirous to conclude? My noble friend says, that it is absolutely indispensable, in his mind, that the security against improper communication with the See of Rome, which is called technically the Regium Exequatur,—should be taken. He thinks too, that the authority of the See of Rome should be procured before it can be taken satisfactorily. Now I will prove to him, from a document which he admits to be authentic, that this security, by this authority, he cannot have. I hold in my hand the letter from Cardinal Litta, the official organ of the See of Rome, to Doctor Poynter, of the 26th of April 1815, from which I will read the following extract:—"As for the examination of rescripts to which I have alluded above, or what is called the Regium Exequatur, it cannot be even made a subject of negotiation; for your lordship well knows, that as such a practice must essentially affect the free exercise of that supremacy of the Church, which has been given in trust by God, it would assuredly be criminal to permit or transfer it to any lay power; and indeed such a permission has never any where been granted." I ask, then, my noble friend, whether, with his views upon the subject of securities, he sees the prospect of an arrangement which will give satisfaction even to himself. It is true that, in place of the securities required by the bill of 1813 we have a substitute proposed, a new security as we are told, called Domestic Nomination. This professes to be an arrangement which will exclude foreign influence in the appointment of the Roman Catholic Prelates. Now I must observe, in the first place, that, in the bill of 1813 it was not against foreign influence merely that you attempted to guard. In that bill you declared that it was "fit and expedient" not merely that the Roman Catholic Prelates should be exempt from foreign influence, but that "their loyalty and peaceable conduct should be ascertained to the satisfaction of his Majesty." This new security, therefore, which you proffer, not only falls far short of the security which, in 1813, you declared to be "fit and expedient," but it is not even of the same character. But is it not extraordinary that this offer should be called the offer of something new, and, above all, should be so called by the hon. baronet, (Sir Henry Parnell,) who proposed it? The hon. baronet has scarcely ever made a speech on this subject, without informing us that there is not at present any foreign interference whatever in the selection of the Roman Catholic Prelates, that their confirmation at Rome is a mere matter of form. He has told us, if I am not mistaken, that the Pope has interfered only once in the direct nomination of a Roman Catholic Prelate, since the Revolution (1688), and that we did not much benefit by the selection which his Holiness on that solitary occasion was pleased to make. Now I can understand the hon. baronet, if he will argue that, as there is no foreign influence, there is no necessity to guard against it; but I am utterly at a loss to comprehend him, when he, who denies that there exists any foreign interference, dwells with such satisfaction upon the value and novelty of an arrangement, which professes to exclude it, and thus obviates a danger which he does not believe to exist. Now, Sir, I wish to know by what authority even this security is offered, and I entreat the attention of the House to this point. This offer professes to be made by the Roman Catholic Prelates. Not one word has yet been uttered from which we can infer that the See of Rome has sanctioned the offer; yet, without the consent of the See of Rome, it cannot, I presume, be accomplished. I infer this from the resolutions of the Roman Catholic Bishops on two occasions. In 1812, they resolved, "that as we are at present precluded from any intercourse with our supreme Pastor, we feel ourselves utterly incompetent to propose or agree to any change in the long-established mode of appointing Irish Roman Catholic Bishops." And in 1813, when referring to the ecclesiastical arrangements contained in the bill of that year, they resolved that "it would be impossible for us to assent to them, without incurring the guilt of schism—inasmuch as they might, if carried into effect, invade the spiritual jurisdiction of our supreme Pastor, and alter an important point of our discipline: for which alteration his concurrence would, upon Catholic principles, be indispensably necessary." Now, does not domestic nomination, if it affects any thing, invade the spiritual jurisdiction of the See of Rome? and if the concurrence of the See of Rome is, on Catholic principles, indispensably necessary, why are we not informed whether that concurrence has been obtained or not? After what passed on the subject of the veto, it is right that there should be no misunderstanding on this point. Remember that, in 1799, the Roman Catholic Prelates resolved, that "such interference of Government, as may enable it to be satisfied of the loyalty of the person appointed, is just, and ought to be agreed to." Remember that, in 1808, a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Ponsonby) thought himself authorized by Dr. Milner, to accede to the veto on the part of the Roman Catholic Prelates of Ireland; and now, notwithstanding the resolution of 1799, and the supposed authority of 1808, the veto is denounced as utterly incompatible with the tenets of the Catholic Church, and subversive of the religion itself. I ask not with whom this mistake originated, I stop not to criminate, I only notice the fact, to shew that a serious misunderstanding has more than once arisen, and that we ought to guard against its recurrence. I ask, then, whether the Pope has sanctioned this offer of domestic nomination? I ask it with more earnestness, because I have seen a document published, apparently by authority, from which it does not seem clear that this sanction had been given. A correspondence has been published between Mr. Hayes, a Roman Catholic Priest, deputed to Rome, and Cardinal Litta, in which Mr. Hayes puts to the Cardinal the following question: "Whether that mode which in order to remove every groundless fear of any possible abuse, by which the pontifical authority might interfere, which never will happen, in the civil concerns of the kingdom) is proposed by Government by the Catholics, namely, that the clergy or bishops, or rather both jointly, should nominate the candidates, and which is therefore called domestic nomination, seems subject to meet with any difficulty on the part of the Holy See?" To this the Cardinal replies: "Finally, as to what is now annexed in your letter, touching what is called domestic nomination, I do not perfectly understand what this term is meant to signify. An explanation therefore seems requisite before any definite reply can be given." This correspondence took place so late as October, 1816. Whether the explanation has been given, and the definite reply received, I know not, but it is fit that some information upon the point should be afforded to the House, before it is called upon to accept of this domestic nomination as a full security for the present Protestant Constitution. I must now advert to the extraordinary speech of my right hon. friend (Mr. Yorke). I listened to him with the firmest conviction of his sincerity, with the highest respect for his character, and with no small admiration at the singular project which it is his intention to launch forth upon that boundless sea, on which we are invited to embark. Let us see what prospect there is for him also of a satisfactory arrangement. If I understand him, he will, in the Committee, propose a bill, containing provisions, regulating the election of Roman Catholic Bishops, not merely providing for domestic nomination, but enacting the precise mode in which that nomination shall be effected. In order that foreign influence may be altogether excluded, he will place the Popedom, so far as Ireland is concerned, in commission as it were, and a board composed of the four Roman Catholic Archbishops, is to possess that spiritual jurisdiction in Ireland, which is at present exercised by the Pope. And this bill, when it shall have received the assent of the Legislature, is to have its operation suspended until the acquiescence of the Pope shall have been obtained. Of all the propositions that have ever been made, objectionable in principle, or dangerous as precedents, this is the most objectionable and dangerous. What, Sir, will you make the operation of a solemn act of the King, Lords, and Commons, of this kingdom, contingent on the acquiescence of the Pope? Will you in the very act which professes to exclude for ever the influence of the Pope, recognize and establish that influence so far as to erect it into a fourth estate? Will you deal so harshly and unjustly by the Catholic as to admit by so solemn an act the policy and justice of concession, and then withhold it from him for ever; not for any fault of his, but because an aspiring and unreasonable Pope shall refuse the terms which Parliament proposes, and which the Irish Roman Catholics may be willing to accept. I have, Sir, hitherto been addressing myself to those who are of opinion that it is practicable to accompany the proposed concessions with such securities as shall effectually guard the Constitution of this country from danger. I must confess, however, that in their number I am not included. I have heard of no securities, nor can I devise any, which will allay the apprehensions I entertain. I will now state my own view of this question; and, as my noble friend has particularly applied his reasoning to the state of Ireland, and to the manner in which that country will be affected by the success of this motion, I will now follow his example, and confine myself within the limits which he has chosen. The question which we have to determine, is this: whether it be advisable to continue the present system of laws affecting the Roman Catholics, under which Ireland has been governed since the year 1793, or whether we shall substitute some new system in its place? It is not, whether we shall remove certain inconsistencies and anomalies which are pointed out in the existing laws; but whether we shall substitute, in the place of the present, almost a new form of Government. The gentlemen opposite dwell upon these inconsistencies, they tauntingly ask why a Roman Catholic may hold the commission of the peace in Ireland, and is not qualified to hold it in England? why he may hold a certain rank in the army in Ireland, and yet must forfeit that rank on his arrival in England? But the remedy they propose is not to remove the inconsistencies they complain of, not to put the Roman Catholics of the two countries on an equal footing in these respects, but to confer on all the right of sitting in Parliament, and every capacity for office and political power. When the clause of the bill of 1813, which admitted the Roman Catholics to Parliament, was negatived in the Committee, the bill was withdrawn altogether, and we were told that, divested of this clause, it was a measure of relief neither benefitting the Protestant Parliament to grant, nor the Catholic community to receive. I am warranted, therefore, in arguing, that we are now discussing the respective merits of two systems for the government of a great country: Now, I say, that it is impossible to decide on the merits of any such systems, without reference to the history, the state of society, and all the political and moral relations of the country for which they are intended. When I hear that an equality of political privileges has existed in Hungary, or that the Roman Catholics in Canada have the same capacities with Protestants, I must first inquire whether the situation of Hungary, or the situation of a distant North American colony, corresponds with the situation of Ireland. My right hon. friend, (Mr. Canning), informed us, that in a department of France, the department of the Gironde, the professors of the two religions were on the same footing as to political privileges, that they lived in harmony together, and thence he draws this inference, that a similar participation of power in Ireland will produce the same harmony. But can I infer, that because in a province of France, where the vast majority of the population are Roman Catholics, where the established religion is Roman Catholic, it has been there found practicable to admit all classes to equal privileges; that, therefore, as a matter of course, the same measures are advisable when applied to a great kingdom wherein the vast majority are Roman Catholics, and where the religion of that majority is not, and must not be the religion of the State? I repeat, then, that I must consider the internal state and political relations of the country, for which I am about to legislate, before I can determine what is likely to be the result of legislation. Let us, Sir, then consider the state of Ireland; let us recollect that Ireland is a country separated by nature from that to which she is united by law—a country having once had an independent existence—having within twenty years had an independent legislature—having still her separate courts of justice, and distinct departments of executive government. In that country there exist two religious establishments, two co-extensive hierarchies, the one sedulously affecting, the other legally possessing, the same dignities, titles, and spiritual authorities; the latter superintending the religious concerns of the great majority of the people, not endowed, indeed, nor encouraged, by the State, but exercising over the minds of its adherents, from the very nature of its doctrines and the solemnity of its ceremonies, an almost unbounded influence; the other, the Church of the minority, splendidly endowed no doubt, but endowed with the temporalities which once belonged to its excluded but aspiring rival. Recollect under what circumstances the transfer of these temporalities took place—recollect that in Ireland there was, in fact, no reformation there was no conversion of the mass of the people from one religious creed to another—no conviction brought home to their minds of the errors or abuses of their ancient Church; attempts were made to effect that conversion by other means, and they failed, and have left the natural consequences of such attempts, irritation and hostility. You assert that we have misruled Ireland, and you argue that we must adopt the policy you recommend because we have misruled her. Without discussing the truth of that assertion, I deny the force of that argument. We may regret this misrule, and its consequences; but what we have to determine is this—circumstanced as Ireland now is, by what course of policy shall we best promote the interests of the empire at large? We find Ireland, then, circumstanced as I have described, united by an inviolable compact to Great Britain; and we find it an essential article of that compact, that the Protestant religion, the religion of the small minority (in point of number) shall be the established and favoured religion of the State. We cannot make a constitution de novo; it is needless to resolve what would be the best system of law under another state of circumstances. We must modify and adapt our theories to the conditions of that national compact which we cannot infringe; and to that state of national establishments, which no one proposes to alter. Sir, with respect to Ireland, we might originally have pursued one or other of four lines of policy. We might have proscribed the religion of the Roman Catholics, and reduced them by the severity of penal statutes, to a state of degradation. This policy we have pursued, and, be the consequences what they may, I never can regret that it has been abandoned. To revert to this policy is impossible. We might have pursued a totally different course, have established the Roman Catholic religion as the religion of the State in Ireland, and have given every political privilege to its adherents. The adoption of this course is precluded, not merely by that solemn settlement, the Act of Union, but by the unanimous sentiments of every member of every side of the House, which are pledged to preserve the Protestant as the established religion of the State, and to maintain an inseparable union of the Church of England and of Ireland. There remain two other systems possible to be adopted in Ireland, and between these we must make our choice. The one is that on which we are acting at present, the other that which we are called on to substitute in its place. By the first we give every toleration to the faith of the majority, but maintain that of the minority as the religion of the State. We exclude the Roman Catholics from those offices which are immediately connected with the administration of, and may be said to constitute the Government of the country, admitting them, generally, to all other offices, privileges, and distinctions. It is proposed to replace this system by another, which shall equally profess to maintain the religion of the minority as the established religion, but shall open to the Roman Catholics both Houses of Parliament, and every office in Ireland, save the first executive office of the State, that of Lord Lieutenant. Now, Sir, it will be my purpose to prove that the code of laws on which we are now acting is preferable to that which it is proposed to substitute in its room, more likely to preserve inviolate the union between the two countries, more likely to provide for the stability of the Protestant church establishment in Ireland, and to ensure harmony between the Roman Catholic and Protestant inhabitants of the country. In attempting to prove this, I will avoid, as far as possible, every topic which can end to inflame or even to give offence. I will not revive the memory of ancient struggles for ascendancy, and if any advantage to my argument might be derived from dwelling on instances wherein power has been abused, or revengeful feelings have been indulged, that advantage I cheerfully resign. I will not impute to the Roman Catholic Church any doctrines which are not avowed, and I will give to the professors of that faith the full advantage of every disclaimer they have made. If the privileges required are to be conceded, I have no wish to lessen the grace of concession; if the hopes of the Roman Catholics shall be disappointed, that disappointment I will not aggravate. I will suppose the Roman Catholics of Ireland to have the same feelings, to be influenced by the same motives, to act on the same principles with other men, and I affirm that almost every objection which applies to that code of laws which you seek to abrogate, will apply, with equal force, to that code by which you propose to replace it; that there will be greater anomalies and inconsistencies in the latter, and a moral certainty that the arrangement you seek to make will be less conclusive and satisfactory than that which you have made. Let us examine the objections to the present laws. Do not suppose that I think they constitute, in the abstract, and without relation to the state of society for which they are intended, a perfect system, or that I rejoice in the exclusions and disabilities which they induce. I regret that they are necessary, but I firmly believe you cannot alter them, in any essential point, for the better. It is objected, in the first place, that, as we have admitted the Roman Catholics to the elective franchise, and as we have thus placed substantial power in the hands of the democracy, it is absurd to withhold the higher privileges—office, and seats in Parliament from the aristocracy. Now, I must observe, that objections of this kind shew how cautious we should be in making further concessions. When the elective franchise was sought for, it was not then foreseen, at least it was not argued, that the capacity for political office must necessarily follow. (Mr. Ponsonby dissented.) Sir, Mr. Burke, that most anxious advocate of the Roman Catholic claims, did not so argue: after observing that the Constitution is not made for general proscription, he states that there is a clear distinction between a franchise and an office, and the capacity for one and the capacity for the other. He says that franchises belong to the subject, as a subject, and not as a member of the governing part of the State; and that the Test Acts, while they left the privilege of sitting and voting, excluded the Protestant Dissenters from civil and military offices. He adds, that he does not mention this as approving the distinction, but as establishing the fact that such a distinction has been made by the Legislature. But, Sir, I see no inconsistency in admitting the Catholics to an influence in the State, which the possession of property usually confers, and in requiring at the same time that this influence should be exercised through a medium not hostile to the religion of the State. I see no inconsistency in permitting the Roman Catholics to choose the representatives and advocates of their interests; but in taking at the same time a security that those representatives, warmly as they may espouse their cause, shall have no religious bias in their own minds against a Protestant Government in Church and State. Again, Sir, we are told that we cannot stop where we are: I answer, that we are more likely to stop where we are, than we shall be if we advance to the point to which we are invited. We are told that the present system proceeds upon no principle; I answer, that the system which is proposed as a substitute contradicts the principle on which it professes to be founded. You propose to open to the Catholics Parliament, and to invest them with political power, to make them capable of acting in the highest offices of the State, and of being the responsible advisers of the Crown. You tell us, that the Roman Catholics of Ireland are advancing in wealth and education, and that, as you remove the disabilities under which they labour, their advance will be the more rapid, and they will become more influential in the State. Do you then mean, bond fide, to give them in Ireland the practical advantages of the eligibility you propose to confer upon them? Do you mean to give them that fair proportion of political power, to which their numbers, wealth, talents, and education, will entitle them? If you do, can you believe that they will, or can, remain contented with the limits which you assign to them? Do you think that when they constitute as they must do, not this year, or the next, but in the natural, and, therefore, certain order of things, by far the most powerful body in Ireland—the body, most controlling, and directing the government of it—Do you think, I say, that they will view with satisfaction the state of your church, or of their own? Do you think that, if they are constituted like other men, if they have organs, senses, affections, passions, like yourselves—if they are, as no doubt they are, sincere and zealous professors of that religious faith to which they belong—if they believe your “intrusive Church” to have usurped the temporalities which it possesses, do you think that they will not aspire to the re-establishment of their own Church in all its ancient splendour? Is it unnatural that they should? I argue even from my own feelings, if I place myself in their situation, I answer that it is not. May I not then, without throwing any calumnious imputation upon any Roman Catholic, without proclaiming (and grossly should I injure them if I did) such men as Lord Fingal or Lord Gorminstown, to be disaffected and disloyal.—May I not, arguing from the motives by which man is actuated, from the feelings which nature inspires, may I not question the policy of admitting those who must have views hostile to the religious establishments of the State, to the capacity of legislating for the interests of those establishments, and the power of directing the Government of which those establishments form so essential a part? Sir, the history of Scotland is referred to as proving the policy of granting those privileges which we are now called on to grant, and though I reject it as affording any precedent at all analogous to the present case of Ireland, I cannot help feeling that it may be, at some future time, with great force, appealed to in favour of the establishment of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland. What was the policy towards Scotland? After vain attempts to impose on the people a form of religious worship against which they revolted, you abandoned these attempts, and established, permanently and inviolably, the Presbyterian church, its doctrine, discipline, and government. Scotland with her Presbyterian Church, has been united to England with her episcopal Church: all jealousies are buried in oblivion, and the political union is complete. And shall we not hear, at no distant period, appeals to the case of Scotland not to prove the policy of conferring mere civil privileges, but to shew that the union of countries with different religious establishments may lead to the happiest results. "Carry, then," we shall be told, "a principle sanctioned by reason and experience to its full accomplishment; establish every where the religion of the majority as the religion of the State, and unite in one consistent frame of government—Protestant England, Presbyterian Scotland, and Catholic Ireland." But not being yet prepared to go so far, we are for the present assured, that the numbers of Roman Catholics who will be returned to Parliament will be very limited. "True, there may be danger, but then it will not be very great! You will not have more than ten Roman Catholics in the House of Commons, and ten Roman Catholics cannot overturn your establishment!" And are these the clumsy securities which are offered to us? These, so little in unison with the spirit of that Constitution which we profess to maintain, but which in truth we are about to abandon? If the Roman Catholics entertain no principles and no views hostile to the establishments of the State, admit them to privilege without reference to the number to be admitted; if they entertain such, exclude them, not because their numbers will be limited, but fairly and openly, because you cannot confide in them. We are told again that the Roman Catholics will only be qualified for office, that they will only have eligibility, and that the Crown may still, if it think fit, continue the exclusion. Sir, if the Parliament confers eligibility on the Roman Catholics, the Crown ought not to exclude them from a just proportion of power: the exclusion will be ten times more mortifying than their present disqualification; it will be so, because it will be attributed to caprice, to unjust preference, to unfair suspicion. If it be unsafe to admit the Roman Catholics to a share in the Government proportionate to their numbers and influence in the State, all the branches of the Legislature ought to share in the odium of disqualifying them; it ought not to be transferred to one branch exclusively—to that branch, too, which is to continue unchangeably Protestant—to that branch which will be the more liable on that very account to the suspicion of prejudice and partiality, instead of being, as the Constitution intends it to be, the fountain of all grace and favour. But we are told that these concessions are to tranquillize Ireland; we are told that the mass of the people are in a state of irritation, and that nothing but Catholic emancipation can allay it: but we are not told what this emancipation is to effect with respect to the mass of the people? Do you confer any direct and immediate benefit upon the lower orders? You argue, indeed, that the ultimate effects of emancipation will be to ameliorate their condition, to raise up new classes in society, and to unite the lower and upper orders by gradations which are now wanting. Will the peasant understand this? Will he feel any immediate benefit? Will he receive any practical proof that his condition is improved? Will he be less subject to the influence of that most powerful body, the Roman Catholic Clergy? And reflect how that body is affected by what you call Catholic emancipation. You confer certain privileges—substantial benefits perhaps—on the Aristocracy and the Bar: but you confer none on the Clergy: you do not even leave them as you find them: you concede to the Laity, but you accompany these concessions with regulations and restrictions, bearing exclusively on the Clergy; on that body whose influence is all-powerful, and who, of all classes, must naturally view your establishments with the greatest jealousy and hostility. And then, the connection between the mass of the People and the Clergy remaining the same,—the People receiving no immediate advantage, nor prospective advantage which they can comprehend, and the Clergy being subjected to restrictions against which they vehemently protest; can we flatter ourselves that the predictions of tranquillity and concord are likely to be verified? I am aware that in my argument, I have been assuming that the measure which is to be proposed, in the event of our going into the committee, will resemble the measure which was proposed in the year 1813. I am at liberty to assume it, at least from the speech of my noble friend, if not from the silence, with respect to any different measure, of those who preceded him: I cannot forget, too, that very able men were employed in framing the bill of 1813, and that it was the subject of the gravest deliberation; I cannot therefore presume that any better or more palatable measure will be now offered for our adoption. As new securities, however, are talked of, let us put aside all the provisions of the bill of 1813, which regard securities, and refer to those only by which privilege and capacity were conferred. With all due respect for the authors of this Bill, I must declare that it appears to me more replete with absurdities and inconsistencies than the laws which are now in force; and I consider it a most useful and instructive document, to prove how difficult it is for the ablest men to improve the Constitution, and how cautious we should be in attempting to innovate on so sacred a subject. Let us examine a little into the manner in which this bill was framed. The preamble of it recites that the Protestant Episcopal Church of England and Ireland is established permanently and inviolably; it then admits that the Protestant Episcopal Church forms an essential part of our free Constitution, and prays that certain provisions may be made with a view to put an end to all religious jealousies between his Majesty's subjects, and to bind them in all times to come by the same privileges and (observe) by the same interests in defence of their common Government. The same interests!—you confirm the Protestant establishment as an essential part of the Government, and then assume that the Protestant and the Roman Catholic will have the same interests in maintaining that Government! You may declaim as you will, and make what preambles you please, but the force of nature and the spirit of religion are opposed to you, they contradict your preambles, and confute your declamation. The bill then proceeds to admit the Roman Catholic to Parliament, and how does it provide for his admission? It leaves the oaths which are to be taken by the Protestant Member the same as it found them. He is still to advance to the table, and to take oaths disclaiming, as pernicious and damnable, doctrines which are imputed by implication to his Roman Catholic colleague; and he is not merely to disavow these political doctrines, but he is to abjure certain spiritual tenets of the Catholic faith as superstitious and idolatrous. Having heard the disclaimer of the Protestant, the Roman Catholic Member will then advance, and an oath is to be administered to him, which (as has been well said) looks more like a bill of indictment against him than an oath which is to qualify him for the exercise of the highest privileges and most sacred duties. He is required to renounce as unchristian and impious the worst principles and doctrines that his most bigotted enemies in any age have imputed to him. Why do you call upon him to renounce such doctrines? Do you suspect that he entertains them? If you do, you should disqualify him, not from being a member of Parliament, but from being a member of society; if you do not, why do you humiliate him by requiring a disclaimer? Oh, but he must disclaim them, however unjustly imputed to him, to satisfy the scruples and the prejudices of Protestants.—And is this your final and satisfactory arrangement?—Is this your plan for burying in oblivion religious animosities, and binding the Protestant and the Catholic by an identity of privileges and interests? Then comes the clause admitting the Roman Catholic to office, quickly followed by the proviso, that from the first political office in Ireland—from the first legal office in England, the Catholic must still remain excluded: you differ then only with us in degree. You tell us that we have conferred substantial power on the Catholic, but subject him to mere mortifying exclusions, that serve but to irritate and annoy him;—that we have broken the chain which bound him, but still reserve some useless links of that chain to remind him of his former servitude. But you yourselves retain some of those links, fewer indeed in number, but just as offensive as a memento of degradation, and as a proof that the equality of privilege and the identity of interest is not established. And when you dwell, and with justice, upon the rank, and the station, and the character of Lord Ringsal, let me ask you how, consistently with your principle, can you close against him for ever the first executive office of his native land, the only one, perhaps, to which he could aspire? He may represent his Sovereign in Jamaica or in Canada,—he may exercise in distant colonies all the functions of Sovereignty in Church and State,—but in Ireland he cannot represent him,—in Ireland the source from which grace, and mercy, and favour flow, is still to continue Protestant, exclusively and for ever. But, though you must have a Protestant Lord-Lieutenant, you may have a Roman Catholic Secretary: his friend, his adviser, his representative in Parliament, may be a Roman Catholic. Sir, those who know any thing of the relation in which those two offices stand, must know how desirable it is, even on public grounds, that something more than mere cold official confidence, something partaking of personal esteem and mutual attachment should subsist between those who fill them:—and if you will look through this bill you will discover, that, if this faithful servant and friend of the Lord-Lieutenant shall presume, in some hour of careless confidence, to advise him in the appointment of any ecclesiastical, nay even any lay, office or preferment in the Protestant Church of Ireland, the Secretary shall—(observe the cautious provisions against danger)—he shall, being convicted by due course of law, be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanour, and disqualified for ever from public service! And this is the bill which is to remove anomalies, to establish some perfect system of Government, some final and satisfactory arrangement, to bury in oblivion, in all time to come, religious animosities! Then, again, the Crown is to remain Protestant, but the adviser of the Crown may be Roman Catholic. You confirm in the bill the exclusion of the Roman Catholic from the Crown,—from that branch of the legislature from which he was most recently excluded by law,—from that high office from which he is excluded, not by the indirect operation of an oath, as is the case in other offices, but distinctly because he is a Roman Catholic. The irresponsible head of the executive government must be a Protestant, but his responsible Minister, his Secretary of State, may be a Roman Catholic. You expose the successor to the Crown to be educated under the guidance of Roman Catholic Ministers; and if he, from sincere conviction, shall conform to the religion of those whom you have given to him as confidential and responsible advisers, you subject him for ever to the forfeiture of his inheritance. In all this I can see nothing that can lead to harmony,—nothing that can constitute a final and satisfactory settlement—nothing but a wild and irreconcilable contradiction of principles. Sir, I will now conclude. I am grateful to the House for the attention with which they have heard me. Let me entreat them to pause before they take the first step towards a radical alteration in the Constitution of their country, and to reflect how difficult it is to predict the consequences of much less important alterations. It is observed, Sir, by Mr. Hume, when speaking of the reigns of James the First and his successor, that religious spirit, when it mingles with the spirit of faction, contains in it something supernatural; and that, in its operations upon society, effects correspond less to their known causes than in any other circumstance of Government. And this, says he, while it constitutes some apology for those who, having interfered in religious matters, are disappointed of the expected event, imposes at the same time a grievous responsibility on all who lightly innovate in so delicate an article. This reflection, says he, is confirmed by all history;—and may it be a warning to us how we proceed to unsettle that which we find established. Let us recollect, that, under the Constitution which we have derived from our ancestors, we have enjoyed more liberty, we have acquired more glory, we possess more character and power, than has hitherto fallen to the lot of any other country on the globe; and, if there be any man yet undecided on this question, I entreat him that he will give the benefit of his doubt to the existing order of things, and that, before he gives his vote to a measure, of the consequences of which he is at least uncertain, he will weigh the substantial blessings which he knows to have been derived from the Government that is, against all the speculative advantages which he is promised from the Government that is to be.

Lord Castlereagh rose to explain, but the cheers which followed the speech of the right hon. gentleman who had just sat down rendered it impossible to collect what the noble lord said.

Sir H. Parnell then rose, but the continuance of the cheers, and cries of question, prevented him from being heard.

General Mathew rose, and, as soon as order was restored, he observed, that he felt himself more particularly called upon to present himself to the House in consequence of the triumphant manner in which the right honourable gentleman had asked, whether any person there was authorized by the Pope to say, that his Holiness would consent to domestic intemperance? He (General M.) did not mean to state, that he was directly authorized by the Pope to say this (a laugh); but he had every reason to believe that there was a document in this country to that effect.

Mr. Canning said, it was not his intention to detain the House for many minutes from that vote which was so loudly and generally called for. He could not, however, give a silent vote on this important question, without declaring what he had uniformly thought of it; and he was the more anxious to do this after the very able speech of the right hon. gent.—a speech which appeared to comprise every argument on that side of the question, in the most luminous point of view in which the subject was capable of being treated. The result, however, of his reasonings appeared to be only this—that we were in a state of extreme difficulty. The practical question for the House to decide was—whether, by going as far as we could consistently go, we could purchase the removal of those inconveniences which now existed, without hazard to our establishment? If he thought that any danger could be introduced, for which actual securities were not provided, he should agree with the right hon. gentleman, that we ought to pause where we are; but, being in his conscience satisfied, that we might go safely to the extent of the measure now proposed, he should certainly give his support to this motion. The bill of 1813 was rejected on the first clause—namely, the admission of Catholics to Parliament; but he believed that the members of that body might be safely admitted, and he hoped that, as soon as opportunity offered, the House would see among them professors of the Roman Catholic religion. Of those who must be chosen as representatives of the people there would be persons of property; and what evil could result from the admission into that House of such persons, who were only excluded by that faith which none of us called on them to forego? There might be persons of another character, who now seek to inflame the passions of the people merely for the mischief they could do; but to open to them the doors of the House of Commons would be to nullify those mischiefs. If the Catholics possessed considerable abilities, why should we deprive ourselves of such eminent advantages? The true extinction of the mischiefs which the exercise of such acquirements was now calculated to produce, would be found in their admission to that House; there they would be met by equal ability, and the friends of the Constitution would be able to cope with them. If the fact really was, (from what causes arising he would not discuss,) that we had a perpetual spring of contention in Ireland, there was every probability that the discontent would be allayed, by consenting to do whatever we could to satisfy reasonable claims. He was not deterred by the apprehension that we could not do all: we must do what we could, not with a view to theoretical perfection, but for the sake of practical improvement. He knew not how we were beforehand to obtain the assurance, that whatever we might do would be satisfactorily received; and as to expecting complete satisfaction, tell not him what the Catholics would accept; for whether we were with more or less of gratitude, Parliament would grant the boon with its own conditions, and it was not for any isolated persons to object to it. We ought not to be deterred, from a feeling of what might be approved by a part of the people, which, if it were good at all, must be good for the whole. (Hear.) Whether the Roman Catholic prelates of Ireland should be nominated in one way or other, could not be matter of previous negotiation. He confessed, that if he thought the great object of conciliation ought to be accomplished, he cared not on which side the advance began ; whether it were the submission of the Catholics to Parliament in the first instance, or the benevolence of the Catholics which excited the gratitude of the Catholics : he cared not from what point the circle began to be drawn. Satisfied he was that, by adopting the present proposition, much would be done to quiet the irritation of the people of Ireland, and to take away from those who wished to do mischief the means of doing it. It was in this view, therefore, that he was anxious they should go into a committee. He was not, he repeated, deterred by the objection that there might be differences of opinion. True it was that, in 1813, when the matter failed, it was received with much discontent ; but it was lost by a majority of only four, in one of the fullest Houses ever remembered. It had then given way on a single point ; but he was not quite sure, after the experience of that failure, that if he could not obtain all, it would be wise, on another occasion, to throw away all. (Hear, hear.) But if this failure had produced discontent, it had been also received with approbation ; and where was it received with discontent, and where with approbation ? With approbation at Rome, and discontent in Ireland. At Rome they thought it was carried ; in Ireland they knew it had failed. The continuance of his belief was, that, in spite of the impossibility of arriving at perfection, it was their duty to go as far as they could ; and, therefore, he should expect the House to go into a committee, without being deterred by the apprehension of not being able to devise any thing more perfect. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Grattan rose amidst loud and repeated cries of question. He would now beg leave to avail himself, late as the hour was, and impatient as the House appeared to be, of the right which he had reserved to himself of replying to the principal arguments which had been urged against the appointment of a committee. And first, with regard to security, you may (said the right hon. gentleman) command your own securities. You can command the security of domestic nomination, and demand a check on the Papal power. As to the expectation of giving complete satisfaction to every person, you are to legislate upon the principle of serving the country, without accommodating any particular set of men. If the idea of this House is to serve, depend upon it you will ultimately satisfy. (Hear, hear, hear.) He did not know how it could be maintained, that this was a Protestant Constitution. Originally the Constitution was Catholic : it was formed by Catholics ; all the best laws to which the people owed their rights and liberties were the work of Catholics. The Bill of Rights itself was merely a declaratory law of the privileges obtained by Catholic ancestors ; and, therefore, we could not contend that it was not a Catholic Constitution. The Commons formed the third estate in the realm ; but they were chosen by Catholic as well as by Protestant electors. An hon. member had said, that, at the time of the Revolution, the exclusion of the Catholics was a fundamental principle of the Constitution. But the disabilities of which the Catholics complained were not imposed till after that period. Some of them were enacted in the latter part of William's reign, and others in the reign of Anne. Now, what sort of an experiment was this ? It was an experiment to uphold one religion by inflicting pains and penalties on the professors of another. But, if we looked a little farther, we should find, that the oath afterwards administered was not an oath against the Catholic religion, but against the temporal power of the Pope. In order to shew that he did not mistake the fact, the right hon. gentleman read the preamble of the act of Parliament in which this principle is recognised. In 1793, the British Parliament expressly declared, that the oath of the Catholics was not intended as a fundamental oath, but was only meant to operate against those who paid obedience to the temporal power of the Pope—that it was, in fact, a dogma—and that the oath of allegiance had been substituted in its place. It appeared, by a passage in the journals of the House of Lords, that a motion for a committee to consider whether this oath was fundamental or not, was negatived by a great majority. Here, then, was the opinion of the House of Lords, and of our own Parliament, against the fundamentality of the oath ; and could we now say to Ireland, the Revolution is in your face—we cannot get over the fundamental oath ? He must infer from all this, that the Protestants could not prescribe for an exclusive title to the Constitution. The common law gave capacities to the Catholics in common with other subjects ; Parliament, indeed, had limited those capacities, but religion afforded no fair ground for such measures. Religion, as far as it consisted of the sentiment, and opinions of an individual, Parliament could not limit ; it was an interference between God and man ; he affirmed, therefore, that religion ought not to disqualify any man from sitting in Parliament. It was true, that religion might be so connected with other subjects as to afford some ground for exclusion from offices of State, as where it might be the means of filling those offices with persons in subjection to a foreign Power. It was objectionable that ecclesiastical dignitaries here should be nominated by a foreign State ; and on that ground the veto had been offered ; but in the present instance that right was no longer claimed, and domestic nomination was proposed as a security. The argument had ceased with the right, and yet we were urged to reject a security for our Church and State, in order to continue our monopoly of power. Still less was any argument to be grounded on the monstrous crimes imputed to the Catholic religion. The most respectable authorities had disclaimed the doctrine, that no faith was to be kept with heretics ; and as to moral atrocity, the reasoning went to this—that the religion of Christendom is an abomination. Why, then, did we continue to tolerate it? We must either give up our argument or our religion—or say, that the Christian religion exists only in England, Scotland, Sweden, and part of the North of Ireland. With regard to any peculiar disaffection to the reigning family, it was absurd to suppose that a belief in transubstantiation must necessarily produce disloyalty to the House of Brunswick. In 1791, the Irish Parliament put arms into the hands of the Catholics, and he would shew, from an act passed in that year, that the principle of admitting them to civil and military office, had been expressly recognized by the Legislature. He then read a clause, which declared, that “it should be lawful for Papists to enjoy all civil and military offices.” Here was a direct contradiction to those who pretended that it was contrary to the principles of our Constitution to admit Catholics to political power. The law that gave them the right of voting at elections, was a farther proof that their loyalty had been trusted. What right then was there to limit the capacities of the Roman Catholic? The power, indeed, he acknowledged, but not the right. He maintained, that a religious belief was no proper disqualification of a man for holding civil offices. The seven sacraments were no disqualification: transubstantiation was no disqualification. He would appeal to our generals and admirals: they would not impeach the loyalty of the Catholics, who had shed their blood in defence of that very Constitution which, it was now said, they meant to undermine. What if an individual had revived the order of Jesuits? Because the Pope thought fit to revive the Jesuits, would they say that Lord Fingal should be attainted? No: and yet the argument of hon. gentlemen went farther, and would in fact punish the whole body of Catholics for the crimes, real or supposed, of one man. The history of Ireland had been appealed to, as furnishing strong arguments in favour of the opponents of this question. What was that history? Generally, it was the tale of an unhappy province, ill-governed, and cruelly mismanaged. If gentlemen would go back into the history of Ireland, let them not go back to a period, when the oppressions of England made Ireland retaliate: let them rather look back to the last forty years. Instead of pointing out—here such a man committed a murder, let them look at our battles, and say, “here such a man fought nobly in defence of his country: here such a regiment stood forward to maintain the British Constitution.”

Without a sign his sword the brave man draws.
And asks no omen but his country's cause.

Gentlemen should be consistent: they affected to think it part of their religion to love their enemies; but to love their friends they found too bitter a task. They were asked in the present case not to look upon their enemies as friends; but only not to consider their friends as enemies. They might depend upon it, that if they repudiated the Catholics without sufficient cause, they would be guilty of a crime; and they would soon see whether this policy did not go to the destruction, not merely of the Catholic religion, but of the Protestant also. Some had been pleased to prophesy about consequences, for the purpose of perpetuating disqualifications on their fellow subjects. (Noise and coughing.) “I know (said the right hon. gentleman) I have tired the House, and can easily imagine, that if I were in the place of some of the gentlemen opposite, I should be quite as impatient as they are: but I have some little claim to their slight indulgence in my reply. Hear, hear.”) I remember the observations of Mr. Fox on the arguments concerning the dangers of admitting a few Catholic members into the Legislature. Here is the very same case again. It is a mere arithmetical proposition. Could a few Catholic members overturn the Constitution? It would be highly absurd to say that they could do so, even if they desired it. The theological arguments are equally unavailing. The landed property in Ireland is almost all in the hands of the Protestants. It has been argued strangely, that the 100 members returned for Ireland might be Catholics. But could they even then control more than 500 members for Great Britain? And yet they are, it appears, to outvote both them and the House of Lords! and then they are to depose the King! But do you think it fair and honest, on such mathematics or arithmetic, to say that you will disqualify four millions of your fellow-subjects? This great question has been 39 years under discussion. The poison which a wrong system has spread, and the dangers of it, have increased. Will any gentleman say, that the Protestants, or the English Irish, are now only a settlement, or a sort of colony, to be defended by a large army, which must be paid by the people over whom it is placed. After so many years' possession of the Parliament, of the power of making the laws, of the power of government, can the Protestants in Ireland be only a settlement now? What then have they and you been doing all this long time? Perhaps you have been doing little or nothing but giving sentiments and toasts in honour of “a glorious memory,” and drinking “success to his Majesty's arms by land and sea.” Is that what you propose to continue? Do not suppose that you can set up claims on the score of religion to trample on your countrymen. Do not say, after your long possession, and many opportunities, that you cannot appease troubles and discontents, when you have taken away liberties and privileges. Do not tell men whom you have robbed of their liberty—whom you have disqualified by your legislation, and taxed in every shape of human endurance, that the fault is theirs, and not among their rulers. You are taught by God to love your enemy, but here you will not embrace your friend. Such a system cannot last; depend upon it, it cannot. If you continue to exclude the people from the State, they will attach themselves to that ancient connection of which you are so alarmed. The Catholic body have now no communion with the State; they are morbid and excluded; and, on the other hand, the State is alive and vivacious. Then let a new order of things mark the times in which we live, and let an immediate termination be put to clandestine intercourse between them and the See of Rome. Do not let us be deluded by your folly and your absurdity, nor let us be led to identify the Constitution of England with your political malversation of it. It is glorious, says a great orator of former times, for a man to endear himself to his country; to perform noble services for her; to be the object of her praise, her veneration, and her love: but it is odious, detestable, weak, and momentary, to be the object of her fear and hatred. Act wisely, liberally, and rationally, and your measures of redress must be attended with the most beneficial results. You may have, on some points, a popular outcry to endure, but that outcry must ever be transient when it is raised against the true interests of the country. When I see Britain at the head of nations—when I contemplate her greatness, and the majesty of her empire, I am deeply astonished to see that majesty bending itself down into a contest with a set of puny theologians and angry bigots. Let me implore you, then, to put an end to these discussions, to stand before the eyes of Europe in the high and distinguished character to which you are entitled, and to secure the independence and love of the nation, by admitting Roman Catholics to the freedom of the Constitution, and the rights and privileges of British subjects.

The question was again loudly called for, and the House then divided—

Monday, May 12.

CATHOLIC CLAIMS.] Earl Fitzwilliam presented a petition from certain Catholics of Warwickshire and Staffordshire, referring to a bill which they supposed to be before Parliament respecting the veto, and praying that the privileges they now enjoyed might not be abridged. His lordship stated, that the Catholics of the counties from whence the petition came, were divided in opinion upon the subject to which it referred.

Lord Kenyon moved, that the petition and signatures be printed, in order that the House might know what it was the Catholics desired.

Earl Grey regretted that the petition had been sent up, as it could answer no useful purpose. He had hitherto had the honour of being entrusted with the petitions of the general body of the English Catholics, and at a recent meeting they had passed a resolution signifying their determination not to petition in the present session, but content themselves with referring to the petition last presented. With respect to the petition now presented, it referred to a supposed bill with regard to the veto. Where the petitioners obtained information of any such bill, he knew not; certainly no such measure was coming from the Commons, nor did his noble friend, who had given a notice on the Catholic question, intend to submit to their lordships any such measure. He (Lord Grey) had undoubtedly, on a former occasion, held opinions favourable to the veto, conceiving it at that time to be a measure promising many advantages. Those opinions, however, were changed, and the veto now appeared to him to be most objectionable. It was for the Legislature to enact what in its wisdom seemed meet with regard to the Catholics, and no idea was attempted to be held out by the latter, that they were not ready to submit to whatever provisions it might be deemed expedient to enact.

The Lord Chancellor believed there was no instance in which the House had ordered a petition to be printed, and therefore their lordships would pause before they introduced a new practice into their proceedings. The petition might be referred to by every noble lord, and undoubtedly the question to which it related, was of the utmost importance, affecting as it did the very vitals of the Constitution.

The Earl of Donoughmore observed, that his noble friend (Earl Grey) had fully explained his (Lord D.'s) sentiments and intentions: he had no intention of introducing any measure respecting the veto. The petition of the general body of the Catholics of Ireland, which he had had the honour to present, humbly made a voluntary offer of domestic nomination as a species of security which would satisfy the Protestant Establishment; but the idea of making terms, or proposing conditions, was altogether foreign to their intentions. It was, as his noble friend had observed, for the Legislature to enact, and for the Catholics to submit to its enactments. He could not, however, help lamenting that the noble and learned lord should, by anticipation, have so completely condemned the Catholic claims.

Lord Kenyon was not aware that it was contrary to the practice of the House to print petitions, but being so, he begged to withdraw his motion.

Lord Holland did not mean to oppose the withdrawing the motion, but had it been put he should have felt it his duty to vote against it, not on the ground of form, which appeared to him doubtful, but because it would be invidious to select this petition in particular, from a portion of the Catholic body, for the purpose of giving publicity to it. He was somewhat astonished at the warmth manifested by the noble and learned lord (he did not mean ill-humour, for the noble and learned lord always preserved in a remarkable degree his good-humour), in stating the question regarding the Catholics to affect the vitals of the Constitution. He could only account for this warmth by supposing that the noble and learned lord was engaged in a continual contest with his colleagues in council, who thought that this measure would be highly advantageous to the best interests of the country.

The motion for printing the petition was withdrawn, and the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

LORD SIDMOUTH'S CIRCULAR.] The order of the day having been read, Earl Grey rose and spoke as follows:—

My Lords,

I have felt considerable hesitation and reluctance in bringing forward for discussion the question on which your lordships have been summoned to attend this night; not because it is not of great importance, or that it does not claim from your lordships the most serious attention, but because it is, in my hands, exposed to difficulties, which I feel myself ill qualified to encounter. It is, in the first place, a legal question, to which I, unlearned as I am, can little hope to do justice, considering the legal ability and experience, which, I have too much reason to fear, will be arrayed against me. It is, in the second place, a constitutional question; and though, in this view, it is of the utmost importance to the freedom of the press, and the liberty of the people, I have had but too many proofs, that this character alone is sufficient to deprive it of all interest, if not to expose it, when brought forward by me, to the suspicion and disfavour of those, to whom my arguments must this night be addressed. In this respect, as it appears to me, a lamentable change has taken place in the feelings of this and the other House of Parliament. Our affections are now all on the side of prerogative; our fears, of popular rights and privileges. It is no longer the encroachments of power of which we are jealous, but of the too great extension of freedom. Every symptom of popular uneasiness, every ill-regulated effort of that spirit, without which liberty cannot exist, but which, whilst it exists, will break out into occasional excess, affords a pretence, which we seem emulous to seize, for imposing on it new restraints; whilst all the increased advantages of the Crown, in the extension of our military establishments, in the augmentation of our revenue, and in the patronage and influence annexed to its collection, seem to pass unnoticed, in our anxiety to support and strengthen the executive government, whenever called upon to do so, by new and extraordinary powers. Feeling the effects of this change, it is for this, amongst other reasons, that I have resolved, upon this occasion, not to offer to the House any distinct proposition with respect to the important matter which I am about to bring under your consideration; fearing, that, if I were to do so, I should only give occasion for an adverse decision, and thereby injure those interests, which I am anxious to uphold and to protect. I shall therefore, this night, content myself with moving for the case laid before the Law Officers of the Crown by the Secretary of State, upon which their opinion has been given, as to the powers of Justices of the Peace to hold to bail, or commit to prison for want of bail, any persons accused of publishing blasphemous and seditious libels. We shall, by this course, have the advantage of not coming to a premature decision on a subject of such vital importance; and an opportunity will be afforded of examining it carefully in all its bearings. I cannot conceive what reasonable objection can be urged against producing the information which I require. It is of the greatest consequence that we should be possessed of it, to see on what precise grounds the opinion was given; whether it was applicable to the case; and whether the purpose of the noble Secretary of State was fairly brought under the consideration of the Law officers of the Crown. My motion, then, will be simply for the production of the case; but I shall take the opportunity, which this motion affords me, of supporting it by such general observations on the whole subject, as, I trust, will prove to your lordships, how deserving it is of your most serious attention. The Circular Letter of the noble Secretary of State, addressed to the Lords Lieutenants of counties in England and Wales (whether properly addressed to the lords lieutenants of counties, where the object was to communicate with the magistrates, I will not now inquire), is before the House. (See the end of this debate.) The letter states, that the dangerous and extensive circulation of blasphemous and seditious libels had induced the Secretary of State to consult the Law Officers of the Crown, as to the power of bringing before a justice of the peace, and compelling to answer for his conduct, any person found selling, or in any way publishing such pamphlets and writings; that the Law Officers had answered, that a justice of peace might issue his warrant to apprehend a person charged upon oath with the publication of such libels, and compel him to give bail; and the lord lieutenant is then desired to make known to the chairman at the next quarter sessions, the substance of this communication, "in order that he may recommend it to the magistrates to act upon it in all cases, where any person shall be found offending against the law in the manner above-mentioned." The character, then, of this extraordinary letter—for extraordinary I must call it, as there is no precedent, that I ever heard of, for such a proceeding—is this; that, having consulted the Law Officers of the Crown, the Secretary of State has, upon the ground of their opinion, taken upon him to instruct the magistrates in their judicial duty.—The dangerous consequences of such a precedent I shall hereafter endeavour to point out. The letter states, that the opinion related to blasphemous and seditious libels. In the opinion I do not find the word blasphemous, but I admit, nay I shall have to contend, that not only blasphemous, but all other libels, of every description, must, if the opinion be correct in principle, necessarily come under it. The letter refers only to the powers of justices of the peace. The opinion relates also to the powers of the Judges and of the Secretary of State; and it is of great importance to have the case produced, in order to see whether the noble Secretary of State had intended to instruct, not only Justices of the Peace, but also the Judges in Westminster Hall, in their judicial duties. The opinion first affirms generally the power of the Secretary of State, of the Judges, and of Justices of Peace, to apprehend persons charged with publishing a libel. It then states separately, with respect to each, the grounds on which the existence of such a power is asserted. As to the power of the Secretary of State to apprehend in cases of treasonable and seditious libel, I must admit it now to have acquired the force of law. Whether it was or was not originally an usurpation, it is unnecessary now to inquire. It has been sanctioned by the decisions of the Courts, and therefore I feel it can no longer be disputed. The opinion next states, that it appears that Judges have such a power, at all events under the 48th of the King, cap. 58. Now, with all due deference to these learned persons, I must say, that this part of the opinion seems to me to have been somewhat inaccurately and carelessly expressed. The act of the 48th of the King gives no such power to the Judges generally, but only to the Judges of the Court of King's Bench; and in this construction I am fortified by a late proceeding in the Old Bailey before two Judges, not Judges of the Court of King's Bench, who evidently doubted, at the least, their powers in this respect; though in that case the information was soon after filed, and the question was not farther agitated. The act, then, does not apply to the Judges generally, but only to those of the Court of King's Bench, and the words of the opinion, "It appears to us, that, at all events under the statute 48 Geo. III., cap. 58, a Judge has such power," imply a strong doubt whether a Judge had any such power before that statute. These learned persons then go on to state, that a Judge "would probably expect, that it should appear that the Attorney-General intended to file an information against the person charged." They seem to have conceived, that a person so charged might, under the act of the 48th of the King, be committed before information filed. I doubt whether that be the true construction. I was not in the House when the bill was in its progress; but I understood, from those who were present, that the interpretation given to it, in the discussion, was, that it was only intended to confer the power of committing, after an information had been actually filed. These learned persons appear to think differently; but they say, that a Judge would require some evidence of the intention of the Attorney-General to file an information against the person charged. I do not very clearly see what evidence the Judge could have of such intention. Is the Attorney-General himself to prove, by his oath or affidavit, that such was his intention; or is some one else to give evidence of an intention, which could be certainly known only to the person who entertained it? This appears to shew, that the learned persons, who have given this opinion, have not rightly construed the act, and that the opinion is, in this respect also, erroneous. But leaving this minor point, which hardly deserved so much notice, I now come to the principal question, in which every subject of these kingdoms is indeed most deeply interested —the question, whether any Justice of the Peace may be called upon, by any common informer, to decide at once what is or is not a libel (one of the most difficult questions, in many instances, that can possibly come under consideration;) and, upon his sole judgment and authority, commit or hold to bail the person accused. The opinion states, that the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, in Wilkes's case, only amounted to this—that libel is not such an actual breach of the peace as to deprive a member of Parliament of the privilege of Parliament; and then these learned persons proceed, on the authority of two modern instances, to say, that all Justices of Peace have the power of issuing warrants to apprehend persons charged by information on oath with publishing scandalous and seditious libels, and to compel them to give bail to answer such a charge. In the first paragraph of the opinion, this power is not confined to blasphemous and seditious libels, but extends to all libels generally; and this undoubtedly is correct: for if magistrates possess this power with respect to one description of libel, they must have it over all, whether public or private, malicious or treasonable; and not only over all cases of libel whatsoever, but over every species of minor offence, which comes within their jurisdiction at the sessions. I now state this generally, as a consequence which, I shall hereafter have to argue, must follow of necessity from the opinion of the Attorney and Solicitor-General. I can, my lords, conceive nothing more dangerous than the assumption of such an authority; nothing more contrary to the whole spirit of our laws and Constitution. In examining this question, where are we to look for the proof, that such a power is or ever has been possessed by Justices of the Peace? The proof must be found either in the common law, in some express statute, in decisions of the Judges, in the writings of lawyers, or in ancient practice. In one or in all of these authorities the proof of this power, said to be possessed by the magistrates, must, if it do exist, be found: and, if it is not to be found in any of these, it will not be denied to me, that it cannot be the law of the land. In considering this subject, I shall have no trespass for some time on the patience of your lordships, in order to state what has been the result of my inquiries, in the course of which I have been able to find no foundation for the opinion in question. In the common law I have not discovered any thing that tended to support it. There is no statute which sanctions it; for, if any such statute had existed, the Law Officers of the Crown would doubtless have referred to that statute in support of their opinion. In looking into the most approved writers on the law, as well as the opinions delivered on particular occasions by judges, I have met with nothing to warrant the conclusion, that the power now attributed to Justices of Peace is legal. Whether considered separately or collectively, I have no difficulty in declaring, that all the great authorities will be found to preponderate against the existence of such a power. But before I proceed to examine these authorities I should wish to draw your lordships' attention to the commission of the Justices. That commission, which was settled by the Judges in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, consists, as your lordships well know, of two clauses: the first gives them the power "to keep and cause to be kept all statutes and ordinances for the good of the peace, &c.; to chastise and punish all persons that offend against the form of these ordinances and statutes; and to cause to come before them, or any of them, all those who have used threats, &c., to find sufficient security for the peace or their good behaviour; and, if they shall refuse such security, them in the king's prisons to cause to be safely kept." The first clause, then, describes the power of the Justices out of sessions, as Conservators of the Peace. The second clause relates exclusively to the jurisdiction of the Justices at the sessions of the peace. "We have also assigned you, and every two or more of you, to inquire the truth more fully, by the oath of good and lawful men, of all manner of felonies, poisonings, enchantments, sorceries, arts magic, trespasses, forestallings, regratings, ingrossings, and extortions whatsoever; and of all and singular other crimes and offences, of which the Justices of our Peace may or ought lawfully to inquire—to inspect all indictments, &c.—and to make and continue processes thereupon; and to hear and determine all and singular the felonies, trespasses, &c., according to the laws and statutes of England." This second clause it is material to keep in our view, as it is on the jurisdiction which it gives, that this power, as necessarily consequent upon that jurisdiction, must be maintained. It relates, as I have already stated, solely to the duties of magistrates in sessions. It is clear, then, that the first clause, which confers the power of arrest and commitment only in cases of actual breach of the peace, does not give it in cases of libel, or of any inferior offence. It is equally clear, that no such previous authority to compel an appearance at the sessions, is conferred by the second clause, which relates exclusively to the jurisdiction of the Justices there, which it requires the presence of two or more Justices to exercise. It is not to be found, then, in the letter of the commission. Does it come within its equity, by fair and necessary construction? This is the question which your lordships have to examine; and in this examination the first step is to consult the great authorities of the law, who have treated of this subject, and who, if such a power legally exists, could not have failed to notice it in such clear and distinct terms, as would leave it subject to no dispute or doubt. Lord Coke, so far from acknowledging the existence of such a power, denies the right of a magistrate to commit, even in cases of felony and treason, before indictment; a power which he held to be contrary to Magna Charta. His words are as follow:—"But for the Justices of the Peace to make warrant, upon surmises, for breaking the houses of any subjects, to search for felons or stolen goods, is against Magna Charta: 'Nec super cum ibimus nec super cum mittemus nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ;' and against the statute of the 42d Edw. III. &c.: and we hold the resolution of the court, viz. of Brudenell, Pollard, Broke, and Fitzherbert, in 14 Hen. VIII. to be law, that a Justice of Peace could not make a warrant to take a man for felony, unless he be indicted thereof; and that must be done in open session of the peace." (4 Inst. 177, 8.) If, then, such a person as Lord Coke denied the existence of this authority, even in cases where the peace and good order of the country were involved, how can it be supposed, that the ancient law of the country authorized magistrates to hold to bail for lesser offences? I admit, that, under the general word trespass, as it has been interpreted, libel, with other offences of a similar description, as tending to a breach of the peace, is cognizable by Justices of the Peace at their sessions; but still, the utmost latitude of construction gives this authority to magistrates only in their sessions; and before your lordships can decide in favour of the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, you will require clear proof, that libel, by becoming an offence cognizable in sessions, is also subject to the power of a single magistrate out of sessions. The next opinion I shall notice is that of Mr. Sergeant Hawkins. That learned author has stated, (Pleas of the Crown, b. ii. p. 84.) that "any Justice of the Peace may commit in cases of treason, felony, or præsumpture, or any other offence against the peace. Also wherever a statute gives to any one justice a jurisdiction over any offence, or a power to require a person to do a certain thing ordained by such a statute, it impliedly gives a power to every such justice to make out a warrant to bring before him any person accused of such offence, or compellable to do the thing ordained by such statute." He proceeds to state, that, "anciently, no one justice ever could make out a warrant for an offence cognizable by a sessions of two or more justices. Constant and universal practice appears to have altered the law in this particular: the practice of justices is now also become law, in granting a warrant for the apprehension of any person, upon strong grounds of suspicion, for a felony, or other misdemeanour, before indictment found. Yet as Justices of the Peace claim this power rather by connivance than any express warrant of law, and since the undue execution of it may prove highly prejudicial to the reputation as well as the liberty of the party, a Justice of Peace cannot well be too tender in his proceedings of this kind," &c. The opinion, then, of Mr. Sergeant Hawkins, your lordships will observe, is of this character: it is clear as to the power of justices to apprehend and commit for treason, felony, or præmunire, or any other offence against the peace: it is also clear as to the power of a single justice with respect to offences over which a jurisdiction is given him by statute. But is there any thing to sanction the possession of such a power as to other offences? If this should be inferred from the words subsequently quoted, that one justice might make out a warrant for offences cognizable by a session of two or more justices, or for apprehending any person "for a felony or other misdemeanour," I must contend, that these words cannot fairly bear such an interpretation. That they must, in the first place, be understood in reference to the offences of which the author was treating, and these are expressly stated to be treason, felony, or præmunire, or any other offence against the peace: this, therefore, must be considered as the description of misdemeanour which Hawkins had here in contemplation. That, in the second place, he expressly founds this power, which he states to have acquired by an alteration of the law, on ancient and universal practice. It rests upon practice and convenience. This practice, with respect to treason, felony, and actual breaches of the peace, is admitted; but where can it be shewn with respect to other misdemeanours and offences, not breaches of the peace, but only having a tendency to that effect? Had there been any such constant and universal practice in cases of libel at the time that Hawkins wrote? If there had, it is impossible that he should have failed to notice it in clear and precise terms. Your lordships have then the opinion, the clear and distinct opinion of this able writer, as to treason, felony, and breach of the peace: and if any doubt should arise as to the sense in which he has used the word misdemeanour, that doubt is cleared up by the context, by reference to the description of offences of which he was treating, and by the practice, which he states to have been constant and universal. The next authority to which I shall refer is that of Lord Chief Justice Hale; and here I am aware of a proposition laid down by that great lawyer, which at first sight may appear to militate against the view which I have taken of this question. That learned authority has stated, (Pleas of the Crown, vol. i. p. 579.) that "Justices of the Peace may also issue their warrants, within the precincts of their commission, for apprehending persons charged with crimes within the cognizance of the sessions of the peace, and bind them over to appear at the sessions, and this though the party be not yet indicted; and therefore the opinion of my Lord Coke is too strait-laced in this case; and, if it should be received, would obstruct the peace and good order of the kingdom." This opinion, at the first view, to state, that for all offences, so cognizable, a warrant might be issued before indictment; but is afterwards explained, and the nature of the offences, to which this passage refers, made evident, by the remark that follows on the opinion of Lord Coke, which, it states, was too strait-laced, in this case, as to the authority of magistrates. What was the case on which Coke gave his opinion? The case of felony only. Lord Chief Justice Hale must, therefore, be taken as controverting here that passage in Coke, in which it is laid down, that magistrates could not convict in cases of felony before indictment. This is farther evident from the subject under discussion, which was "concerning felonies." Your lordships will admit, that, in construing an opinion, it must in fairness be considered with reference to the subject of discussion. Now what is the subject of which Chief Justice Hale is treating? It is the power of justices to commit for felonies. The title of the chapter is "Concerning felonies by the common law, relating to the bringing felons to justice, and the impediments thereof, as escape, breach of prison, and rescue; and first touching arrests." I therefore think it impossible fairly to collect from this passage the opinion which some, I understand, are disposed to infer from it. But it is farther explained by what Lord Hale says in the second volume of his work, where, (p. 108.) speaking of the power to issue warrants, and arrest persons not indicted, he observes, that there had been doubt, whether that power was not contrary to Magna Charta. "A Justice of Peace," says Lord Hale, "hath the power to issue a warrant to apprehend a person accused of felony, though not yet indicted." He then states, (p. 109.) the doubt that had arisen on the statutes of Magna Charta, the 25th Edw. III. cap. 4, 28th Edw. III. cap. 3, and the 42d Edw. III. cap. 3. "The question upon these statutes," he proceeds to say, "is, what is the law of the land? It is clear, if a felony were committed or suspected, a man may be arrested by the party that know, or upon probable grounds suspects him as the felon, or by a constable upon complaint, or hue and cry. Let a man look upon all the acts of Parliament that have been down to this day, he shall find, that the power of Justices of Peace to convene and commit felons before indictment is allowed." He then cites a variety of statutes, by which it appears that justices may commit for felony, yea, or for suspicion of felony; so that the imprisonment before indictment is surely lawful, and not within the restraint of Magna Charta; and, if so, then surely, the arrest is much more lawful."—He may also issue a warrant on suspicion of felony, though the original suspicion be not in himself."—"A Justice of Peace may make a warrant as well in case of felony as of the peace, to bring the party before himself,"—"or before any of his Majesty's Justices of Peace,"—"or before himself and any of his Majesty's Justices of Peace." In all these passages Lord Hale expressly limits what he says of felony, or suspicion of felony, or breach of the peace. In cases of that description, his opinion, as opposed to that of Lord Coke, is clear; but where do we find the same distinct expression of an opinion with respect to this power of arrest and commitment, before indictment found, for misdemeanours or other inferior offences, not being actual breaches of the peace? I am sure your lordships will not infer from Lord Hale the existence of such a power because he seems incidentally to assert it by a casual or parenthetical expression, delivered in treating upon another subject; but you will expect, that the opinion should be clear, distinct, and precise, as it would have been, if such had been the acknowledged and established law when Lord Hale wrote. I feel myself, therefore, warranted to contend, interpreting a particular expression (which I hold to be the more legitimate rule of construction) by referring to the subject propounded for discussion, and by comparing it with the context, that no opinion of my Lord Hale, in favour of the power now contended for, is to be inferred from the passages that I have cited; but that, on the contrary, the authority of this eminent judge, when fairly considered, is, if I were to stop here, to be taken as preponderating in favour of the opinion which I am endeavouring to maintain. But if there should still remain a doubt in the mind of any of your lordships, whether Lord Hale meant to assert, that Justices of the Peace had generally a power to commit or hold to bail for all offences within their jurisdiction at the sessions, though not actual breaches of the peace, that doubt must be completely removed by a subsequent passage in the same great author, which I am now about to cite, and to which I request your particular attention. "Whether, generally, a Justice of Peace, out of sessions, can issue a warrant to apprehend persons offending against a penal law, though within their cognizance, and to bind them over to sessions, or, in default thereof, to commit them, and this before indictment found, seems doubtful. These things seem to make against it: First, Because some acts of Parliament do particularly and expressly authorize them to it, which they would not have done if it had been otherwise lawful. Secondly, Because, in most cases of this nature, though the party were indicted, or an information preferred, yet the captas was not the first process, but a venire facias and distringas; and, in cases of information, no process of outlawry at all (8 Hen. VI. 9 B.) until the statute of 21 Jas. I. cap. 4. gave process of outlawry in actions popular, as in actions of trespass vi et armis." (P. 112.) Here, then, the very question, which we are arguing, is stated; the question as to the power of justices out of sessions, over offences cognizable before them at their sessions; and upon this, does my Lord Hale give an opinion confirmatory of the inference which is drawn from the expression, which I have cited from the passage in which he is treating of felonies and breaches of the peace? Does it not, on the contrary, prove irrefragably, that, in the passage alluded to, on which, I am told, so much stress is to be laid, he not only did not, but could not mean to deliver any such opinion? The question is here raised, and, when raised, he states upon it not an opinion, but a doubt; and that doubt he supports by two very strong and cogent reasons, which it does not appear to me to be very easy to answer, and which he accordingly leaves unanswered. The opinion given by Chief Justice Hale, therefore, fairly considered, reduces itself to this—that, in some cases Justices of the Peace possessed the power of issuing warrants, and holding to bail before indictment; and that, in other cases, their right to exercise that authority was doubtful; but, when he comes to give any thing like a description of what offences he had in view, he appears expressly to limit the power of the Justices to cases of treason, felony, and breach of the peace. This is made completely clear by another passage, (p. 119.) the last that I shall cite from this great judge. "If a Justice of Peace have jurisdiction in the case (as he hath in all treasons, felonies, and breaches of the peace, yea though it be treason, so far forth as it is a breach of the peace) though he err in granting his warrant, it seems that the officers, who execute it, is excusable. I contend, therefore, that the authority of Lord Hale, fairly considered, weighs decisively against the opinion given by the law officers of the Crown; but, if my argument to this extent should not be admitted, it surely cannot be denied to me, that the most that can be inferred from the writings of Lord Hale with respect to this subject is, that he left the case in some degree of doubt; and, if there exists a doubt as to the law on so important a point, I am sure your lordships will not be disposed to lean to that interpretation of it, which is unfavourable to the rights of the subject. The next authority to which I have to call your lordships' attention is that of Mr. Justice Blackstone; the author, as your lordships know, of an elementary work upon the law of England; in that character entitled to the greatest praise, but not possessing the authority of those writers, who have treated more in detail, and with more accuracy, those questions of law, which come practically before the Courts. I say this by no means with a view to depreciate the merit of Mr. Justice Blackstone; that merit I shall always be one of the first to acknowledge; but to caution your lordships against giving too much weight to every particular expression, which, from the very nature of the work, it cannot be supposed that the author could have weighed with as much accuracy and caution, when he was merely giving the general principles as an introduction to a more extensive and accurate knowledge of the science of the law, as if he had been detailing precise rules, founded on precedents of acknowledged authority and decisions of the courts, for the regulations of its practice. Mr. Justice Blackstone says, (vol. iv. p. 290.) "A warrant may be granted in extraordinary cases by the Privy Council, or Secretary of State; but, ordinarily, by Justices of Peace. This they may do in any cases where they have jurisdiction over the offence, in order to compel the person accused to appear before them; for it would be absurd to give them power to examine an offender, unless they had power to compel him to attend and submit to such examination. And this extends, undoubtedly, to all treasons, felonies, and breaches of the peace: and also to all such offences as they have power to punish by statute. Sir E. Coke indeed hath laid it down, that a Justice of the Peace cannot issue "a warrant to apprehend a felon, upon bare suspicion; no, not even till an indictment be actually found; and the contrary practice" (observe, with respect to felons) "is held by others to be grounded rather upon connivance than the express warrant of law; though now, by long custom established. A doctrine which would in most cases give a loose to felons to escape with impunity, and therefore Sir M. Hale hath combated it with invincible authority and strength of reason, maintaining, first, that a Justice of Peace hath power to issue a warrant to apprehend a person accused of felony, though not yet indicted; and, secondly, that he may also issue a warrant to apprehend a person suspected of felony, though the original suspicion be not in himself, but in the party that prays his warrant; because he is a competent judge of the probability offered to him of such suspicion." It is observable, my lords, that the only clear and distinct opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Blackstone in this passage (the whole of which I have cited, that I may not be accused of keeping back any thing that is unfavourable to me) is, that this power of arrest and commitment, before indictment found, is vested in justices of the peace, with respect to "all treasons, felonies, and breaches of the peace, and also all such offences as they have power to punish by statute." This is what I had always understood to be the law upon this subject. Beyond the limits thus defined by Mr. Justice Blackstone I had never conceived the power of the Magistrates out of sessions to extend; and I never was more surprised than when I read, what appeared to me to be the novel doctrines, doctrines which I am convinced upon examination are equally novel and untenable, conveyed in the shape of an instruction to the magistrates, in the Circular of the Secretary of State. Every person of eminence in the profession of the law, with whom I conversed on the subject, expressed equal surprise. I remembered too the discussions, which took place in this House on the letter of the Secretary in Ireland, the proclamation, and the proceedings upon the Convention Act, in 1812. On that occasion, this very question was debated. I myself then maintained as law, what I still believe to be law, that the power of justices of the peace, out of sessions, or even of the judges of the Court of King's Bench, to commit or hold to bail, did not, unless given by special statute, extend beyond treason, felony, and breach of the peace.

I called upon the noble and learned lord on the woolsack to contradict me, if what I said was incorrect. He remained silent. It is not fit that I should refer to any thing that passed in private communications, which the urbanity of the noble lord permits even to his political opponents; but the impression left upon my mind by the result of that discussion was, that the law, as I then stated it, and as I now contend it to be, as it had not been, so it could not be disputed. A noble friend (Lord Holland) near me entered upon that occasion a protest, stating distinctly the same principle of law. A protest undoubtedly cannot be cited as expressing more than the opinions of the individuals who signed it. But it was the subject of some conversation and discussion amongst persons, who took different sides on the question to which it referred, and by none of them, though the correctness of its application might be denied, did I ever hear the soundness of its law disputed. I say, then, that the only opinion clearly announced in the passage, which I have quoted from Mr. Justice Blackstone, is, that justices of the peace may issue their warrants to apprehend, or to commit in default of bail, for treason, felony, breach of the peace, and such other offences as have been made specially liable to the exercise of such a power by statute. To this extent, says Mr. Justice Blackstone, their power undoubtedly goes: implying, thereby, that, in the words which preceded, he did not mean positively to affirm the existence of such a power beyond those limits. It is observable, too, that he interprets the passage of Lord Hale, to which I have already adverted, as applicable only to the opinion of my Lord Coke respecting felony. He does not extend it to misdemeanour, as he would unquestionably have done had he understood my Lord Hale as meaning to give to the opinion, which he asserted in opposition to Lord Coke, such an extension. And it is farther to be remarked, that the marginal note shews, that the introductory words to the more distinct opinion, which I have stated, are intended as a citation from Mr. Serjeant Hawkins. Now this is clearly a misapplication, or rather an undue extension of the authority of Hawkins on this point, which relates solely to the power of one justice, where a jurisdiction is given him by a particular statute. It affords, therefore, no foundation for the larger statement, which appears to have been somewhat incautiously made by Mr. Justice Blackstone, as to all offences coming within the jurisdiction of the Justices at their sessions; and he himself seems to have so little intended to convey a conclusive or decided opinion on this point, that he immediately adds, in speaking of this very power, that it extends undoubtedly to all treasons, felonies, and breaches of the peace, and other offences over which a jurisdiction is given by a particular statute; thereby, as I have already stated, clearly implying, that, beyond this extent, such a power could not be asserted undoubtedly to exist. Taking, therefore, into view the opinions of Hawkins, Chief Justice Hale, and Blackstone, and recollecting what had passed in that debate, it surely is not without reason, that I have been led to conclude, that Magistrates could not hold to bail in any case, less than an actual breach of the peace, in which the power was not given them by statute. In support of the conclusion, which I have thus drawn from the writings of these great authorities of the law, I would next call the attention of your Lordships to a case tried before Lord Chief Justice Holt,—the case of Roe, Kendal, and others (7th Wm. III. Modern Reports, vol. v. p. 80.) They had been committed by the Secretary of State, for assisting Sir E. Montgomery, who was in custody for treason, to escape. Their offence, therefore, by the law of England, was treason; yet it was objected, that, even in that case, the Secretary of State had no power to commit. Holt, C. J. “Why should not a Secretary of State have power by law to make commitments? Pray what authority has a Justice of Peace to commit in cases of high treason? It is not given him by any statute; and truly I cannot tell from whence he derives such an authority, unless it be by virtue of the old common law, which doth authorize conservators of the peace to commit in such cases. My Lord Coke doth seem to intimate, that a man could not be committed till he was indicted; but certainly that is a mistake, for the constant practice is otherwise.” Lord Holt then, my lords, appears in this case to have considered the power of a Justice of the peace to commit even for treason to be derived from the old common law, which gave it to conservators of the peace. It gave it to them as conservators of the peace, in cases of actual breach of the peace; and it is accordingly upon that principle, and under that construction of their commission, that the power of committing for treason is said to belong to them, by the writers on this subject. It is because the offence is against the peace, says Hawkins, upon the authority of Dalton and Lord Hale, that Justices have power to commit in cases of treason, as well as in premunire and misprision of treason. And “this opinion,” he adds, “seems to be agreeable to constant practice, especially since the statutes of the 1st and 2d Philip and Mary, cap. 13. and the 2d and 3d Philip and Mary, cap. 10.; which, directing Justices of Peace to proceed in this manner against persons brought before them for felony, seem to give them a discretionary power of proceeding against persons accused of the above-mentioned offences.” Here, then, we see, that this power of the Justices, recognized by the statutes of Philip and Mary as to felony, and as to felony only, is, in the opinion of the greatest writers on the law, extended by constant practice, to other crimes, which are considered as offences against the peace. It is upon this principle, that the power of commitment for treason was exercised at the common law by the conservators of the peace. It is upon this principle, that my Lord Holt says it must be considered as vested also in the Secretary of State. Taking, therefore, the authority of the conservators of the peace, confirmed, as Lord Holt says, by constant practice; to be the foundation of this power, we have to inquire, where the instance is to be found of the exercise of such a power by these ancient Magistrates in cases of trespass or misdemeanour, not being actual breaches of the peace? Or what proof there is of that constant practice, which, according to Lord Holt, proves Lord Coke's opinion, respecting the power of a Justice of Peace to commit for felony, before indictment found, to be a mistake? There is another case, in which the same excellent Judge delivered an opinion materially bearing upon this important question, to which I also beg to call your lordships' attention. It is the case of the Queen against Tracey (3d of Queen Anne. Modern Reports, vol. vi. p. 179.) Holt, C. J. “If one be taken by a process from sessions to the Sheriff, he must give bail bond, according to the statute of Henry VI.; and wherever one may be taken up by warrant of one Justice any one Justice may bail; formerly, indeed, none could be taken up for a misdemeanour until indictment found; but now the practice over all England is otherwise. And per Hale: ‘that practice is become a law, and Justices of Peace, eo ipso, may bind to the peace, and over to sessions, for every breach of peace, before indictment found.’” Here, then, we have the opinion of Lord Chief Justice Holt, expressed in a manner which can admit of no doubt: the misdemeanours, for which a Justice of the Peace may commit, are such offences as, according to the practice then established over all England, were subject to that power. With respect to what offences did that practice prevail? I answer, with respect to treason, felony, and breaches of the peace, and no other, except where the power was given by a special statute. The misdemeanours, then, here alluded to, were breaches of the peace; and to shew that this, and this only could be the meaning of Lord Holt, he proceeds to cite the authority of Hale in support of his opinion, and states, from that great authority, that “the practice,” which he states to be universal, “is become law, and Justices of Peace, eo ipso, may bind to the peace, and over to sessions, for every breach of peace, before indictment found.” Is it in the power of words to express any thing more clearly? and is it not thus demonstrated, first, that Lord Chief Justice Holt expressly confines the opinion here delivered to actual breaches of the peace; and, secondly, that, in citing Lord Hale, he understood the authority of that great Lawyer and Judge to confine the power of the Magistrates, with respect to offences for which they might commit before indictment found, expressly within the same limit. In another case, which came before the Court of King's Bench in the time of Chief Justice Parker, afterwards Lord

Macclesfield (10th Anne. Fortescue's Reports, p. 140. the Queen against Derby), I find, in the judgment delivered by that eminent person, a farther confirmation of the opinion, which I have been endeavouring to maintain. This, your lordships will recollect, is one of the cases referred to by the Law officers of the Crown as establishing the power of arrest and commitment for libel by the Secretary of State. In that view I do not mean to contest the inference that is drawn from it, though I shall have to contend, that it affords no precedent for the power now claimed for Justices of the Peace; but I cite it now to shew, with respect to this latter point, that the opinion of my Lord Macclesfield coincided with that of the other great authorities, which I have already examined. The defendant in this case had been committed for a libel by the Secretary of State. His counsel, in arguing the legality of the commitment, admitted the power of a Secretary of State to commit for treason and felony, that point having been decided in the case of Roe and Kendal, but they denied it as to libel; because this was no offence on which commitment might by law be till indictment or presentment. This argument of the counsel, my lords, seems at least to prove, that there could at that time have been no such acknowledged practice as is now insisted upon; and this seems farther confirmed by the answer of the counsel for the prosecution, who do not contend, generally, for the power of committing in cases of libel, but state, in reply to the objection, that a warrant was not a commitment, but only what was necessary to the examination of the person accused; and that he could not now take exception to the commitment, because he had entered into recognizance to appear. C. J. Parker. "The defendant cannot be discharged; the warrant is good and legal. Suppose there be an information to a Justice of Peace that one is a felon; may he not send a warrant to have him come before him? To have him examined is for the benefit of an innocent man," &c. The terms, my lords, in which this judgment is delivered, are remarkable: Lord Chief Justice Parker, asserting the legality of the warrant, says, may not a Justice of Peace send out his warrant—for what? for libel? No, but for felony. For offences of that description Lord Chief Justice Parker seems to have considered the power of a Justice of Peace as clear and indisputable; and attributes to the Secretary of State a similar power in cases of libel. But the inference would have been stronger, and there can be no doubt that he would so have applied it, if he had supposed that, by law, Justices of the Peace could issue their warrants for similar offences. There arises, therefore, in my mind, the strongest presumption, that Lord Chief Justice Parker, in asking whether Justices of Peace had not this power in cases of felony, could not have supposed them to possess it in cases of libel. I come now, my lords, to the celebrated case of Mr. Wilkes: a case heard and decided by one of the greatest Judges that ever sat upon the bench—a Judge eminent for learning, eminent for ability, eminent for the most unsullied integrity, but eminent, above all, for an affectionate and enlightened attachment to the constitution and liberties of his country, and his zealous and independent support of them at the bar, on the seat of judgment, and in the senate. Your lordships will at once point what I am now saying to the great and venerable name of Lord Camden. The case of Mr. Wilkes arose, as your lordships know, upon his commitment for a libel, by the Secretary of State. The general power of the Secretary of State to commit for libel was not questioned; it was at that time considered as established by the decisions of the Court in the cases of Derby and Earbury. But three objections were taken to the warrant. First, that evidence upon oath had not been taken. Secondly, that it was too general. Thirdly, that it was against the privilege of Parliament. The two first objections were over-ruled; but, upon the third, the discharge of Mr. Wilkes was ordered; and Lord Camden concludes his judgment with these remarkable words, which I have taken from Mr. Serjeant Wilson's report of that case. (Howell's State Trials, vol. xix. p. 990.) "We are all of opinion, that a libel is not a breach of the peace. It tends to the breach of the peace, and that is the utmost. 1 Lev. 139. But that which only tends to the breach of the peace cannot be a breach of it. Suppose a libel to be a breach of the peace, yet I think it cannot exclude privilege; because I cannot find that a libeller is bound to find surety of the peace, in any book whatever, nor ever was, in any case, except one, viz. the case of the seven bishops, where three judges said, that surety of the peace was required in the case of a libel. Judge Powell, the only honest man of the four judges, dissented; and I am bold to be of his opinion, and to say, that case is not law. But it shews the miserable condition of the State at that time. Upon the whole it is absurd to require surety of the peace or bail in the case of a libeller, and therefore Mr. Wilkes must be discharged from his imprisonment." The case of commitment by a justice for libel was not, as I have already stated, before the Court; but here, in delivering judgment, a principle is laid down by Lord Camden directly applicable to that case: and I ask of your lordships, whether it does not authorize me to add that venerable name to those of the greatest authorities of the law, whose opinions I have before cited, and to conclude, that, whether taken separately or collectively, they constitute as strong a body of authority as can be expected to be found in support of the position, which I now lay down as established by the examination, with which I fear I have tired your lordships' patience, that for misdemeanours, not being actual breaches of the peace, and for libel, as coming within that description of misde-meanour, justices of the peace, before indictment found, have no power to issue their warrant, to apprehend, or to commit. No distinct authority in favour of such a power is to be found in any of the text writers on the law: on the contrary, I contend, the result of what they have written on this subject, fairly considered, is directly against it. But if there were no such inference to be drawn, if the case rested merely on their silence respecting this point, I should argue, that this alone ought to induce your lordships to pause, at least, before you will recognize the existence of such a power. For surely, my lords, on a point so important to the freedom of the press, so intimately connected with the security and liberty of the people of this country, where the power contended for is necessarily so extensive in its operation, and so dangerous, as I shall shew hereafter, in its exercise, it is not to be supposed, that these great and learned persons, whether examining the principles of the law and of the Constitution, and applying them to practice by writings carefully meditated in their closets, or delivering their opinions upon them in the solemn execution of their judicial duties; it cannot, I say, be supposed, that if this power had been so clear as some contend, that they would not have noticed it, in distinct and unequivocal terms, and strictly defined its origin and its limits. I conclude, therefore, this part of my argument, in the words of Lord Camden, in his immortal judgment in the case of Entick against Carrington, "If it is law it will be found in our books; if it is not to be found there, it is not law." I have already stated generally, that if it be true that justices may grant their warrants in any cases where they have jurisdiction at the sessions, they may do it in all such cases; not only for libels of all descriptions, whether dangerous to the safety of the State, or merely injurious to the private reputation of individuals; but for every species of offence, which either comes within the letter, or, by allowed construction, within the equity of their commission; for forestallings, regratings, engrossings, and extortions, which are distinctly expressed, as well as for conspiracies, and other similar offences, which, under the received interpretation of the word trespass, are now admitted to be cognizable at the sessions. My lords, I ask, where the exercise of so extensive and, as I shall presently shew, so dangerous a power is to be found? Of the affirmative what proof have we? I have looked in vain for it. If it had been recognised in practice, surely some directions for its exercise would have been delivered to us. In Burn we have the manner in which the information shall be taken, and the warrant made out, for felony, under the Game Laws, and I believe in almost all the cases in which the ordinary exercise of that power has been established by law, or recognized in practice. In conspiracy and libel we have no such forms or directions given us; a strong presumption, at least, that, with respect to these and similar offences, there has been hitherto no such established practice, as must be proved, to give to the partial dicta of Lord Hale, and Hawkins, and Blackstone, if they are still to be maintained, the effect, which is contended for. But, my lords, if we have no proof of the affirmative of a proposition, which would give to the justices of peace so tremendous a power, have we none of the negative? To this I beg your lordships' particular attention; and, if I can shew that, with respect to any one of the offences, which are brought within the jurisdiction of the justices at their sessions, under the general word trespass, as tending to a breach of the peace, and which have been stated by the highest authorities in the law to stand precisely on the same footing, in this respect, with libels. If, I say, I can shew, with respect to any such offence, that the law denies this power to a justice of the peace out of sessions, before indictment found, then I contend the negative of the proposition, which I am combating, is clearly established. In the case of the King against Rispal, (2d Geo. III. Blackstone's Reports, p. 368), an indictment had been found, at the sessions, against the defendant and two others for a conspiracy. It was removed by certiorari to the Court of King's Bench. The indictment was objected to on two grounds. First, That the justices at their sessions have no jurisdiction over conspiracies, any more than over perjury, usury, and forgery; it being not specified in their commission, nor given them by any special statute. Secondly, That the indictment did not charge them to have conspired to fix any crime on the defendant. Lord Mansfield.—"The case lies in a narrow compass. The first question is, whether the justices in sessions have a jurisdiction over conspiracies. No authority has been cited to shew that they have, or that they have not. It must therefore be determined on general principles. The cases of perjury, usury, and forgery, stand on their own special grounds; and it has been determined, that the justices have no jurisdiction there. This offence of a conspiracy is a trespass, and trespasses are indictable at the sessions, though not committed with force and arms. They tend to the breach of the peace as much as cheats or libels, which are established to be within the jurisdiction of the session. As, therefore, there is no authority to the contrary, I think the justices had a jurisdiction here." Your lordships will observe, that the question here is as to the validity of an indictment at the session for conspiracy, over which it is contended, that the justices have no jurisdiction, as it is not specified in their commission, nor given them by any special statute. This objection Lord Mansfield overrules, because, as tending to a breach of the peace, it comes under the word trespass in the commission, and stands precisely on the same footing as libels and cheats. Now, my lords, it is first to be remarked, that, in this judgment of Lord Mansfield, nothing more is affirmed, than that offences of this description are cognizable at the sessions: they are stated by him to come within the same general principle. As to conspiracies, as the power even of trying them at the sessions was, at that time, contested, and Lord Mansfield states, that no authority, with respect to the jurisdiction of the justices over that offence, had been cited either one way or the other, it is clear that no practice could exist. In cases of libel, though the jurisdiction at the sessions was then considered as established, I think I have already shewn, that no uniform and constant practice can be proved. But, in cheats, a case, according to Lord Mansfield, precisely similar to that of libel, there is the clearest evidence, that this pretended power of a justice of the peace, out of sessions, has no foundation either in law or in fact. I need not tell your lordships that cheats are offences at the common law. They are also made punishable by an express statute, the 33d Hen. VIII. cap. 1. either at the assizes or sessions, by imprisonment, pillory, or other corporal punishment, except death. And "two justices of the peace may call and convent, by process or otherwise, to the assizes or sessions, any person suspected, or commit or bail him to the next assizes or sessions." Here, then, is the most complete proof, that for the offence of cheats, an offence cognizable at sessions—cognizable as a trespass because tending to a breach of the peace—cognizable as coming within the same general principle as libel—the justices, previous to the 33d Hen. VIII. had no power to commit or hold to bail before indictment; nay, that even now a single justice has not that power, the statute requiring the concurrence of two. Here, then, is an end of the supposed principle, that this power is necessarily to be inferred, where there is a jurisdiction at the sessions, in order to compel an attendance there, because the statute of the 33d Hen. VIII. in the words of Lord Hale, would not have been required, particularly and expressly, to authorize its exercise, and define its limits, if it had been otherwise lawful. Thus, I trust, your lordships will be of opinion, that a complete answer has been given, first to the general reasoning by which this authority is supported, and, secondly, to its extension to the particular case of libel, because in this case no such power has been given by statute, as in the case of cheats: and may I not conclude, taking the whole of this together, that the authority of Lord Mansfield is to be added to the other great authorities, in support of the conclusion, to which I again come, that, for offences less than a breach of the peace, unless given by a special statute, justices have not, before indictment found, any authority to commit or hold to bail? But, my lords, if any thing were wanted to add to the weight of this collective authority, it would be to be found in the extravagant and dangerous consequences to which the opinion of the law officers of the Crown must necessarily lead. Only consider, I beseech you, the enormous extent and dangerous tendency of such a power, if it should really exist. There is hardly a case of daily occurrence, and of the most doubtful construction, in which the interests, the prejudices, the fears, or the passions of the magistrates might be involved, to which it might not be applied. In what I am going to say, I beg I may not be understood as intending to throw the slightest reflection on that highly respectable body of country gentlemen, who act in the commission of the peace. On the contrary, nobody can feel more sensibly than I do all their merits, or acknowledge more willingly the immense obligation the public is under to them for discharging, as most of them do, with great intelligence, industry, and integrity, at the expense of their personal ease and convenience, duties, now become as difficult and laborious as they are important. But justices are men—as men liable to all the infirmities of our imperfect nature; and, from their rank and situation in life, exposed to all the temptations of interest, to all the influence of prejudice, to the bias of personal connection, to the instigations of inconsiderate zeal, to the excitements of passion, and to the love of power. It is upon these grounds, and to avoid exposing them to a dangerous conflict between feelings, originating from any of these causes, and their duties, that I have frequently heard in this and the other House of Parliament, objections urged against the extension of the summary jurisdiction and power of magistrates. This principle of salutary caution, not offensive to the honour of any class or description of persons, but necessary for the protection and safety of all classes and descriptions, has usually had its just weight with the Legislature, in passing laws relating to subjects of this nature. It is in this sense, and in this sense only, that I wish what I am now saying to be applied; and, to pass over all the other numerous offences, which the establishment of this new practice would subject to the power of justices of the peace, I beg your lordships to consider the danger of its exercise, particularly with respect to libel. In all the varieties of writings which may constitute that offence, what is more difficult to be decided than the question of their guilt or innocence? What more exposed to the influence of undue motives in its decision? It has been formerly stated by some of the most eminent persons in the profession of the law, nay, by almost all of them, to be so nice and difficult a question, that it could not be safely left even to a special jury: that they were only to find the fact of publication, and that the criminality of the writing, as a question of law, was exclusively for the decision of the Court. This, my lords, was long contended for, and long acted upon as law; till, happily for the freedom of the press, and for the liberty of the country, of which the press is the great palladium, by the perseverance of my noble and learned friend (Lord Erskine) near me, and by the exertions of the man, whom, in public life, I most loved and admired, (Mr. Fox), whom I had nearly called one of the greatest lawyers, but who certainly was one of the greatest men this country ever produced; that principle was at length exploded, and, by the Libel Bill, it was at last established, that, in prosecutions for libel, both the law and the fact were within the province of the jury, and to be decided by them. But, my lords, what avails this just and beneficent statute, what security is there either for the freedom of the press or the liberty of the subject, if, whilst you have imposed this salutary restraint upon the judges, in trials for libel, you give to them, and to justices of the peace, before trial, a right to decide that difficult question, and to commit to prison (in many instances perhaps to inflict a severer punishment than the Court upon conviction would adjudge) upon a charge, which, after all, may turn out to have had no foundation, but in the false interpretation of words perfectly innocent, by the justice before whom the charge was brought? I cannot, my lords, I will not believe, that you can sanction the exercise of such a power. That it is not law, I think I have already shewn; but if it is law, your duty calls upon you to lose no time in altering it. With respect to offences over which this authority is acknowledged, it is ordinarily a simple and intelligible fact, of which the magistrate has to judge; whether a felony has been committed; whether a person accused has been guilty of an assault; whether the peace has actually been broken; whether the provisions of a particular statute have been violated: these are facts depending upon evidence, of which it is easy to judge, and upon which the interests or feelings of the magistrate are seldom likely to interfere with an impartial discharge of his duty. But upon libel, where the whole guilt or innocence of the offence must depend upon the intention, and must be inferred from the construction and the innuendos; often difficult for the most impartial and unbiassed person to decide; where the prejudices, interests, or passions of the justice before whom the charge is brought, are so likely to influence his interpretation of the words; where, in political or religious libels more especially, his particular opinions and attachments must unavoidably have so great a sway; in cases of this sort, to place, upon the charge of any common informer, the personal liberty of every writer and publisher on politics, religion, or law, or any other public question, the unfettered discussion of which is of the very essence and principle of a free government, at the discretion of magistrates mixing in all the contests of the time, and partaking, on one side or the other, in all the heats and prejudices, which personal or party interests engender;—if such be the power of the magistrates, and if this be the law, where, I ask, are all the boasted securities of our independence and freedom? Look, I once more implore you, at the enormous extent and dangerous tendency of the power now contended for; and with this comment upon all that I have argued from the reports of the decisions of our courts, and the books of our ablest writers, I say once more such is not, such cannot be the state of the law in this country, hitherto famed for the sure protection which every individual enjoys, against the insidious attempts of private malice, or the open attacks of power. What then remains, my lords? The practice and the precedents, on which (for they have cited no statute, no principle of the common law, no decision of any court, no dictum of any judge, no authority of any text writer) the law officers of the Crown appear to rely. Before I proceed, however, to consider the sort of practice of which your lordships would require evidence to substantiate a point of this nature, or the precedents, which have been referred to in support of it, I must shortly notice what is said of the silence of the Court, in the case of Mr. Wilkes. There is no decision or opinion of the Court, it is said, that in a case of libel, a justice of the peace might not apprehend a person who could not claim the privilege of Parliament, and demand bail to be given to answer the charge. This silence of the Court might have perhaps been taken as a sort of negative support of the opinion, which I am canvassing, had the commitment of Mr. Wilkes been by a justice of the peace; though this I think would have been much too weak a foundation for the assumption of so arbitrary and dangerous a power. But in the case of Mr. Wilkes no question arose as to the warrant of a justice of the peace. Mr. Wilkes had been committed by the Secretary of State. This point therefore was not before the Court; and its having passed unnoticed, both by the defendant's counsel and by the Court, affords no inference to warrant the conclusion of the law officers of the Crown: unless it can be shewn, as I shall prove it cannot, that the authority of a justice of the peace and of the Secretary of State stands upon precisely the same principle. In the interpretation of a general act, my lords, where a particular is put for an example, the rule I believe is, that there must be a perfect resemblance between the things expressed and those implied, as that administrators are the same as executors, and so forth: and in like manner, to argue from the power of the Secretary of State in favour of that of the justice of peace, I contend, we must be satisfied that there is the same perfect resemblance of character. But can it be necessary for me to insist, before your lordships, that, instead of this perfect resemblance, there is the most obvious and striking dissimilarity in their character, their functions, and their authority? The Secretary of State is a great executive Minister of the Crown, responsible for the advice he gives his Sovereign, and for his conduct in the performance of the high duties of his office; possessing no judicial authority whatever: but intrusted with certain powers for the security of the Government, with the care of which he is specially charged. Considering the character of his office, therefore, there may be many reasons for entrusting the power of committing or holding to bail for libels of a treasonable, or seditious, or blasphemous character to the Secretary of State (though I am far from thinking the exercise of such a power, even by him, either safe or necessary), which would not apply to a justice of the peace. Though strongly interested to support the power of the Government, he is less exposed to the influence of those motives to which justice of the peace, from mixing in all the common concerns of life, may be liable; or, if exposed to them, he acts under the immediate control of Parliament, where any error, or abuse in the exercise of his authority, can seldom escape being severely questioned. To the discretion of this minister, acting by the advice of the law officers of the Crown, and with so high a responsibility, such a power, it might therefore be contended, might be safely and usefully committed, though it would be extremely dangerous to extend it indiscriminately to all justices of the peace. But, my lords, to shew how little analogy there is between offices so widely dissimilar, I must trouble your lordships with again reading, from the judgment in the case of Entick against Carrington, the opinion of Lord Camden, as to the nature and origin of this extraordinary and anomalous power of the Secretary of State to commit or hold to bail for libel; which he admits to have been established by practice, and by the decisions of the Courts; though he plainly intimates, that he conceived those decisions to have been erroneous. "The power (Howell's State Trials, vol. xix. p. 1045. et seq.) of this minister (the Secretary of State) is pretty singular. If he is considered in the light of a Privy Counsellor, he is the only one of that body who exerts it. His power is so extensive in place, that it spreads throughout the whole realm; yet, in the object, it is so confined, that, except in libels and some few state crimes, as they are called, the Secretary of State does not pretend to the authority of a constable. To consider him as a Conservator—he never binds to the peace or good behaviour, which seems to have been the principal duty of a Conservator; at least he never does it in those cases, where the law requires those sureties. But he commits in certain other cases, where it is very doubtful whether the Conservator had any jurisdiction whatever. His warrants are chiefly granted against libellers, whom he binds in the first instance to their good behaviour, which no other Conservator ever attempted, from the best intelligence that we can learn from our books. And though he doth all these things, yet it seems agreed, that he hath no power whatever to administer an oath or take bail. This jurisdiction, as extraordinary as I have described it, is so dark and obscure in its origin, that the counsel have not been able to form any certain opinion from whence it sprung. Sometimes they annex it to the office of Secretary of State, sometimes to the quality of Privy Counsellor, and in the last argument it has been derived from the King's royal prerogative to commit by his own personal command. Whatever may have been the true source of this authority, it must be admitted, that he is, at this day, in the full legal exercise of it; because there has been not only a clear practice of it, at least since the Revolution, confirmed by a variety of precedents; but the authority has been recognised and confirmed by two cases in the very point, since that period; and, therefore, we have not a power to unsettle or contradict it now, even though we are persuaded that the commencement of it was erroneous." Lord Camden then enters into a very learned investigation of the origin and foundation of this power, and he concludes this part of his judgment as follows:—"I am persuaded that the Secretary of State hath assumed this power, as a transfer, I know not how, of the royal authority to himself; and that the common law of England knows no such magistrate. At the same time I declare, wherein my brothers do all agree with me, that we are bound to adhere to the determination of the Court in the cases of the Queen against Derby, and the King against Earbury; and I have no right to overturn those decisions, even though it should be admitted, that the practice, which has subsisted since the Revolution, had been erroneous in its commencement." Here, then, my lords, in this solemn judgment, given after long and diligent consideration and inquiry, we find my Lord Camden stating, almost in the words of Lord Holt, that he is puzzled to account for the origin of this power in the Secretary of State; that it is unknown to the common law; and that it had been assumed as a transfer of the royal authority to commit per mandatum regis: thus putting it on a ground, which is clearly inapplicable to the office of a Justice of the Peace. Having, then, my lords, as it appears to me, proved undeniably, that the admitted and established practice of the Secretary of State has nothing to do with the question, as it relates to these other magistrates, we come at last to consider separately, with respect to them, what practice can be set up for the exercise of this power. The learned persons, who have given the opinion on your table, refer, in support of it, to two cases of recent date, in 1801 and 1802, in which two persons, of the names of Spence and Hogg, were held to bail, the one for a seditious, he other for an indecent libel. In the first of these cases it appears, that, in 1801, a person of the name of Arthur Seattle laid an information on oath before Mr. Ford, Justice of Peace for Middlesex, of his having printed a pamphlet, entitled, "The Restorer of Society to its Natural State," for Thomas Spence. That Spence was held to bail for his personal appearance in the King's Bench to answer the charge. That the Attorney-General (Law) filed an information against him. That he was called upon his recognizance to appear, and appearing, was charged with the information, pleaded not guilty, and was afterwards tried, convicted, and sentenced. The recognizance was filed in the King's Bench, and there are recorded the rule of court stating his appearance and plea, and the entry roll in the King's Bench containing the information, plea, trial, and sentence. The other case, of Hogg, in 1802, is of a similar description. Information upon oath was laid by the direction of the same Attorney-General (Law), before the Lord Mayor, against the defendant, for selling a work called "Trials for Adultery." The Lord Mayor issued his warrant for Hogg's apprehension: he was apprehended, and held to bail for his appearance in the King's Bench. Mr. Perceval, having succeeded as Attorney-General, filed his information: Hogg appeared in Court, and suffered judgment to go by default. Having made affidavit that he had stopped the sale of the books, he was not called up for judgment. There is, on record, the recognizance, the affidavit, and the entry roll in the Court of King's Bench. These cases, which have been communicated to me by the courtesy of the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, I have stated at length; and I ask, what inference is to be drawn from them? Are two solitary cases, neither of them contested, and in one of which judgment was suffered to go by default, to be pleaded as proofs of such an exercise of the power of apprehending and holding to bail for libel as will establish its practice? My lords, for such a purpose, proofs of a very different practice will be required. Not of a practice depending on two modern instances, but derived from a high antiquity, and sanctioned by the decisions of the Courts: a practice, as it is described by Lord Mansfield and other legal authorities, communiter usitata et approbata. It is singular, my lords, that even in modern times, and especially at the beginning of the French Revolution, when the press teemed with publications, which were represented as being of the most dangerous tendency; when prosecutions were numerous, and the conviction and punishment of the offenders considered of the greatest importance; it is singular, I say, that at that time this practice does not appear to have been discovered. I never heard that Paine, for the Age of Reason, or any other of the persons accused of issuing libels threatening the very foundations of civil society, and attacking the principles of all morality, law, government, and religion, were, before indictment found or information filed, taken up, or held to bail, or committed. But if such a practice could have been proved, if it could have been traced backwards to the time of the Revolution; if it could have been shewn, that the most illustrious characters in the law, in conducting state prosecutions, as Attornies-General, had successively acted upon it; still I should contend, that the mere acts of the law officers of the Crown (which will always be regarded with a wholesome jealousy by a Constitutional Parliament) if they had not been objected to, and brought under the view of the Judges of the land, by a solemn appeal to their decision, would not constitute such a practice as would justify your lordships in recognizing the legal existence of the power, which is now claimed for the justices of the peace. And here I would remind your lordships of the case of general warrants. What could be more established in practice than these warrants? They had been issued for above a century, without dispute or contest: persons apprehended under them had been held to bail for their appearance before the Courts: they had been called, and appeared before the Courts upon the recognizances thus taken: all the most eminent characters in the law, the same whose authority may now perhaps be pleaded for a no less dangerous practice, had acted as Attornies-General during these proceedings: yet, my lords, notwithstanding this long course of undisputed and continued practice, when the legality of these warrants came at last to be questioned before the Court of King's Bench, all the Judges concurred in declaring them to be illegal; and they were afterwards condemned by a resolution of the House of Commons, whereby the people of this country have been protected against the farther exercise of so dangerous a power. I beg your lordships to attend to the words in which the opinions of the Court, upon the subject of general warrants, are given; (Howell's State Trials, vol. xix. p. 1027.) and you will then see the degree of value that is to be attached to a practice of this description.—Lord Mansfield. "It is said, that the usage has been so; and that many such warrants have issued, since the Revolution down to this time. But a usage, to grow into a law, ought to be a general usage, communiter usitata et approbata, and which, after a long continuance, it would be mischievous to overturn."—Mr. Justice Wilmot. "Had no doubt nor ever had upon these warrants: he thought them illegal and void."—Mr. Justice Yates and Mr. Justice Aston. "Had no doubt of their illegality: for no degree of antiquity can give sanction to a usage bad in itself." Thus, my lords, you see that a much longer practice, in the case of general warrants, did not induce the Court to support their legality. In addition to this authority of the Court of King's Bench, I have also again to quote to you, upon this point, the judgment of Lord Camden, (Howell's State Trials, vol. xix. p. 1067. et seq.) in the case of Entick against Carrington, not only to shew the opinion of that great Judge also as to the sort of usage which would be required to establish a practice of this nature, but to rebut the inference, which may perhaps be drawn from the acquiescence of the Court in the cases of Spence and Hogg.—Lord Camden. “I come now to the practice since the Revolution, which has been strongly urged with the emphatical addition, that an usage, tolerated from the æra of liberty, and continued downwards to this time, through the best ages of the Constitution, must necessarily have a legal commencement. Now that pretence can have no place in the question made by this plea, because no such practice is there alleged; yet I will permit the defendant, for the present, to borrow a fact from the special verdict, for the sake of giving it an answer. If the practice began then, it began much too late to be law now. If it was more ancient, the Revolution is not to answer for it; and I could have wished that, upon this occasion, the Revolution had not been considered as the only basis of our liberty. The Revolution restored this Constitution to its first principles: it did no more. It did not enlarge the liberty of the subject; but gave it a better security. It neither widened nor contracted the foundation; but repaired, and perhaps added a buttress or two to the fabric: and if any Ministers of State have since deviated from the principles at that time recognised, all that I can say is, that, so far from being sanctioned, they are condemned by the Revolution. With respect to the practice itself, if it goes no higher, every lawyer will tell you, it is much too modern to be evidence of the common law; and if it should be added, that these warrants ought to acquire some strength by the silence of the Courts, which have heard them read so often upon returns, without censure or animadversion, I am able to borrow my answer from the Court of King’s Bench, which lately declared, with great unanimity, in the case of general warrants, that as no objection was taken to them upon the returns, and the matter passed sub silentio, the precedent was of no weight. I most heartily concur in that opinion; and the reason is more pertinent here, because the Court had no authority in the present case to determine against the seizure of papers, which was not before them; whereas in the other they might, if they had thought fit, have declared the warrant void, and discharged the prisoner, ex officio. But still it is insisted, that there has been a general submission, and no action brought to try the right. I answer, there has been a submission of guilt and poverty to power and the terror of punishment. But it would be strange doctrine to assert, that all the people of this land are bound to acknowledge that to be universal law, which a few criminal booksellers have been afraid to dispute.” Apply the passage, my lords, which I have here cited from this admirable judgment, and which I have had a pleasure in reading at length, on account of the sound and constitutional doctrines which it contains, apply it, I say, to the case before us, and to the plea which is set up of practice, and of the acquiescence of the Court. With respect to the first, standing upon this judgment, as upon a rock, I again assert, that if, not the cases of Spence and Hogg, cases only of fourteen or fifteen years’ standing, but a continued string of uncontested cases from the Revolution downwards could have been produced, they would not have amounted to evidence of a legal practice; the more especially, as during the whole period, from the Revolution to the year 1763, when the warrant against Mr. Wilkes was set aside on the ground of parliamentary privilege, there might be prevailing a general, though certainly an incorrect notion, that libel was to be considered as an actual breach of the peace; the last decision of a Court of Law, in the case of the Seven Bishops, having so ruled it. With respect to the second ground, the silence of the Court, I answer, with the united authority of the Courts of King’s Bench and Common Pleas, when two of the greatest judges this country ever produced presided over them, that, “as no objection was taken to them, and the matter passed sub silentio, the precedents are of no weight;” and, that “the submission of guilt and poverty to power and the terror of punishment,” as in the cases of Spence and Hogg, in the latter more particularly (who was seeking to avert the penalties to which he was exposed, and succeeded in doing so by stopping the circulation of the libel), is not to be taken for the establishment of a power, unknown to the statute or to the common law, and most dangerous in its exercise to the freedom of the press, and to the liberties of the people of this country. Surely, my lords, more cannot be necessary upon this point; but, if farther argument is required, it is not wanting; and, if we are still referred to the opinion “of one of the most learned of the predecessors” of the present Attorney-General, and to the learning, ability, and integrity of that noble lord, and to the eminent advantage to the public with which he discharged the duties of the high judicial situation, which he now holds, no man is more ready to bear testimony than I am; to that opinion, and to the acquiescence and silence of the Court, I must oppose the opinion of another living authority, equally able and learned, who formerly held the same office; and the concurrence of the whole Legislature, evidenced, not by a silent acquiescence, but by the positive enactment of a new law. I allude, my lords, to the act of the 48th of the King, cap. 58., in which the law officers refer as putting the power of the judges, to commit or hold to bail for libel, out of all doubt, and which was proposed to Parliament by Sir Vicary Gibbs, then Attorney-General, and now Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. Whether the true construction of this act be, as some have supposed, to give the power of commitment, and holding to bail, to the Judges of the King’s Bench, before indictment found or information filed, in consequence of evidence upon oath of the commission of an offence liable to be so proceeded against; or whether, as I contend, it only gives that power, after an information has been actually filed; in either case, it could not have been required, had this power been at that time considered to be so established by practice, as to have acquired the force of law. It is clear then, that, in 1808, neither the Attorney-General, who brought in the bill, nor the two Houses, who passed it, could have contemplated the existence of such a power; for, if it had been possessed by the Justices of Peace, it is unnecessary for me to contend, that it must also have been vested in the Court of King's Bench. Yet this law was much debated in its progress. The learned lords, now present, supported its expediency; and I will not pay them so bad a compliment as to suppose, that an act, which they defended with so much zeal, could be altogether superfluous and unnecessary. We have, then, my lords, I contend, a degree of cumulative proof, such as is perhaps to be found in no other instance, against the practice which may be alleged as the foundation of the power, to commit, or hold to bail, for libel, by Justices of the Peace: and if I have proved, that neither the statute law, nor the common law, nor any practice, supported upon a solemn hearing by the decisions of the Courts, sanction the exercise of this authority; that no authority of any text writer, fairly considered, no dictum of any judge, can be produced in support of it; I feel some confidence in urging your lordships to the conclusion, to which I have now brought my argument on this part of the question, that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown is not warranted by the law of the land. It remains for me to consider the conduct of the Secretary of State, in issuing the Circular Letter of the 27th of March to the Lords Lieutenants of counties, for the direction of the magistrates in the administration of the law. This appears to me, my lords, a matter involving considerations of the first constitutional importance. I have before stated, that I believe such a proceeding to be without a precedent. I at least have not been able to learn, that any measure of a similar character was ever before hazarded by any Minister of the Crown. For, my lords, you will observe, that this is not an instruction to the magistrates as to any of their ministerial duties, or the measures necessary to the support of an active and vigilant police, with respect to which, the Secretary of State might be supposed to be charged with a peculiar responsibility, in a season of great public distress and uneasiness. It is not even prudently confined to a general exhortation to them to exert the powers entrusted to them by the law for the speedy suppression and punishment of such offences as might be dangerous to the public security. For an order from the Secretary of State to the Chancellor, to give general directions to the Judges, and through them to the Justices of the Peace, with respect to such matters as seemed to require attention, I understand examples in former times may be produced. But surely, my lords, such examples cannot be argued as affording any precedent for a proceeding like the present. To say nothing of the striking difference of such a recommendation through the Chancellor, the first officer of the law, and the judges of the land, to be delivered solemnly in the face of the public at the assizes; the strong and marked distinction is, that these recommendations, as I understand them, were general. But here, my lords, we have a specific instruction, as to the interpretation of the law on a particular subject; and a direction, as to the manner in which the discretionary power, supposed to be vested in the magistrates under that interpretation of the law, should be exercised: and this, too, on a doubtful point. That he thought it a doubtful point, must be admitted by the Secretary of State, or else why did he require the opinion of the law officers of the Crown upon it? That it was considered, even by these learned persons themselves, as not free from doubt, appears from the terms in which their opinion is given. They cite precedents, and state that they agree with the opinion of the Attorney-General, by whose advice those precedents were established; but they do not venture to say, that the proposition to which they subscribe has been generally received as acknowledged law, or established by a clear and undisputed practice. And, my lords, if this was a point involved in doubt, by what authority did the noble Secretary take upon himself to decide it? Who gave him the right to determine? Who applied to him to do so? And where, I again ask, did he find any precedent for such a proceeding in the execution of his official duties? It is, my lords, amongst the first principles of a free government, that there should be an insurmountable line of separation between the executive and the judicial authorities. That the latter should be kept independent of the former; and hitherto any interference of a Minister of the Crown with the administration of justice has been considered as a political offence of so dangerous a tendency to the liberty and security of the subject, that, in other times, it would have called down the indignation of Parliament on the head of the offender. I say, my lords, this has been such an interference—a direct interference, not with the ministerial but the judicial duties of the magistrates, by instructing them in what manner they are to administer the law with respect to a particular class of offences; the consequence of which is, to subject to the power of arrest and of imprisonment, if bail cannot be obtained, every author, printer, and publisher, nay perhaps every possessor of any writing, which in their judgment they may deem a libel. Suppose, my lords, such an instruction had been addressed, not to Justices of the Peace, but to the Judges of the land. Is such a supposition impossible? The opinion states the powers of the Judges as well as the Justices, and might be intended perhaps to teach them also their duties. But such a supposition is not to be treated seriously. Such an interference with the Judges, on the part of a Minister of the Crown, would not have been tolerated. The nation would have been in a flame. All the power and indignation of Parliament would have been roused. The Judge, to whom so insulting a mandate should have been addressed, would himself have vindicated his authority; and the messenger, who had ventured to become the bearer of it, would have been committed to prison. I verily believe, my lords, that all this would have happened. Yet, where is the difference in principle? I maintain, that there is none. Let the case be stated. The instruction to the magistrates is, to act upon the opinion given by the law officers of the Crown, in favour of their authority, to commit, or hold to bail, for libel. This, I suppose, will be justified upon the necessity of the case, in order to correct an evil, which is dangerous to the public security. But this exercise of authority, on the part of the magistrates, can be of no avail, unless its legality is supported by the Courts of Law. A person committed for libel may sue out his Habeas Corpus, and appeal to the decision of a Court of Law upon the validity of the warrant under which he is imprisoned. The Court, if it should be of opinion, that the warrant was not lawful, would order his discharge: and thus all the provident care of the Secretary of State, to secure the Government against the attacks of a licentious press, would be defeated. Suppose, then, that to obviate so great a misfortune, he had addressed a similar instruction to the Judges, stating the direction that had been sent to the inferior magistrates, and calling upon them to give it efficacy, by acting upon the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, in any case of this sort, that might be brought before them. The supposition is extravagant, absurd, impossible: be it so. But I say it is precisely the same in principle: and I defy any man to shew me a jot of distinction between the two cases; or, that such an interference with the Judges, which all who hear me will reprobate, is either more improper or more unconstitutional than that which has actually taken place. I contend, therefore, that such a direction to the magistrates, not being a general exhortation to vigilance and care, but a specific instruction as to the way in which they are to construe the law, and to exercise a discretionary power, would have been, even if the law had been clear and undisputed, a high offence against the Constitution. That this has been done in a case, in which, to say the least of it, the law is doubtful, is a great aggravation of the offence. For the noble Secretary of State has taken upon himself not only to direct the magistrates in the administration of the law, but to enact, or at least to declare the law, which they are called upon to administer; thus encroaching more than royal authority, and usurping the powers of the Legislature in addition to those of the Executive Government. The character of this proceeding, therefore, I hold to be most unconstitutional: on its dangerous tendency, and the effects it is likely to produce, already exemplified in two striking instances, I must also trouble your lordships with some observations; though much, of what would apply to this view of the question, has been anticipated in the earlier part of my speech. I have stated to your lordships, in shewing the extreme consequences to which the establishment of the authority of Justices of the Peace to commit, or hold to bail, for all offences cognizable at their sessions, must necessarily lead, the danger of such an extension of their power: how much it would be exposed to temptations to abuse: how liable to be perverted by the inducements of interest, the intemperance of zeal, the errors of prejudice, the excitements of political hostility, and the instigations of private enmity and resentment. These dangers, my lords, would accrue, even if the magistrates were left to the uninfluenced exercise of such a power. But when they are called upon specially to exert it, in a time of political heat and violence, by a Minister of the Crown; when this call is addressed to persons, who are engaged in all the disputes and contest to which the different parties in the State give occasion; when the subject, on which they are to decide, is one which they will necessarily view through the medium of their different opinions and attachments; thus encouraged, exhorted, and instigated to act, under the influence of motives so powerful, in questions so much exposed to error, even when most dispassionately considered, what security, I ask, can there be for any man, who engages in the discussion of public affairs, against the persecutions of power, or the vexations of private malice? To suppose that, in such a state of things, the freedom of the press can long continue, seems to me to be cherishing a hope much more sanguine than can be justified by any knowledge we have obtained, either from the history of other governments, or from our experience in human affairs. But, my lords, it is not only this enormous power of the magistrates that is thus let loose against the freedom of the press, and the security of the subject, but that most pestilent curse by which society can be afflicted, the whole tribe of common informers, are also called into action. To these a new encouragement and invitation is held out; any thing they may choose to call a libel may henceforth be made the subject of a prosecution, and thus become, in the hands of the worst men, acting from the worst motives, an instrument of pecuniary extortion, or any other base purpose they may have to serve. On the danger arising from hence to individuals, it is not necessary for me to say more; but let me intreat your lordships to consider the possible, if not the too probable injury to the interests of the State itself; if, indeed, the interests of the State can, on any sound principle, be considered separately from the general security of those who are entitled to its protection. Hitherto, my lords, prosecutions for libels, on the Government or religion, have only been directed by the Attorney-General and the responsible officers of the Crown. In some cases the Legislature itself has acted upon this principle, more especially in the Stamp Duties; with respect to which, as your lordships know, the right of instituting prosecutions for penalties has, by the 44th of the King, been expressly limited to the Attorney-General, the Lord Advocate of Scotland, or the Solicitor, or some other officer of the Stamps. In this there has been evinced, in my opinion, a wise and wholesome caution, to guard, not only individuals, but the State itself against the effects of vexatious and ill-advised prosecutions. For I would ask the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, whether, in the discharge of his duty as Attorney-General, when he filled that office, he has not often found the expediency of instituting a prosecution for libel, a question of exceedingly nice discretion? It is not only the political malignity and dangerous character of a libel, but the circumstances of its circulation, and the probability of suppressing it by a conviction, that must also be taken into consideration. Hitherto, therefore, this discretion has been confined to the responsible advisers and officers of the Crown, which might otherwise be lightly compromised, and perhaps materially injured. But now all this salutary restraint and caution is at an end. Every thing that malice may represent as a libel, or indiscretion deem so, is to be forced into notice by any common informer. Upon an information so laid, every person, who has been engaged in writing, printing, or in any way publishing a paper of this description, may be dragged before a magistrate as a public criminal, and exposed, in the first instance, to all the horrors of a prison, and the State itself to all the inconveniences (and in many cases they may be of no light consequence) of an ill-advised, and, ultimately perhaps, an unsuccessful prosecution. This consideration, therefore, as it affects the interests of the Government itself, is of too much importance to be overlooked, though undoubtedly of very inferior moment to the danger to which every individual is exposed, who may venture to publish, on religion or politics, opinions differing from the prevailing tenets either of the Church or State. I have said, my lords, that this danger has already been exemplified in two striking instances. I allude to the case which occurred at Liverpool, of an information against a Mr. Wright, for preaching a blasphemous sermon; and to a case reported by the newspapers, from which my information is derived, to have been brought a few days ago before the Court of King's Bench. In the first, an information was laid against a Mr. Wright for denying the divinity of Jesus Christ; a doctrine, which, however erroneous it may be deemed by us, who are members of the church of England, is maintained by many persons, who believe, as firmly as we do, in the Christian dispensation; by the whole class of Unitarian Christians, amongst whom are to be found many persons, of as exemplary life and morals, and of as strict an adherence to religious duties, as in any other persuasion whatever; a doctrine

however, which, whether true or false, has lately by an act of Parliament, dictated by the soundest wisdom and justice, been exempted from the penalties to which it was formerly exposed by law. This therefore, was no crime; and it was found necessary, to give effect to the information, by some more serious charge; and it was asserted, that the preacher had not only impugned the Trinity, and the divinity of Christ, but that he had denied the immortality of the soul, and the belief of reward or punishment in a future state. This was stated by a reverend Prelate, the Bishop of the diocese in which this proceeding took place, to have been the charge upon which Mr. Wright had been brought before a magistrate at Liverpool, and held to bail for his appearance to answer it. (See page 724.) Now, my lords, there cannot be produced a more pregnant instance than this, to shew the danger of inviting rash, or interested, or malevolent persons, to bring forward accusations of this nature; and leaving them to be decided on, in the first instance, with the power of committing the party accused to prison, by persons so likely, from the circumstances in which they are placed, to form an erroneous judgment. I have read the sermon, my lords—Mr. Wright, I maintain, had published no blasphemy; had said nothing which by law he may not say with impunity; had not denied a future state of reward or punishment; but simply maintained, that there is no separate or intermediate state of the soul; professing as his religious belief, that the soul expires and is revived with the body, on that day of final account, when we shall all be called upon to answer for our conduct in this life. This, my lords, I say again, may be a belief in which we may not concur, but it is neither impious nor blasphemous. It was the belief of Dr. Priestley, who, whatever the errors of his political or religious opinions might be, was, I believe, a man of as exemplary worth and morals as ever lived. It is the belief, not only of many persons belonging to the sect of Unitarian Christians, but even of members of the Church of England itself, and has been, as the reverend Prelate well knows, explained and defended by a learned Bishop, (the late Rev. Dr. Law, Bishop of Carlisle,) to whom he will be the last man to deny the tribute of esteem and veneration, due to a life of distinguished piety and virtue. Here then, my lords, we have an example, directly in point, of the danger of an accusation, to describe it in the mildest terms, hastily laid, and incautiously decided upon, whereby a respectable man, for preaching a belief which he conscientiously held, and which is perfectly innocent in itself, has been dragged before the public as a criminal guilty of blasphemy; and would have been committed to prison, if he had not been in a situation of life which enabled him to procure bail. The other case, my lords, is of another description; but it exhibits, in a point of view no less striking, the evil consequences to which this proceeding of the Secretary of State might a priori have been expected to give occasion. A magistrate of the name of Powell had brought before him, upon the accusation of an informer, two persons charged with vending pamphlets, and I believe some other articles, contrary to the provisions of the act respecting hawkers and pedlars : which has also been recommended to the peculiar care of the magistrates, by the noble Secretary of State. These persons in vain pleaded, that they had sold their goods on the market day, in open market ; that there was a clause of exception in the act, which enabled them to do so ; and that they were, therefore, exempted from its penalties. "No," says the magistrate, "there is, since my Lord Sidmouth's Circular, an end of that exception; such publications can no longer be sold at all without a licence;" and he accordingly convicted them, committed them to prison, and issued a warrant to levy the penalties by distress. All this, however, had been done to extort evidence, as it appears, from these men, against a third person, from whom they had received the publications, which they had offered for sale ; and having at last succeeded in this, the magistrate, again exceeding his power, discharged them from the conviction which had taken place, and proceeded, in a manner no less violent and illegal, to convict the person against whom evidence had thus been extorted, in penalties to the amount of 80*l.* for which he immediately issued his warrant of distress ; and this though it was represented to him, that the person accused had not had time given him to appear in his own defence, and that the magistrate, under the law for recovering penalties for the Stamp Duties, had no jurisdiction in the case. This, my lords, is the case, as it has appeared in the newspapers. I trust it may, upon farther hearing, be found to admit of some contradiction or explanation ; but it appeared of sufficient weight to the Court, to induce them to grant a rule to shew cause why a criminal information should not be filed ; and, if the facts stated be true, there cannot be exhibited a stronger instance of the imprudence and danger of calling into action all the intemperate zeal and violence by which magistrates may be influenced in a moment like the present. These cases, my lords, and others, to which I will not now refer more particularly, for granting licences for meetings for the discussion of various subjects, have already occurred in consequence of the Circular Letter of the Secretary of State, and are to be ascribed directly to it. How many more there may be of a similar nature I know not ; but of this we may be assured, that more instances like these will occur, if they are not checked by the reasonable interference of Parliament. Proceedings so injurious to the character of the Government, so destructive of the spirit of the Constitution, and of the free exercise of those privileges which it confers, more particularly of the freedom of the press, I will not dwell upon any longer ; but the consequences of the establishment of such a power are so accurately described, in a Protest entered upon the Journals of this House, (Lords' Journals, die Martis, 29th Nov. 1763.) that I cannot help reading it, as the best summing up that I can make of the dangerous character and injurious effects of the measure, which the noble Secretary has been induced to take. "By this doctrine every man's liberty, privileged as well as unprivileged, is surrendered into the hands of a Secretary of State. He is by this means empowered, in the first instance, to pronounce the paper to be a seditious libel ; a matter of such difficulty, that some have pretended it is too high to be entrusted to a special jury of the first rank and condition. He is to understand, and decide by himself, the meaning of every innuendo. He is to determine the tendency thereof, and brand it with his own epithets. He is to adjudge the party guilty, and make him author or publisher, as he sees good. And lastly, he is to give sentence, by committing the party. All these authorities are given to one single magistrate, unassisted by counsel, evidence, or jury, in a case where the law says no action will lie against him, because he acts in the capacity of a judge." This Protest, my lords, appears, in your Journals, to have been entered upon the resolution, which, in consequence of the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Mr. Wilkes, had been voted by this and the other House of Parliament, "that Privilege of Parliament does not extend to the case of writing and publishing seditious libels," &c. It is signed by seventeen peers, at the head of which stands the name of Earl Temple. The danger attending the exercise of such a power, even by the Secretary of State, is here most eloquently and unanswerably stated ; but if it could have been foreseen, that the same power was to be given to every Justice of the Peace ; and that not to the Secretary of State alone, but to every inferior magistrate throughout the kingdom, "every man's liberty, privileged as well as unprivileged, was to be surrendered," in how much more forcible and glowing terms could have been found, would they have described such an extension of an authority, absolutely incompatible with the principles of a free constitution. I have now, my lords, brought to a conclusion this long argument upon a case, which seems to me, as much as any that have ever occurred within my memory, to call for the prompt and effectual interference of Parliament. If it should still be contended, in opposition to all that I have stated, that the protection of the State, against the machinations of sedition or treason, requires the existence of such a power ; my answer is, that, in the best periods of our history, when the practice of the Constitution was the purest ; nay in times when the State has been exposed to the greatest difficulties both from within and from without ; it has been protected against all the dangers that assailed it, by the native energies of its Government, and by the spirit and attachment of a free people. But this authority is now acknowledged to be established in the Secretary of State; and with the tremendous power of the Attorney-General in filing ex officio informations, and in keeping them suspended over the heads of his victims (powers at which guilt may well tremble, and from which even innocence cannot escape without severe suffering), I ask of your lordships, whether any reasonable apprehension is to be entertained of a deficiency of means in the Government to repel the immediate dangers, which may arise from inflammatory libels, in a moment of popular uneasiness; or to defeat any more gradual and insidious attempts to corrupt the morals, or alienate the affections, of the people? Upon the whole, then, my lords, whatever view I take of this question, whether as it regards the Law, the principles of the Constitution, the character of the offence, or the security of the State, I come to the same conclusion; that it is unnecessary, that it is inexpedient, that it is dangerous in the highest degree to give, in the proceedings against libel, so extraordinary a power, hitherto unknown in practice, to be exercised indiscriminately by all Justices of the Peace throughout the kingdom. In the investigation of this subject, I can assure your lordships, that I have spared no pains, before I ventured to pronounce so strong an opinion. I have had recourse to all the best sources of information within my reach, both of dead and living authority; and after a careful and diligent inquiry, I present myself to you this night, with the strongest conviction of the soundness of the principles which I have asserted. Had I consulted my personal case, indeed, and considered only the ungrateful character of the task I have thus imposed upon myself, knowing how little my opposition to any measure of the Ministers of the Crown is likely to avail, I should have remained silent. But I could not sit still and see so dangerous a blow aimed at the freedom of the press and the principles of the Constitution, without employing such means as are in my power, however hopeless of success, to avert it. If any thing, my lords, could add to the importance of the question itself, it would be to be found in the character of the times, and in the situation of the country. We have been induced, in concurrence with the other branches of the Legislature, to suspend, with respect to political offences, the operation of a law, which forms the chief bulwark of the Constitution. We have also passed other laws, materially abridging and restraining the facility of petitioning, and the privileges of free discussion. Even those, who are the most impressed with the necessity of making these new provisions for the security of the Government, by the extension of its powers, will, I am sure, admit, that it is an evil much and deeply to be lamented. But, my lords, if new laws of this description are to be enacted—it, when enacted, they are to be construed to the utmost strictness of their letter, and executed with the most unrelenting severity; and if, at the same time, interpretations of the old law are to be adopted, and a new practice introduced, still farther controlling popular rights and privileges, and rendering their exercise difficult and dangerous, what, I ask, is to be the end? More especially, if this spirit in our legislation is accompanied with other circumstances, operating directly and powerfully in the same direction—if a great change has taken place in our principles, in our policy, in our tastes, in our habits, and in our manners—if we are become a military and a warlike, from a maritime and pacific people—if whilst we are increasing the civil powers of the Crown by law, we are also maintaining an army disproportioned to our population, incompatible with an effective support of our naval superiority, and destructive of the character of a free Government—what, my lords, must be the inevitable tendency of such a system? Its termination cannot be doubtful: one of two things must unavoidably happen; either that this free Constitution, the glorious work of a thousand years, must, though its forms may still survive, decline, by no slow degrees, into a military despotism; or that—I will not describe the alternative; but it would be scarcely less dreadful. To avert such extremities will require the utmost care, the utmost vigilance, the utmost wisdom of Parliament. The people have borne, with a most exemplary patience, sufferings which I wish I could feel the confidence, which some express, in believing to be merely temporary. To what farther privations we may be called upon to submit I know not; but every thing I hear and see forbids me to speak of our present prospects as encouraging. With a declining revenue, we labour under the pressure of a taxation, which I hold it to be impossible to increase; but any effectual and early relief from which I fear is difficult. Our best hope of surmounting the evils which surround us must be found in the patience and fortitude of the people, supported and strengthened by a high-minded consciousness of their rights as freemen. Beware, my lords, how you weaken in them this sentiment, the true source of your security and power; how you deprive them of the confidence, so necessary to be cherished and improved, that by Parliament, whose peculiar duty it is to protect them, their interests will not be neglected. It is, my lords, by the irresistible impression of these feelings, and by a sense of duty superior to all other considerations, that I have felt myself impelled to bring this matter before you. Your acquiescence in the motion, which, I am about to propose, will pledge you to nothing beyond a farther and more mature consideration of a most important constitutional question; and, if I did not fear being taxed with presumption, I would ask whether, to this extent at least, I have not made out a case, which your lordships ought not at once to dismiss as altogether unworthy of your attention? That no adverse feelings may influence your decision, have abstained, as much as possible, from the introduction of any topics that might excite them. It has been my endeavour to keep out of view all subjects connected with the interests and opinions of party; and if, inadvertently, any thing tending that way should have escaped me, I intreat your lordships to consider it as unsaid, and to banish it from your recollection. I have had no object, and no desire, but to pursue this question, in the sincere spirit of truth, to a just and legitimate conclusion. My wish is, that your lordships should consider it as having been brought before you in the exercise of your judicial rather than your political functions; as requiring the same dispassionate attention, the same grave deliberation and inquiry, the same disinterested and impartial decision. You are indeed sitting in judgment on the rights and liberties of your fellow subjects; and I earnestly pray, that they may sustain no farther injury from the proceeding of this night. I move, my lords, "That the case submitted to the law officers of the Crown, &c. be laid before this House."

Lord Ellenborough said, he had listened with the utmost attention to the very able and elaborate speech of the noble earl—a speech which evidently demonstrated that he had bestowed great pains in considering this important question in all its bearings, and certainly he had argued it in a manner that reflected the highest honour upon him. He was by no means convinced, however, from any of the authorities which the noble earl had cited, or by any of the arguments which he had grounded upon them, that the law was different from what he (Lord E.) had always considered it to be—namely, that justices of the peace can arrest and hold to bail in cases of libel. In offering his opinion to their lordships on this great legal and constitutional question, he would follow the example of the noble earl, in calling to his support some of the gravest and most venerable authorities that had ever adorned the seat of justice, or discharged the duties which every man owes to his profession, by publishing the result of his laborious researches, and most mature and unbiassed opinions. In the first place, lord Hale, in his very excellent work, entitled Pleas of the Crown, declares, that justices of the peace may issue warrants, within their precincts, to apprehend persons charged with offences within the cognizance of the sessions of the peace, and bind them over. Their lordships would be pleased to attend to these words—within the cognizance of the peace. The question was, then, does a libel come within the cognizance of the peace? It would be endless to enumerate all the authorities that might be cited, in order to shew the extensive jurisdiction that is given to magistrates, as conservators of the peace; but several of those authorities specifically mentioned a libel as within their cognizance. The doctrine, therefore, of lord Hale attached upon it, as coming within those cases in which they have power to commit. Mr. Serjeant Hawkins said, that justices of the peace may commit for misdemeanours, though in another place (as the noble earl had observed) he stated, that they could not be too tender in cases of libel; which words, however, expressly shewed, that they could hold to bail for a libel, as a high misdemeanour, whatever tenderness the learned writer recommended them to adopt in such cases. The fact really was, and so it had been uniformly considered, that libel was an indictable offence at the quarter sessions, and magistrates had always exercised the practice of commitment in such cases. The noble earl had relied on a great authority, and great it undoubtedly was, though he (Lord E.) was by no means prepared to defer to all the opinions of that very distinguished character, the late Lord Camden. But what had that eminent lawyer said with respect to libels? In the 11th vol. of Hargrave's State Trials, Lord Camden is made to declare, that as to the offence of a libel, it is a high misdemeanour: and if so, should not the party be bound over to answer for it? What could be more just, or necessary? "My lords, (said the noble and learned lord) suppose for a moment, that you should stand upon so miserable and decrepid a state, that publications of a most inflammatory nature are scattered over every part of the country, and you have no power to call the mischievous authors to immediate account: suppose that, in this season of imminent danger to the morals and loyalty of the people, it happens to be the long vacation, and that no proceedings can be had in the Court of King's Bench, or at the Quarter-sessions of the peace,—would not this be a perfect suspension of all energetic faculties on the part of the State? If this were, indeed, the law and practice of the country, your lordships would not be justified in adjourning, even for a day, without passing some act on this subject to protect both the Government and the people against the dangerous and wicked attacks of seditious libellers. Nothing, however, is more common; and I need only appeal to those who know any thing of the practice of the Court of King's Bench, whether, on the last day of term, motions are not constantly made that persons may be continued on their recognizances, many of which are given for libels." The noble earl seemed to think that recognizances never attracted the attention of the Court; but this was not correct. In the case of Hogg, the defendant was personally to appear in the Court of King's Bench on a certain day, then and there to answer to all such matters and things as should be brought against him, and so on from day to day; so that he was from day to day considered in attendance on the Court. At the period of the revolution, when, no doubt, the noble earl and all their lordships would admit, that liberty was established in this country on a more sure and solid foundation than had been known for centuries before; at that auspicious moment, when so many errors and illegal practices were corrected, sureties for the peace were given in cases of libel. He held then in his hand a list of a series of recognizances that had been entered into during the office of every Attorney-General, from the reign of William and Mary to the present time. (Here Lord Grey asked across the table, "Before indictment found or information filed?" Yea (said Lord E.), before indictment found or information filed. He would mention the names of some of the most eminent persons who had filled the office of Attorney-General during that period. They were Northey, Lechmere, Raymond, Sir Dudley Ryder; but, in fact, the practice was followed in the time of every Attorney-General down to the present year. Could any body say, then, that this practice was not founded on law? Would any body state, that it had been only introduced in very recent times by Attorney-Generals, who were hostile to the liberties of the people? Lord Camden had said in his speeches, two or three times, that a libel was a high offence; and he had never said that it was not such an offence as a party should be held to answer. For his own part, he had not the smallest doubt, nor had he ever heard any thing suggested by any person of the least authority, during the whole course of his practice at the bar, or since he had had the honour of a seat on the bench, that the authority of a magistrate to hold to bail did not extend to cases of libel. If the authority of Hale, of Hawkins, of Camden, and of Coke were to be relied on, they all spoke expressly and explicitly on the subject; and if the practice from the Revolution down to the present day were not sufficient to establish this point, there could be no safe guide for any man in the exercise of his judicial or legal duties. He wished no person to be screened from delinquency, neither did he desire (God forbid!) that any one should be improperly harassed or teased; but, upon the fullest consideration of the subject—and he begged to assure their lordships that he had paid the utmost attention to it—he was decidedly of opinion, that justices of the peace have power to hold to bail in cases of libel.)

Lord Erskine said, no man could be more friendly disposed than himself towards the noble and learned lord who had just sat down; nor could any one entertain a greater respect for the two gentlemen who had given the opinion which formed the subject of this discussion. He trusted also, that he was not behind the noble Secretary of State, in wishing to repress and punish those blasphemous and seditious libels which it was the object of that opinion to meet. He could by no means agree, however, either in the opinion of his noble friend, or of the two learned gentlemen on this subject. His noble and learned friend on the woolsack would remember, that, on the breaking out of the French Revolution, this country was inundated with seditious libels. The whole evidence on the trials at the Old Bailey was made up of

libels published in all parts of the country; but he would ask their lordships, and particularly the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, that if the law was then so clear that justices of the peace could hold to bail for libels, why did it happen that in no one instance such practice had been adopted? Whatever evils might attend the libels that were now diffused, nothing could be more dangerous than to strike at the authors without some warrant of the common law, or some statutory declaration on the subject. Lord Chief Justice Hale, in the passage referred to, was treating of felonies; and there he says, that justices of the peace may apprehend for a felony; but he afterwards narrows that proposition thus:—A justice of the peace may make a warrant in felony as well as in a case of the peace: (Now this, said Lord E., is not of the peace, as was held in Mr. Wilkes's case): but whether a justice of the peace can do so in some particular cases is doubtful. The noble and learned lord opposite (Lord Ellenborough) had said, that their lordships were there on the plainest case in the world—in a case of common law, which was known to every lawyer at the bar, and acted upon by every justice of the peace. If so, why did the noble Secretary of State think it necessary to take the opinion of the law officers of the Crown? Why did he not write his letter of instructions to the magistrates at once? If the law was so clear, and had been so uniformly acted upon, why did he take that opinion? Did the Attorney and Solicitor-General venture to say that this was such a general practice as his noble and learned friend had stated? No; they only said, that the contrary opinion had not been established. Let their lordships consider what evils might result from investing the ordinary magistrates with this discretionary power. Was there ever an instance within this country, for centuries past, of a magistrate going into a bookseller's shop to look for libels, and then, on his own authority, holding the party to bail? Yet this might be done; if the present opinion was law. Could any thing be more dangerous to the security of the subject? The judges had no authority without the Legislature to say what is a libel; but it was now to be left to magistrates, frequently without learning, sometimes without education, to decide at their own will and pleasure. (Hear, hear.) He thought, that what his noble friend behind him (Earl Grey) had stated to be the law was the law; and he denied that the magistrates had power to commit in such cases. If the magistrates had it, why did it not extend to the judges themselves? He would only say this—that when he was counsel, and during all the time he practised at the bar, he never had the smallest idea that a justice of the peace could hold to bail for a libel. (Hear, hear.)

The Lord Chancellor said, that after having heard the very able speech of the noble earl (Grey), he had no difficulty in acknowledging that the case had been argued with such ability as held him in some degree of check, while, at the same time, he declared, that he could not agree with him. In delivering his own opinion on this great question, he desired to enter his most solemn protest against being bound to adhere to it, beyond that night. His reason for saying this was, that many of his Majesty's subjects had been held to bail for libels; and if they had been unjustly arrested, they might bring their actions against the individuals who had so held them to bail; and, therefore, he could not think it would be fit for any noble lord in that House to suppose, that any opinion which he (Lord Eldon) might give that night should conclude him, if he heard any parties argue at that bar, on a writ of error, that the proceeding was illegal. (Hear.) He had been upwards of forty years in the profession, and it was his duty to give his opinion; but if it was an erroneous opinion, he was bound to retract it. The motion went to the production of the case, on which he should say only a very few words, not out of disrespect to the noble earl, but because it would not be necessary, in his view of the subject, to detain their lordships long on that head. Nothing would have induced him to give his consent to the production of the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, knowing the mischief that frequently attended the production of such documents, if the noble Secretary of State had not made that opinion part of his letter. The opinion stated three propositions:—that the Secretary of State may commit, that a justice of the peace may commit, and that a judge may commit; by which (said his lordship) must be understood the judges who are mentioned in the 48th Geo. III. This opinion was of itself of great importance; and were he to panegyrisé the present Attorney-General, he was persuaded that he could not say half enough of him, for an abler man did not exist. His objection, however, to produce the case was this: that it was hardly possible on any such occasion that some particulars should not be stated by the Ministers of the Crown which it would be highly improper and inconvenient to disclose. It had been said, that the letter of the noble Secretary was wholly without a precedent; but this was not correct. In the year 1794 a proclamation was issued, requiring the magistrates to take notice of the great number of libellous publications which were industriously circulated at that period, and to do their duty. For his part, he had no hesitation in stating the principles upon which his conduct as Attorney-General had been founded. It never had been his disposition to regard the case of an ordinary libel on the Government of the country with any peculiar jealousy or vigilance; but when he saw that a system existed, the object of which was, by means of these libellous publications, to overthrow the Government, he was satisfied that it was an evil which required to be suppressed with a strong hand. This was the state of things in the years 1793 and 1794. A design was pursued of subverting all the constituted authorities and establishments, civil and ecclesiastical, and of destroying those morals without which there could be neither social happiness nor political security. It had been decided again and again, that a blasphemous publication was a libel; and, with respect to the uniform opinions of the law officers of the Crown on this subject, to which the noble and learned Chief Justice had referred, he would ask with the utmost amity and good humour, whether his noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Erskine) would not feel his own opinion confirmed on any question by the concurrence of such eminent lawyers as Sir S. Romilly and Sir Arthur Piggot? He must however again declare, that he would not be concluded by the legal doctrine which he maintained that night, if any subject of his Majesty should think proper to discuss the point at the bar of that House in a writ of error. He only stated the present impressions of his mind on this subject; he had spent the greater portion of his life in a Court of equity, and was therefore but partially conversant with criminal matters. When he found, however, that Mr. Northey, Lord Hardwicke, Mr. Justice Willes, Sir Dudley Ryder, and Lord Mansfield, had all, in the office of Attorney-General, proceeded upon these warrants, and had sanctioned similar proceedings afterwards in their judicial characters, the presumption, at least, must be that such a practice was perfectly legal, unless the authority of those great men was to be set aside by that of persons of the present day, of some ten or fifteen years' standing. The power was vested, not to be exercised for the oppression, but for the protection of society. The authority of Hale and Hawkins was, he contended, in favour of the existence of the power, although some passages might be cited from which it might be possible to draw a contrary inference. The authority of Mr. Justice Blackstone was appealed to, but it was not on all questions of legal difficulty that the noble lords were content to abide by the doctrines maintained by that writer. He must confess, that the "Commentaries on the Law of England" was a work which reflected infinite credit on its author, but it was estimable as an exhibition of diligence rather than as a great law authority. With respect to the practice that had been adopted in these cases, he found, that in Trinity Term, in the third year of George the First, the recognizance of Thomas Kinnersley, who was held to bail by a magistrate on a charge of libel, had been returned into the Court of King's Bench, and a criminal information was filed against him. In the next year a similar proceeding took place against a person named Vaughan, who was prosecuted for a blasphemous publication. In the 7th and 9th of George I., and in the 7th of George II., the like cases occurred. Under every Attorney-General who had held the office, persons had been arrested for this offence, not upon warrants to seize their papers, or to enter into recognizances for their good behaviour, but to give bail for answering the charge. When he heard the opinion of Lord Camden cited, respectable as it was, he could not allow it to outweigh that of all the other judges. He denied that there was any principle in the judgment in Wilkes's case, which contradicted the legality of the power now under consideration. They were not now discussing what the law ought to be, but what it actually was; and if it was thought advisable to alter it, it would be better to bring forward a regular motion to that effect, than to attempt to do so by a side wind. He had taken a considerable share in certain transactions connected with these subjects; he was now in the decline of life, and he declared that he should feel deep regret in his retirement, if he could think that the measures which he had deemed it his duty to advise or support had trenchanted upon the just liberties of the country: but, on the contrary, he believed sincerely that they had been essential to the preservation of a Constitution, under which more practical liberty and happiness were enjoyed by the subject than in any other country under the canopy of heaven. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Holland said, he was desirous of stating at once the spirit and view which influenced him in supporting the motion of his noble friend. His immediate object was to obtain farther information on the subject. He could not be supposed to possess sufficient knowledge to engage in a legal argument with the noble and learned lords; but he did not deem it necessary to go very far into that question, after the uncontradicted and unanswered reasoning of his noble friend. He believed that an abler legal argument never had been delivered either at the bar or from the bench. It had never been asserted, that the single authority of Lord Camden was to overbalance the unanimous opinions of other judges and law-officers, although it would undoubtedly bear a comparison with that of any other name, however distinguished; and his opinion given judicially from the bench, was (he conceived) of greater weight than the practice of all the Attorney-Generals that ever lived. The principles of ship-money and general warrants had been maintained by Attorney-Generals, and it would be difficult to discover one practice, however pernicious in itself, or inconsistent with the liberties of the country, that had not been defended to the last by the law-officers of the Crown. It was not enough, therefore, on a disputed question of law, to adduce the opinions of the present Attorney and Solicitor-General, nor to cite the distinguished names of persons who had formerly held those offices. Doubts of this nature could not be properly decided, except by a reference to the great text writers, or by distinct proof of long and established usage. He knew there was a disposition, both in and out of the House, to regard Lord Camden as standing apart from all other judges; and to think, that as his noble descendant had, with singular disinterestedness, surrendered what had been bestowed on that great lawyer as the reward of his public services, we might also safely surrender the principles and opinions which he had so ably and honourably maintained. In that elaborate judgment which he had pronounced after a solemn hearing in the well-known case which had been alluded to, it was distinctly laid down, that the power of a Secretary of State and of a justice of the peace to hold to bail were not convertible terms. There had not been one decision in favour of the power at the common law, for conservators of the peace to commit on a charge of libel. If, then, a magistrate had such an authority at the present day, from whom did he derive it? Justices of the peace must be regarded as creatures of the statute law, and where was the statute which invested them with any power of this description? He might be told that this argument would prove too much, for that their power to commit on charges of felony, or breach of the peace, depended altogether upon usage; but it was too much to say, that the offence of libel could be included under those general denominations; nor were the same reasons applicable to the practice. In the former case it was uniform, constant, and uncontrolled. To the ten or twelve cases cited by the noble and learned lord, as decisive of the legal question, he would oppose the circular letter itself of the noble viscount, as ample proof of the uncertainty of the law; because, otherwise, such a letter would have been unnecessary. When the proclamation was issued in the year 1793, why had not this point been clearly explained? The mode, however, then adopted, of calling the attention of magistrates to the subject was much less objectionable in a constitutional view. He held the issuing of that letter to be itself a misdemeanor, for which, if it were not for his privilege, the noble viscount himself might have been held to bail. The principle of the law was not that a single justice should exercise the same jurisdiction in all cases as the justices assembled in sessions. In none of the cases alluded to had the legal point been contended; and with respect to the argument of danger to the country from the non-existence of such an authority, did not the old constitutional proceeding by indictment furnish any security against the commission of offences? The practice of committing at all previous to indictment was not of great antiquity; and though they had been told that they should be in a miserable state, if magistrates could not hold to bail immediately, he did not conceive that any mischief would happen, except that a libeller might possibly remain at large for two or three months before his trial. But let the House look at the consequences the other way, and reflect how long an innocent man might be detained in prison. In the north of England this might be for a period of ten months. The noble viscount had introduced French law into the country; he had taken away the discretion of the magistrate; and whilst Mr. Sergeant Hawkins treated this power as one that ought to be tenderly used, the noble viscount was for extending its application to all cases in every part of the country. This was a subject which demanded investigation; it was not only an unconstitutional proceeding in its remote tendencies, but was immediately calculated to disturb the harmony and endanger the security of the country. He had heard that one magistrate had already declared, that in case of his exceeding his authority, Government would certainly indemnify him. All this imposed a grievous responsibility on the noble viscount, which he hoped he would one day feel. Should the noble and learned lord (Ellenborough), when acting on his oath as a judge, correct the opinion which he had that day expressed, and Government should be placed in the cruel dilemma of seeing magistrates, for having acted in obedience to their injunctions, incurring heavy penalties, and applying to them for indemnity, he could not imagine, if the noble viscount had the feelings of a man, a more painful and distressing situation, unless he should be disposed to go one step farther, and trample on all law and justice. He had occasionally approved of the noble viscount's measures when at the head of affairs in this country, although he thought his administration generally founded on a principle of intolerance. He had felt gratitude to him for the peace he had negotiated, and for the good humour with which he had let down the harsh and domineering character assumed by the preceding Government. The affairs of Europe were now, indeed, greatly changed: but he trusted the noble viscount would not relinquish his other title to the esteem of the country and to the approbation of posterity. He believed that a distrust and jealousy of the people was not natural to his temper, but he had of late assumed an attitude of menace, and done more to curtail the liberties of the country in the last three months, than he had done all his life before to defend them. Nothing could be more short-lived than a system of propagating false alarms, in order to undermine the securities of freedom. He thought the letter in question a strong evidence, and a serious part of that system; and must therefore, on these grounds, give his vote in support of the motion of his noble friend.

Lord Sidmouth, considering that the main object of the debate had been already obtained by the legal opinions which had been elicited, should think himself inexcusable if he attempted to strengthen the arguments already adduced, by any observations of his own. When he had the satisfaction of hearing it proclaimed in that House, that the measure which he had thought it his duty to adopt, was conformable to the opinion of the highest legal authority in the country (the Lord Chancellor), and of the Lord Chief Justice of the kingdom—when he found that it was conformable to the opinions of the greatest text-writers on the law, and also to the recorded practice of all the most eminent law servants of the Crown, both before and after they had attained the highest judicial situations—he felt it would be presumptuous in him to attempt to add any weight to this mass of dead and living authorities: but there was another point on which he should think it a matter of great self-reproach, if he could not vindicate himself to their lordships. It seemed that he stood before them charged with having used his best endeavours to stop the progress of blasphemy and sedition. To that charge he pleaded guilty; and while he lived he should be proud to have such a charge brought against him. In the Report which was laid before the House at the beginning of the session—a Report which had been attacked, but not shaken—mention was made of the unremitting activity which had been employed throughout the kingdom in circulating, to an unprecedented extent, at the lowest prices, or gratuitously, publications of the most seditious and inflammatory nature, marked with a peculiar character of irreligion and blasphemy; and tending not only to overturn the existing form of Government and order of society, but to root out those principles upon which alone any Government or any society can be supported. When he (Lord Sidmouth) concurred in that statement, he knew it to be true; but what he then knew, he had since seen confirmed with much greater force. He knew that unparalleled efforts had been made to carry into every village and cottage in the manufacturing districts, the poison of these seditious and blasphemous doctrines. He had himself seen the effects of this system on some of the misguided men; and had heard them freely confess, that it was the influence of this poison which had taken them away from their regular duties: that up to the time of their being assailed with those publications, they had been industrious and well-affected members of society; but that themselves and hundreds of their unfortunate neighbours, had been corrupted by the insidious principles disseminated by itinerant hawkers of blasphemy and sedition. A greater number of people could read now, than at any former period; they were better informed, and, he was sorry to say, the ale-houses were much more frequented, and greater bodies of men brought together. Such being the case, the magistrates became alarmed, and applied to him for instructions. In consequence, he asked the opinion of the law-officers of the Crown as to the best method of checking the progress of this dreadful evil. Perhaps the noble earl would say that he ought not to have taken any such opinion; but the House would, he trusted, think differently. The noble earl would say, that the proceeding should have been by indictment; but let the House, before it sanctioned such a proposition, consider what the state of the country really was. What had been the answer of some of those itinerant vendors of poison, when they were told that their traffic was illegal?—they said, “We know that we are acting illegally, but you cannot touch us till the quarter-sessions.” In the mean time they could go on in their shameful trade, adding offence to offence, and with an increased momentum propagate their mischiefs up to the very moment of trial; and then, perhaps, abscond into another quarter. All this, however, he was aware, could not make that law which was not law before; but at the same time it shewed the necessity of exercising extraordinary attention to the most vigorous measures for protecting the public peace and safety. He was ready to avow all that he had done, and would readily take upon himself all responsibility for his acts, be the consequences what they might. He felt conscious that he had endeavoured to serve his country, and he was happy to know that his efforts had not been unsuccessful. As to the particular point before the House, he had thought it proper to produce the opinion of the law officers, because he was apprehensive that if that opinion were withheld, it might operate injuriously to the real understanding of the subject. But if the opinion were examined, it would be seen that there was no reference to any particular case: and, indeed, if there were any case, the production of it would add no new light to the question then before them.

The Bishop of Chester rose to offer some explanation respecting Mr. Wright of Liverpool. He had never given any opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of the conduct of the magistrates towards that gentleman, but had merely related what he had heard—that he had unpugned a fundamental doctrine of Christianity.

Earl Grey begged leave to detain the House with a few observations in reply. First, as to what had fallen from the reverend prelate, he had merely drawn an argument from the case of Mr. Wright, as to the difficulty which must occur in deciding what is and what is not libel; and had inferred, from the representation made by the reverend prelate, that prejudice, passion, habit, interest, might occasionally influence the decision of the magistrates, when it appeared that a man had been held to bail for opinions not only common to Unitarian Christians, but even to distinguished prelates, as the reverend prelate well knew, (meaning Dr. Law, the bishop’s father.) This was the way in which he had stated the case, and, therefore, he trusted that he should be acquitted of any even unintentional misrepresentation. He now resumed the main subject of discussion. If he felt a strong opinion on bringing forward his motion—if, after a long investigation, he had arrived at a conviction of the correctness of his views, that opinion and that conviction had been in no degree shaken by what he had heard that night. When he came down to the House, he felt of course considerable distrust as to the certainty of his opinions, knowing that he was to be opposed by the highest legal authorities; but having listened to the noble and learned lords with the utmost attention, and with a sincere desire of conviction, he must say that all their arguments rather strengthened than weakened his own opinions; for he had never in his life heard any thing more jejune and unsatisfactory than the reasoning of those learned lords. He called for law, and they gave him authority; he called for deliberative discussion, and they had given him bare assertions. They had served him as Falstaff was served, who asked for six yards of satin, and was called upon for security.—Hence the noble earl restated the principal grounds of his legal argument, and insisted that the authorities of Hale, Holt, and Hawkins, had not been in the slightest degree shaken by the noble and learned lords. The opinion of Lord Holt, indeed, one of the most important, had been passed totally unnoticed by those on the other side. It was curious that all these authorities, which made for his argument, had been assumed by the noble and learned lords as making for them; and one of them even asked, with a sort of sneer, whether the opinions of such grave and venerable men were to be set aside by modern lawyers of 10 or 15 years’ standing? The persons whom he (Lord Grey) had consulted were not tyros in their profession, but men of long established and tried reputation: nor could he understand the sarcasm of the noble and learned lord, unless it had a covert allusion to the new Solicitor-General, who had been promoted to his office after a shorter experience in his profession than any man before him. The noble and learned lord had quoted a great many cases of persons held to bail, and had asked, with an air of triumph, were not these precedents of the legality of such proceedings? The learned lord’s cases went for nothing. Were his cases of recognizance sanctioned by the practice of Attorney-Generals? So were general warrants. Were they defended in Parliament? So were general warrants. Was it not known that Secretaries of State and Attorney-Generals had declared general warrants to be legal? And yet, when they came before a court of law, they were by the judges unanimously declared to be illegal. So in this case he would say, they ought not to abide by the opinions of the legal servants of the Crown, but they ought to look to the solemn decisions of judges delivered in Court after deliberate discussion. Such decisions he had produced in favour of his argument, while nothing but vague assertion had been produced on the other side. And here he must protest against quoting, as decisive authority, the opinions of the paid officers of the Crown. He meant no disrespect in using that term: he used it merely to describe that situation which should make their opinions be regarded with a constitutional suspicion.—He now came to the speech of the noble Secretary, who, with a tone of great self-satisfaction, had taken to himself the credit of stopping the progress of blasphemy and sedition. He supposed that the noble lords on his (Lord Grey's) side of the House were as little friendly to blasphemy and sedition as the noble viscount; but the question was, whether the noble viscount had not over-stepped the bounds of law, and endangered the Constitution which he talked of saving. With respect to the report on which he grounded his measure, and which he pretended had been unshaken, it was well known that that report had been impeached in some of its most material facts, which had been contradicted by the petitions of highly respectable persons. As to the fallibility of the evidence on which the noble viscount had too much trusted, he (Lord G.) would refer to the proceeding at the Norwich sessions, where Mr. Steward Alderstone having, in consequence of Lord Sidmouth's circular, desired the grand jury to pay particular attention to houses used for the purposes of seditious meetings, the grand jury had unanimously reported, that, to the best of their knowledge, there were no such houses within their precincts.—The noble earl then, in reference to an observation of the Lord Chancellor, remarked, that the alarm and danger in 1794 were certainly greater than now; for then the doctrines of the Age of Reason were in full vogue, were supported by persons of some eminence, and were countenanced by the progress of the French revolution. The noble viscount, indeed, had given a strange reason for his belief of the increase of danger:—he said, that the danger was greater, because more people read and were better informed than formerly. What! did he mean to say that the Christian religion stands on such infirm ground, that an increase of danger was to be apprehended from an increase of knowledge? He was astonished to hear such a doctrine; nor was the opinion of the learned lord (Eldon) more correct when he compared those general directions given on occasions of emergency to magistrates with the official interference of the noble viscount who undertook to explain particular points of law. To what would this doctrine lead? Would the noble doctor (a general smile), now that he had taken a new diploma in law, proceed from instructing the magistrates to instruct the judges of the land? The noble lord looked alarmed at such a supposition, and yet he (Lord Grey) maintained, that the one course was equally justifiable with the other. There was not a jot of difference in principle, though there probably would be in the result; for he could easily conceive the indignation with which the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench would receive such a letter of directions from the noble viscount, notwithstanding his present argument in favour of its legality. The slow process of the law, as it had been termed, had not on former occasions been found injurious to the State. There was a sufficient power at present to check dangerous libels effectually by the Attorney-General's ex-officio informations, which had been used severely enough, and which he could keep suspended over the heads of persons, without bringing them fairly to trial, and in many cases not acted upon; besides other powers, which, taken altogether, were quite sufficient for the purposes of deterring or punishing. But in the present matter, where had slept the vigilance of the Attorney-General all the time of the danger? The noble lord had spoken of some man apprehended, who ascribed all his errors to the publications complained of; but he (Lord Grey) looked at this description of evidence with the same suspicion. It was the declaration of a man placed at the mercy of the Government, and who might hope to gain favour by making it. But the noble lord seemed to think that the evil originated in November. If these great evils commenced then, why was so much time lost by the Attorney-General, or those who directed him, in the official informations, or other proceedings? How happened it that the circulation of the mischief was so long permitted? This appeared to be an extraordinary omission. With respect to blasphemous parodies, he thought, in common with others, that such productions should be restrained; but by the ordinary course of justice. But this disposition to profane parodies had been used for certain purposes on former occasions; and improper and profane as they were, they were pretended by some to be made in support of religion. He would recommend the noble lord, and the friends who surrounded him, to consider well the case of sending persons before a magistrate on charges of this nature. He held then in his hand a publication called the Anti-Jacobin, which contained a parody of this description, and which he would take the opportunity of reading to their lordships:—

Couriers and Stars, sedition's ev'ning host,
Thou Morning Chronicle and Morning Post,
Whether ye make the rights of man your theme,
Your country libel, and your God blaspheme,
Or dirt on private worth and virtue throw,
Still blasphemous or blackguard, praise Lepaux!

And ye five other wandering bards that move
In sweet accord of harmony and love, Coleridge, and Southey, Lloyd, and Lamb, and Co.
Tune all your mystic harps to praise Lepaux!

"Prestley and Wakefield, humble, holy, men,
Give praises to his name with tongue and pen!
Thelwall, and ye that lecture as ye go,
And, for your pains, get pelted, praise Lepaux!
Praise him, each jacobin, or fool, or knave,
And your cropped heads in sign of worship wave!
All creeping creatures, venomous and low,
"Paine, Williams, Godwin, Holcroft, praise Lepaux!"

— and — with — join'd,
And every other beast after his kind.

"And thou, Leviathan! on ocean's brim
Hugest of living things, that sleep and swim;
Thou, in whose nose, by Burke's gigantic hand,
The hook was fix'd to drag thee to the land,
With —, —, and —, in thy train,
And — wallowing in the yeasty main,
Still as ye snort, and puff, and spout, and blow,
In puffing and in spouting, praise Lepaux!"

Now it appeared that a Mr. Hone had been proceeded against for publishing some blasphemous parody; but he had just read one of the same nature, written, printed, and published, some years ago by other people, without any notice having been officially taken of it. He wished to learn what the distinction was that the Government and the Attorney-General were to make respecting such productions. If a publisher was now to be proceeded against for such writings, as insulting religion and undermining the safety of the State, he apprehended that the authors of the Anti-Jacobin, whether they were in the Cabinet or in any other place, should also be found out, and visited with the penalties of the law. (Hear.) The construction of libels must, in a very great degree, depend on the particular ideas and views of an individual. It was extremely difficult, generally, to decide on the true character of what constituted a libel, and the measures now adopted were particularly dangerous. On the whole of the subject, he was satisfied with the views he had given of it; and he should certainly take the sense of their lordships on the question.

The House then divided.

Majority against the motion . .	—56

The following is a copy of the Circular Letter from the Secretary for the Home Department to the Lords Lieutenants of counties:—

Whitehall, March 27, 1817.

My Lord—As it is of the greatest importance to prevent, as far as possible, the circulation of blasphemous and seditious pamphlets and writings, of which, for a considerable time past, great numbers have been sold and distributed throughout the country, I have thought it my duty to consult the law-officers of the Crown, whether an individual found selling, or any way publishing, such pamphlets or writings, might be brought immediately before a justice of the peace, under a warrant issued for the purpose, to answer for his conduct. The law-officers having accordingly taken this matter into their consideration, have notified to me their opinion, that a justice of the peace may issue a warrant to apprehend a person charged before him, upon oath, with the publication of libels of the nature in question, and compel him to give bail to answer the charge. Under these circumstances, I beg leave to call your lordship's attention very particularly to this subject; and I have to request, that if your lordship should not propose to attend in person at the next General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, to be holden in and for the county under your lordship's charge, you would make known to the Chairman of such Sessions the substance of this communication, in order that he may recommend to the several magistrates, to act thereupon, in all cases where any person should be found offending against the law in the manner abovementioned. I beg leave to add, that persons vending pamphlets or other publications in the manner alluded to, should be considered as coming under the Hawker's and Pedlar's Act, and dealt with accordingly, unless they shew that they are furnished with a licence, as required by the said act.

I am, &c.

SIDMOUTH.

To his Majesty's Lieutenant of the County of Chester.

OPINION of the LAW OFFICERS of the CROWN, referred to in the above LETTER.

We are of opinion that a warrant may be issued to apprehend a party charged on oath for publishing a libel, either by the Secretary of State, a Judge, or a Justice of the Peace.

With respect to the Secretary of State in the case of Entick v. Carrington, as reported by Mr. Hargrave, though the Court were of opinion the warrants which were then the subject of discussion were illegal, yet Lord Camden declared, and in which he stated the other judges agreed with him, that they were bound to adhere to the determination of the Queen v. Derby and the King v. Earbury, in both of which cases it had been holden, that it was competent to the Secretary of State to issue a warrant for the apprehension of a person charged with a scandalous and seditious libel; and that they, the Judges, had no right to overturn those decisions.

With respect to the power of a Judge to issue such warrant, it appears to us that at all events, under the statute of the 48 Geo. III. ch. 58. a Judge has such power, upon an affidavit being made in pursuance of that Act; a Judge would probably expect that it should appear to be the intention of the Attorney-General to file an information against the person charged.

With respect to a Justice of the Peace the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Mr. Wilkes's libels only amounts to this—that libel is not such an actual breach of the peace as to deprive a Member of Parliament of his privilege of Parliament, or to warrant the demanding sureties of the peace from the defendant; but there is no decision or opinion that a Justice of the Peace might not apprehend any person not so privileged, and demand bail to be given to answer the charge. It has certainly been the opinion of one of our most learned predecessors that such warrants may be issued and acted upon by Justices of the Peace, as appears by the cases of Thomas Spence and Alexander Hogg in the year 1801. We agree in that opinion, and therefore think that a Justice of the Peace may issue a warrant to apprehend a person charged by information on oath with the publication of a scandalous and seditious libel, and to compel him to give bail to answer such charge.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, May 12.

MANUFACTURE OF FLAX.] Mr. Curwen presented a petition from Samuel Hill and William Bundy, of Camden-town, in the county of Middlesex, joint proprietors of certain machines for preparing flax and hemp in the dry state from the stem, without undergoing the usual long process of dew rotting or water steeping, for which the said parties had obtained his Majesty's letters patent. It set forth, "that the petitioners, after great expense and much labour, had discovered a process, by rendering certain machinery subservient to manual labour, of breaking and preparing flax and hemp in a dry state from the stems of the said plants, superseding the necessity of dew rotting or water steeping, and that by these means nearly three times more of the fibrous parts, uninjured by fermentation and decay, are obtained from the same produce per acre, at half the expense, and in a less number of hours than has hitherto required weeks by the old method; that, to effect this purpose, the stems of flax and hemp, when dry from the field or stack, are passed through two machines, the first called a breaker, the second a rubber, after which it is completed for spinning by a third, which performs the operation of heckling, all which being of a portable construction, the largest requiring the space of three feet by four only, are well calculated for giving employment to cottagers and the lower orders of the people at their own homes, as also to the labour of paupers in workhouses, and convicts in prisons and penitentiaries and houses of correction; that by the petitioners' improved process much time and expense are saved, while the deteriorating effects of bleaching are obviated, as flax, hemp, and tow, thus prepared, are rendered equally white and fit for use by washing in soap and water only; that, from the petitioners' improved mode of preparation, the additional quantity of flax, hemp, and tow, which would be procured from the 120,000 acres supposed to be employed in the cultivation of these crops in Ireland, Scotland, and England, would afford an increase of employment in the several operations of preparing, spinning, weaving, and washing, to upwards of 700,000 persons, and an additional annual return of 25,000,000*l.* when manufactured into linen; that besides these advantages derivable by the farmer and the manufacturer, the general prejudice entertained by the landholders against the growth of these crops would be removed, as the chaff produced in the operations of breaking and rubbing is found to be excellent food for cattle, and would consequently, like that of other crops, make a due return to the soil in the shape of manure; that the petitioners humbly presumed to be of opinion, that a general adoption of their process would greatly increase the produce of the crops of flax and hemp, and consequently the value of the land in Great Britain, and particularly in Ireland, and in the course of a few years render the country wholly independent of foreign states for these naval supplies; and the petitioners humbly conceived that their invention might be of great national importance in the cultivation of waste lands by the plough or the spade, and of great domestic relief in affording constant employment to many thousands of the labouring classes at that season of the year when out-door work is difficult to be procured; and they humbly requested that the House would be pleased to afford them an opportunity of proving these their allegations before a Select Committee of the House appointed for that purpose, in order that the attention of the nation might be called to an object of such internal political consequence."—The petition was referred to a Select Committee, composed of Mr. Curwen, Lord Castlereagh, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Rose, Lord Lascelles, Mr. D. Gilbert, Mr. Brougham, and several others.

ROCK SALT.] Mr. Rose brought up the Report of the Committee on Rock Salt, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

RYAN'S CASE.] Mr. H. Addington presented the dates of the report of the Recorder of London, the warrant for execution, &c. in the case of Patrick Ryan, pursuant to order of the House, which was ordered to be printed.

GAME LAWS.] Mr. H. Addington brought up returns of persons confined under the Game Laws. The Game Preservation Bill was then read a third time and passed, with the addition of a clause to authorize the seizure of persons going at night with engines or instruments for the destruction of game.

CLERGY REGULATION BILL.] This bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Friday next.

POOR EMPLOYMENT BILL.] This bill was read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.

ARMY ESTIMATES.] The House resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, when the Army Estimates, and the second Report of the Committee of Finance were taken into consideration.

Lord Palmerston said, that in rising to propose the estimates for the present year, his labour was much diminished, in consequence of the Report then on the table, the details of which would enable gentlemen to understand the subject much more accurately than they could from any explanation of his. He wished particularly to call their attention to the general comparison, made in the 26th and 27th pages of that Report, between the sums voted for Army Services in the years 1815 and 1816, and the sums estimated for the year 1817. The total amount of diminution which had been gradually effected up to the present period, was 1,800,000*l.* The number of men to be kept up would be less than last year by 55,343, including officers, and also the force intended for service in India and France. If the comparison were made upon the numbers actually chargeable to the United Kingdom, it would stand thus:—In 1816, the total numbers were 133,505; in 1817 they would be 92,606, making a diminution of 40,899. Whether those reductions would be entirely satisfactory or not, he could not presume to determine; he was sure, however, that they would be so to the House generally; and they afforded an incontestible proof that Ministers, since the last estimates were voted, had not been insensible to the sufferings of the people. With regard to reductions, generally speaking, they could not be effected by a mere stroke of the pen. When they came to operate upon establishments which were various in their transactions, complicated in their details, and scattered in position, nothing but the greatest labour, perseverance, and zeal, could be productive of any ultimate advantage. It was to that labour, that zeal, and that perseverance, he was now indebted for the power he possessed of stating such large reductions. The total amount of military force which had been disbanded since the latter end of the year 1814 (the earliest moment at which it was possible to commence the work of retrenchment), was 221,794, which included 86,794 militia. In the cavalry each troop had been reduced from 75 to 55 men, and to 35 horses. In the Foot Guards considerable reductions had also been made. In the miscellaneous charges there was a reduction of 337,000*l.* In the recruiting establishments eight depots were reduced, and six districts, four in this country and two in Ireland. Five Detachment Paymasters were also reduced. By these and some minor reductions, a saving in the Recruiting Service alone had been effected to the amount of 131,000*l.* In the Staff, at home and abroad, there was a diminution of 90,426*l.* as compared with the votes of last year. Two hundred and fifty-seven staff officers had been reduced. In the public departments, various sums had been saved; but he wished the House to observe, that the decrease of expense in the office of the Commander-in-Chief did not amount to more than 20,000*l.* The reason was, that a new source of business had originated from the very reductions that had taken place. The number of officers who were reduced upon half-pay, but who still hoped to return to active service, caused an infinite variety of applications to be made to the Commander-in-Chief, stating past services, and founding thereon their claims to future employment. He was sure the House would sympathize with what he might call the distresses of many of those deserving individuals, and would not wish to deprive the Commander-in-Chief of the means of at least answering their applications, by which they would be satisfied, that though their solicitations could not be immediately granted, they were not wholly overlooked. In the Pay-office also, the business had necessarily increased.—The noble lord next went into a statement of the labours of his own office, and observed, that they had been materially augmented, partly from the diffusion of education, for he received each week from 900 to 1000 letters, from persons of the lowest rank in life, containing inquiries after private soldiers, whether alive or dead, if dead, what effects they died possessed of, and other matters. He knew it was difficult, by any specific proof, to shew the exact amount of duty which any particular office demanded; but when he mentioned that during the year ending the 31st of March, upwards of 100,000 letters had been sent from his office, he apprehended the House would not consider that the labour was trifling. He had, however, effected some reductions, rather in anticipation of less business than in consequence of its actual diminution. They were so made as to render the amount considerable, without extending to many persons. In the higher situations of about 800*l.* a year, the clerks were reduced from six to four; two others of from 600*l.* to 400*l.* were also reduced; and likewise the master examiner of army accounts, a situation of 1,200*l.*; and another examiner, appointed in 1797, with a salary of 1,095*l.* In the Adjutant-General's Office there was a saving of 3,197*l.* and in the Commissary-General's of 1,714*l.* In Medicines and Hospital Expenses there was a diminution of 33,000*l.* In the Volunteer Establishments there was a saving of 3,447*l.* as compared with the votes of last year. With respect to the troops in France, the House were aware, that the vote for that service was taken merely pro forma; no part of the charge would actually fall upon the public. In the expenses incurred for the maintenance of the Military College, a diminution to the amount of 5,661*l.* had been made. The gallant general at the head of that establishment, was the first to set an example of reduction. When the list of salaries, &c. was submitted to him for his opinion, as to the utmost practicable retrenchment, he immediately drew his pen through the 500*l.* per annum allowed him for table money. Such an act of disinterestedness was highly honourable to that gallant officer, but could surprise no one acquainted with his character. (Hear, hear.) He accompanied it, however, with the remark, that though his private means enabled him to make the sacrifice, it would be unjust to expect the same from any successor not possessing those means; as it would be impossible for a person filling that high station, to maintain it with due dignity and effect, without such an allowance for his table expenses. With respect to the army pay and attached allowances of general officers, an arrangement had been concluded upon those heads, pursuant to the recommendation of the Finance Committee. The estimate of this year, for Foreign Corps, was less than the votes of last year by 237,000*l.* In Widows' Pensions there had been, from obvious causes, an increase of 5,085*l.* In the Royal Military Asylum there was a diminution this year of 6,951*l.* In the Compassionate List, Allowances of his Majesty's Bounty, and Pensions to Officers for Wounds, there was an apparent increase of 99,000*l.*; but in reality, the increase did not amount to more than 9000*l.* He would take that opportunity of stating what it was the intention of Government to adopt with regard to pensions granted to wounded or disabled officers, in consequence of the recommendation of the Committee. According to the present arrangement, the pension increased in proportion as the rank of the officer increased, in cases where it was granted for severe wounds, the loss of a limb, &c. Where the wounds were not so severe, the rate of pension remained fixed according to the original rank. In future, however, all pensions so bestowed, would continue according to the rank in which the wound was received. In the Local Militia there was a diminution of expense amounting to 70,500*l.* but in the Superannuation Allowances there had been an increase of 7,602*l.* In the Exchequer Fees there was a diminution of 92,663*l.* the necessary consequence of the general reduction which had taken place in the aggregate amount of the votes proposed. The whole amount for the service of the present year was 6,682,318*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.* but of that 2,888,000*l.* had arisen from services wholly unconnected with the actual charges for the effective military force. They belonged to past services, so that the real charge for the army proposed to be maintained was scarcely more than 3,794,000*l.* Now, when they considered what had been the charge for our military establishments in former periods, the extensive range of our colonial possessions, and that the pay of the soldiers had been more than doubled, such a sum could not be fairly regarded as excessive. In 1793, the army estimates were 3,920,000*l.*; or, if it should be objected that the war was then begun, in 1791, they were 3,098,000*l.* He would not detain the House any longer, but merely move the first resolution, "That a number of land forces not exceeding 121,035 men, (including the forces stationed in France,) and also 15,585 men proposed to be disbanded, and 1,869 men proposed to be transferred to the Indian establishment in the year 1817; but exclusive of the men belonging to the regiments now employed in the territorial possessions of the East India Company, or ordered from thence to Great Britain, commissioned and non-commissioned officers included, be maintained for the service of the United Kingdom and Ireland, from the 25th day of June 1817, to the 24th day of December following.

Mr. Calcraft thought the force still kept up much too large. The noble lord should have told the House, why he did not conform to the example of 1792, which was referred to last year. He would not say that the number should be exactly as it was at that period, but he was bound to say that the great additional force now demanded, was unnecessary. It was incumbent upon the noble lord to explain the necessity for such an increase. He (Mr. C.) had last year objected to the numbers proposed to be stationed in different places, and he was told that the numbers recommended by him were perfectly inadequate; yet he now found them in 5 or 6 cases reduced to that very number. The Ministers generally acted upon suggestions of hon. gentlemen on his side of the House, though at first they might affect to reject them. The noble lord had done so in the present instance, though he was a full year in arrears in doing it. (A laugh.) The deductions that had taken place were owing to the restraints imposed by that House in withholding the income-tax and the malt-tax, those sources of immense revenue; and to the discussion that had taken place on the army estimates. The impression made throughout the country by those means, had produced great benefit. He was aware that discontent and disturbances had existed, but they arose from the great burden of taxation. Would internal tranquillity, then, be promoted by the expense of this great army which an impoverished people were required to maintain? Was military force better than a quiet and prosperous country? He did not think so. He did not mean to go into details, but he would ask with what decency officers in foreign corps could hold half-pay from this country, while they had full pay elsewhere? This was contrary to the principle of all regulations on that subject. He had received a letter, representing, that while the officers in our army who were discharged after the 24th of June, 1814, enjoyed the new rate of half-pay, those discharged before that period were restricted to the old. This appeared to be arbitrary and unfair, more especially when the partiality to foreign officers was considered. He suggested the necessity of reducing some of the departments, particularly the office of Commander-in-Chief. If he had had any hopes of support, he would have moved for a reduction of the number of troops, as he thought them too great a force for this country in a time of peace.

Mr. Lyttelton wished to urge a consideration of one thing to which he had formerly adverted. Officers on half-pay in the army and navy were obliged, before they received their pay, to swear that they did not enjoy the emoluments of any other office under the Crown. This regulation might, for anything he knew, have had some reason in its support at the time it was made, but it was quite unreasonable to continue it. He allowed, that reduction of establishments, instead of radically relieving distress, was sometimes only the means of transferring it from one class to another; but an adherence to the rule he had mentioned could have no plausible argument to justify it, considering that the officers enjoyed their half-pay as a remuneration for services performed; and that they should be allowed to exert themselves to improve their condition in any other manner they chose. We had paid as much as we could; we had granted them all the remuneration which their services could receive from us; and if we could do no more for them from the public purse, we should not at least restrain them from performing those duties, and reaping those advantages, which they could perform and enjoy as well as others. Their income sometimes was barely enough for subsistence, while the addition of one hundred, or fifty pounds a year, would give them comforts. He hoped Government would pay attention to this circumstance, and alter the regulation on which he had animadverted.

General Walpole thought the establishment for the colonies too high, particularly when he compared the number of troops maintained in Jamaica and the other West India Islands, in 1792, and at the present period. In 1792, the force in Jamaica, was only 1200 men.

Mr. Warre likewise objected to the estimates, on the ground of extravagance. He particularly animadverted on the unnecessary increase of the life-guards and blues, troops employed only for splendour and parade. The staff of the colonies was likewise too expensive. In 1792 the charges for the staff in Jamaica were only 864*l.*; in the present estimates they amounted to 4,682*l.* The total charge for the staff appointments of the colonies in 1792 was only 17,000*l.*, now it was 74,000*l.* He allowed that we had made great additions to our colonies, but our establishments were disproportioned to the augmentation of our empire. The staff for the Leeward Islands alone exceeded this year that of the whole of our colonial possessions in 1792. The increase of this head of service was as remarkable in Great Britain as abroad. In 1792, its expense was only 16,600*l.*; in the present year it amounted to 39,000*l.*—The hon. gentleman expressed his satisfaction at the last article in the estimates, the compassionate list; and would even support a small increase in that charge, if it should be considered necessary.

Lord Palmerston was surprised that the hon. gentleman who spoke first, (Mr. Calcraft) did not give Ministers some credit for reducing the establishments to their present scale, especially as he seemed to think that they had proceeded on his recommendation. The hon. gentleman had objected to the half-pay given to foreign corps, which might still be employed in another service on full pay; but foreign troops employed in our pay, when disbanded, could not be called back like our own half-pay officers. They enjoyed their half-pay rather as a reward for past services, than as a retaining fee for future employment. With regard to the observation of an hon. gentleman (Mr. Lyttelton) about the prohibiting of half-pay officers from enjoying other places of emolument, he would say nothing at present, but that the Government would take the subject into consideration. In the mean time he did not think the regulation so groundless as had been stated. The establishment of the life-guards and blues was complained of as being too high; if they were to be kept up at all, they must be kept in a state of efficiency. Instances had occurred since the meeting of Parliament, in which they had been extremely useful. With regard to the increase of the colonial staff, it might be explained from the change of system that of late had taken place, rather than from any extravagance on the part of Government: and as long as the present military organization continued, we could not recur to the scale of the staff in 1792. The addition to the charge for the compassionate list, would be sufficient, though he allowed, with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Warre), the full merits of this head of expense.

General Fergusson did not mean to deliver an opinion on the extent of the establishments.—He merely rose to call the attention of Government to the subject of the relief of troops in the West Indies. He allowed that much good had resulted, and would result, from the system already acted upon, of relieving whole regiments or companies at once, and not detaching them, as formerly, in one place, filling up their casualties by draughting from other regiments.—The contrary custom had for a long time prevailed. He knew of four companies of the artillery corps who had remained in Jamaica, the first 27 years, another 21, and another 15 years. Those unhappy men despaired of ever seeing their homes again: they viewed themselves as destined victims of destruction; and the consequence was, they surrendered themselves to every kind of irregularity and debauchery: their crimes increased with their miseries, and their punishments with their crimes. Their punishments were greater than those of any other troops. Thank God, the discipline of our army had improved, and the necessity of punishment diminished of late; but there could be no discipline, and punishment would fail of producing any effect, where the situation of the persons was hopeless, and where reformation or good conduct could be of no avail. At Fort Charles, in Jamaica, surrounded on three sides by the sea, and on one side by a marsh, the garrison was in such a state of insubordination and want of discipline, that 300 men received 54,000 lashes in the course of two years! The necessity for this arose from despair. Relieve the troops at regular and stated intervals, let them enjoy the certainty that they will not be required to spend all their lives in an unhealthy and unfavourable climate, and discipline will produce the same effects there as at home. Instead of this, the men were driven to desperation by seeing their friends fall around them. Out of 85 rank and file, with numbers perpetually renewed, 200 had died in the course of 15 years, and two companies in the same period had lost 700 men. It was no economy thus to leave men to die. He was sure that the Commander-in-Chief, had this service been under him, would have taken steps to remedy such dreadful evils. The terror of being sent to the West Indies was sometimes, he heard, hung over refractory and unmanageable individuals. (Hear, hear.)

General Phipps thought, that the gallant General should have given some notice of this attack on his noble relation, (Lord Mulgrave) the Master-General of the Ordnance. He could state, however, that officers were not threatened with being sent to the West Indies; and that arrangements had been made for preventing, in future, a long stay of any particular companies or regiments, in those islands.

General Fergusson denied that any attack was either made or intended on Lord Mulgrave.—Some of the facts he had mentioned, occurred 27 years ago,—long before the noble lord was at the head of the ordnance department.

Mr. Ponsonby said, the House were much obliged to the hon. and gallant General, who intended no attack, for the observations he had made, and for the explanation which he had drawn forth, that the system was changed.

Lord Nugent, not being able to discover any difference whatsoever in the principle of the estimates now proposed, and very little indeed in the amount of them, from those of last year, against which he cordially and strenuously voted, could not but give his firm and decided negative to the propositions of to-night. The noble lord (Palmerston) had told them, that he had reduced these establishments to their lowest possible scale, consistent with the public safety. "Sir," (said Lord Nugent), "I hope that noble lord will not suppose that I mean any thing personally offensive or disrespectful to him, if I say that I cannot trust that assurance. I cannot trust that assurance, because it is precisely the same as was given us last year, under the same circumstances, from the same quarter—an assurance, which, not a fortnight afterwards, was abandoned and disproved by the very persons who had given it. The estimates, which were last year recommended to us, as being reduced to the lowest scale, consistent with public safety, were withdrawn to be further reduced, were brought forward again in their reduced shape to the Committee, and, in that reduced shape, received the very same support, and were still considered as of the precise amount which should answer every object of public safety. This, Sir, is the reason why I profess myself unable to trust the assurance of the noble lord. The expense of the proposed establishment, on which so much has been said, (important, certainly, as that consideration must be, in the present exhausted state of national resource,) is now, I think, the lowest and weakest ground on which the opposition to these estimates can be placed. Indeed, Sir, I am far from thinking, that even the patronage and influence, which this disproportionate peace army perpetuates in the hands of Government, form by any means the head and front of the objection one naturally feels to such a proposition. For my own part, I freely own that I fear, first and mainly, the actual armed force of 130,000 soldiers in time of peace, in the pay of the King, and at the disposal of an Administration, whose motives I suspect, and to whose political principles I cannot subscribe. This, Mr. Chairman, is my fear, very much increased, certainly, by the reflection, that, by dint of twenty-five years of war, the existence of a large army is not only rendered familiar to our habits, but is, as it were, identified with the interests and domestic views of a great majority of the families of England—I mean by the number of commissions borne in that army. I know, that to such a point has public opinion on this subject arrived, that those old-fashioned alarms and jealousies, which our forefathers in the best times entertained of a standing army, are now considered as little more than as subjects of common-place declamation. Sir, I am heartily sorry that it is so. I wish to God it were otherwise! But, inasmuch as it is so, in so much do I think it is the duty, the bounden duty, of every man who feels rightly and jealously for the free constitution of his country, to remind his fellow-subjects, that at least such a spirit once was felt in England, that such doctrines once were held sacred—doctrines to which we owe that Constitution and that freedom, and, without which, they would be soon left naked and defenceless before their enemies. Sir, I look to the history of the world, and I find no instance, in any times, or in any country, in which a free constitution has ever long survived a disproportionately large military establishment in time of peace. Nay, I go farther, and I say, that I find no instance in which a free constitution has been ever finally overthrown, or public liberty permanently subdued, through any other agency than that of a standing army. These are my opinions—these are my sentiments—opinions and sentiments which, whatever pain (from reasons quite immaterial to the House) they may have cost me in the utterance, I can never either abjure or disguise."

Mr. Curwen thought, that before a vote was taken for such a force, the state of our finances should be ascertained and disclosed. Ministers had defended the estimates on the plea of necessity; but the danger arising from our financial difficulties, might be sufficient to outweigh the necessity.

Sir W. Burroughs objected to the enormity of the estimates as compared with those of 1792. We were now in a state of profound peace, and on good terms with all the world. The noble lord had answered every question but the only one of any importance,—What reason there was for the difference between the present year and 1792?

Mr. Goulburn deemed it unfortunate for the hon. baronet, that he had not been present on former occasions; had he heard the arguments adduced by that side of the House, (a laugh,) he would have known the reasons for the difference.

It had been admitted, even by hon. gentlemen on the other side, that the circumstances of the times justified a large establishment in England. (Hear, hear.) And as for the colonies, he contended that, from their great increase, an additional force was necessary. The state of the country in 1792, was so dissimilar to what it is at present, that no comparison could be fairly drawn between them.

Sir W. Burroughs observed, that if 20,000 men could maintain the peace of India, whose population was 60 millions, it shewed that the moderation of the Government, and consequent affection of the people, was a much greater safeguard than military force; but was this the case here? Did George the Third reign enthroned in the hearts of his subjects? If he did, where was the necessity for such a force in England and in Ireland? As to the alleged unfairness of the comparison of 1792, he had found that, even in 1793, there were but 15,000 troops for Great Britain and Guernsey. It was true, there was also a militia force; but he was convinced, that groundless apprehensions had led Ministers to the present enormous establishment; and he hoped they would endeavour to rule the people rather by their affections than by the sword.

Lord Castlereagh said, as to the order that prevailed in India, and the facility of governing that province with a small army, it was because French revolutionary principles had never been heard of there; that was the reason why India was less disorganized than Britain, unfortunately with all her loyalty. He appealed to the proprietors in Jamaica, whether the estimate was too high for that island? and to the proprietors of the Leeward Islands, whether they thought it too high? The only points that demanded explanation were England and Ireland. Of the number for England, 3,000 were destined for reliefs; and then, out of 23,000, more than 16 or 17,000 effective troops could not be calculated on at all times. The country certainly must, in a great degree, rely on the yeomanry for safety, but they could not be called out without inconvenience, nor could they be expected to serve in docks and other places, where regular troops were constantly necessary. It was an operose thing to call them together from 20 or 30 miles round; and no one could say, that in the present temper of the country, the laws could be maintained with a smaller force than had been proposed.

Mr. Calcraft observed, that the noble lord had not given the shadow of an answer to the question, why the establishment, which in 1792 was 41,000 men, should in 1817, a period of profound peace, be 85,000.

Lord Castlereagh expected, that the hon. gent. having differed from the sentiments of the House last year and this, would have made some proposal of his own.

Mr. Calcraft thought the sense of a part of the House altered, and that more would this year deem a standing army unconstitutional than had done so last year.

Mr. Brougham still required proof, why such an establishment as that at present proposed was necessary. The whole of the noble lord's argument rested upon the alleged necessity of a large military force to do the police duty of the country; what, then, could be more in point than the existence of 35,000 yeomanry, not one of whom was known in 1792? But then it was not easy to collect them on a sudden! Were there not constables? Were there not magistrates? Was there not a posse comitatus? Was everything to be performed by the military? all government to be carried by force, and none but soldiers trusted? (hear, hear.) We had power quite sufficient to keep the peace till the yeomanry assembled; and yet the noble lord had taunted honourable members for calling this a period of profound peace. So that, after all the great big boasts of diplomacy, after all the feats performed by the noble lord (for there were not wanting those who would contend that he, and not the Duke of Wellington, had gained the battle of Waterloo,) we were to be disappointed in finding that this was not a period of profound peace. But how did the noble lord get rid of the question, which went to the difference between the establishments of two years of profound peace? The hon. member for Rochester (expecting that Ministers would come down upon him with their colonies, "Don't take away Malta, don't endanger the West Indies, don't lose the Isle of France,") had deducted from his calculation the amount of force allowed for the new colonies, and there then remained 85,000 men for the old settlements, which in 1792 had been guarded by 44,000. No attempt had been made to budge from this statement. As to the negligence of the system in 1792, he was willing to admit it: but why, therefore, double the number of men? If the discipline of the troops was so much improved—if the merits of the Commander in Chief were so effective, (and no man was more ready to admit this than himself,) why, when the discipline was doubly better, was the number of troops increased in the same degree? This was so inconsequent, such a non sequitur in reasoning, that he left it to the noble lord, and the other logicians on the Treasury-bench, to solve the problem. It had been alleged, as the cause of tranquillity and easy government in India, that French revolutionary language had never been heard of there. The very reverse was the case, and revolutionary doctrines and language were never more ripe in that quarter, than when its affairs prospered so much under the administration of the Marquis Wellesley. But what had that to do here; and what is the real state of this country? In 1792 the French revolutionary principle was not blown upon, disgraced by cruelties and excesses, and affected as at present; it was in a state of youth and vigour, in a state comparatively innocent, and wearing a face of general philanthropy. Even they who lived in those times, and warned us against the danger of this principle, if we had now the benefit of their counsels, would be the first to acknowledge that this was not the time to act from a blind or pretended terror of danger that no longer exists, but the time for recurring to true English principles, to those principles under which the power and liberty of England had risen to their present eminence. He would call on any one gentleman, the most alarmed of the whole, (for instance, the Under Secretary of State for the home department) in the plenitude of his alarm (a laugh), with all the acumen which he possessed (a laugh), sharpened by that alarm, to state what ground there was for fear. He perhaps would refer to files of letters he had received, but he (Mr. B.) would call on him to look to the result of the different quarter sessions. Though there had never been such a multitude of offences (more especially in the districts that had been denounced), there never had been so few political delinquencies. In the West Riding of Yorkshire, at the Pomfret sessions, holden for the whole Riding, the Chairman had expressed his satisfaction to the grand jury, that there were no political offences, and that he did not think it fitting to read to them a certain circular sent by a certain nobleman to instruct magistrates in the law and their duty; and he was the less willing to read it to them, as he had received a hint to do so. (Hear, hear.) At Preston there were 200, at Liverpool 400 criminals at one quarter sessions, but among them all one only was indicted for libel, and one for seditious words, uttered four months before, in a state of such brutal intoxication that he was suffered to go free on his recognizance. At Norwich an inquiry had been made by the grand steward, and the result was an unanimous verdict, that no trace of seditious meetings could be found in that city, followed by a congratulation from that distinguished magistrate, on the triumph of loyalty over the ex parte statement laid before the committee. (Hear, hear.) Such was the state of the country, and there was no man who could state disturbances more recent than the tumult of Spa-fields, or at Manchester. It had been urged that even he had acknowledged the necessity for a strong force in Ireland: he would not draw back from that admission, but he could not help reminding the House under what circumstances Ireland stood. Had we done any thing to conciliate Ireland? and had we any means to conciliate her? The argument that we had not, might do very well from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or from the Secretary for Irish affairs; but there were one or two on the other side who were stopped from using this argument. The noble lord (Castlereagh) was stopped: his colleague (Mr. Canning) was stopped: for if their zeal was sincere (and in a Parliamentary view he could not dispute their sincerity—as an individual he wished he could not) they could not say that there were no measures by which Ireland could be conciliated. If they were sincere, it was strange (to those who were unversed in the mazes of political intrigue) that a part of his Majesty's Ministers, holding that Ireland could be tranquillized by any concessions, and willing to make those concessions, should hold fellowship with those who thwarted them, who would not allow the adoption of their measures for the public safety, who rode and lorded it on the Catholic question, but who would not be suffered to remain twenty-four hours in office, if they ventured to oppose the amount of the army estimates. (Loud and repeated cheers.) These things were inexplicable to those who were not versed in political intrigue and Cabinet arrangements. However, he sincerely agreed with his noble friend (Lord Nugent) on the policy and justice of ruling in the hearts of the people rather than of domineering over them by military force; and he congratulated him on sentiments as much above all despotic views and illiberal prejudices, as a truly noble mind was above those who looked only to shuffling and sneaking after place. (Hear, hear.)

The resolution was then read again and agreed to, after which the following resolutions were successively put and carried.—“That a sum of 1,237,371*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* be granted to complete the sum required for defraying the charge of his Majesty's land forces for service in Great Britain; and on stations abroad (excepting the corps stationed in France, and the regiments employed in the territorial possessions of the East India Company),” from 25 Dec. 1816, to 24 Dec. 1817.—A sum of 438,405*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* net, “to complete the sum required for defraying the charge of his Majesty's land forces for service in Ireland,” from 25 Dec. 1816, to 24 Dec. 1817.—A sum of 111,548*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.* “for defraying the charge of general and staff officers and officers of the Hospitals serving with his Majesty's forces in Great Britain and on foreign stations (excepting France and India),” from 25 Dec. 1816, to 24 Dec. 1817.—A sum of 35,266*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.* net, “for defraying the charge of general and staff officers, and officers of the Hospitals, serving with his Majesty's forces in Ireland,” from 25 Dec. 1816, to 24 Dec. 1817.—A sum of 153,775*l.* 6*s.* 7*d.* “for defraying the charge of the allowances to the principal officers of certain public departments in Great Britain, their deputies, clerks, and contingent expenses,” from 25 Dec. 1816, to 24 Dec. 1817.—A sum of 8,828*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.* net, “for defraying the charge of the allowances to the principal officers of certain public departments in Ireland, their deputies, clerks, and contingent expenses,” from 25 Dec. 1816, to 24 Dec. 1817.—A sum of 15,000*l.* “for defraying the charge of medicines and surgical materials for his Majesty's land forces on the establishment of Great Britain, and of certain Hospital contingencies,” for 1817.—A sum of 11,446*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.* net, “for defraying the charge of medicines and surgical materials for his Majesty's land forces for service in Ireland, and of certain Hospital contingencies,” for 1817.—A sum of 57,500*l.* “to complete the sum required for defraying the charge of volunteer corps in Great Britain,” from 25 Dec. 1816, to 24 Dec. 1817.—A sum of 15,865*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.* net, “to complete the sum required for defraying

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, May 13.

[LIBEL LAW.] Lord Erskine, advertent to the late discussion on the powers of justices of peace to commit for libel, observed, that it was impossible a question of such magnitude and importance, should have been fully considered and discussed in the course of one night. A great deal more must be done in order to understand what the law really was on this subject, and it was on that account he thought proper now to mention, that it was his intention to move for the recognizances returned to the King's-Bench and Quarter Sessions in cases of blasphemous and seditious libels, and of all the indictments tried at the sessions in such cases. He could hardly believe it to be law, that a justice of peace should have the power of doing that in cases of blasphemous and seditious libels, which, as had generally been conceived, could not be done till the case had been submitted to two juries, and by them found against the libeller: but if it should turn out that such was the law, then he would never rest till it should be altered. He had, when a young man, stated to Lord Mansfield, that he expected to live to see the law of libel altered, and he had lived to see his opinion as to the necessity or expediency of an alteration sanctioned by the Legislature. No one could be a greater enemy to blasphemy and sedition than he was—no one less disposed to throw improper or unnecessary obstacles in the way of the ordinary administration of the Government: but though he was an enemy to blasphemy and sedition, he was no friend to the attempt to suppress them in any other mode than by the application of the old and ordinary law of the land. He was not much inclined to prophesy confidently as to the future; but if it really was law that a justice of peace might commit to prison a person charged on oath with the publication of a libel, that justice being the judge whether the publication was or was not a libel, he would venture to say, that the pressure of public opinion must be so strong against such a law, that the Legislature would find it necessary to alter it. Neither judge nor justice of peace ought to take upon themselves to determine what was or was not a libel, without the verdict of a jury: and if it was the law that a justice of peace might commit to prison in the manner now contended for, then the late libel-law might be thrown into the fire.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, May 13.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir N. Colthurst presented a Petition from the city and county of Cork, in favour of Parliamentary Reform. He was sorry to dissent from the opinions of any of his constituents, but he was persuaded that this petition did not contain the sentiments of the great body of them. He differed from the assertion of the petition as to the necessity of Reform—he did not think that the present distress arose from the want of Reform, or that the late war had been carried on against the wishes of the people. He was persuaded on the contrary, that the votes of the House on that subject always went hand in hand with the wishes of their constituents.—The Petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

UNDUE REMISSION OF PUNISHMENT.] Mr. Bennet begged to call the attention of the House to a subject that affected the administration of criminal law in this country. He held in his hand a petition of Thomas Griffiths, a Stationer and Paper-Hanger, living at No. 230 in Oxford-Street, setting forth, that in March 1816, Robert Hoy, Esq. (who commonly called himself Captain Hay) a man of fortune, hired lodgings in the house of the petitioner, where he, together with his wife and children, took up their residence for a short period—that the petitioner was married to a young and very pleasing woman (by whom he had three children,) whose conduct and character were irreproachable, and who had ever been remarkable for her strict attention to all the duties incident to her station in life—that in consequence of the said Robert Hoy's having so become acquainted with the petitioner's family, he affected to take a great interest in their welfare, and after he had left the petitioner's lodgings was in the habit of calling, under pretext of making small purchases in the shop—that on the 24th of December last, about twelve o'clock at noon, the said Robert Hoy called at the petitioner's house, (the petitioner being then from home,) and most brutally and indecently assaulted his wife, and made an attempt on her person—that the said Robert Hoy was tried for this offence at the Sessions House, Clerkenwell, on the 18th of February, and to the surprise of every one set up an alibi—that the statement of Mrs. Griffiths, who, of course, was the principal witness, was confirmed by the neighbours, and the witnesses whom Hoy adduced to prove the alibi were completely disbelieved by the Jury, as was proved by their verdict—that the Chairman in summing up stated, that he never recollected a case in which more barefaced and impudent perjury had been resorted to in defence of a prisoner, and recommended the petitioner to prosecute the principal witness, (John Lane, a Coachmaker, of Edward-Street, Cavendish-Square) who was now suffering punishment for his crime—that the Jury without hesitation found Hoy guilty, and the Chairman in passing sentence on him remarked, that the magnitude of his crime was increased by the defence set up, and that it was necessary to make an example of him—that he was then sentenced to be imprisoned twelve months in the House of Correction, and to pay a fine of 20*l.*;—but the petitioner had discovered, that after an imprisonment in the Governor's house of only a few days, Hoy was privately discharged by an order from the magistrates (by means which the petitioner prayed might be inquired into) on paying the fine of 20*l.* without any communication having been made to the petitioner, and upon some ex-parte statement made by the defendant, and the petitioner had in vain attempted to discover the names of the justices who gave the defendant his discharge. The petitioner therefore complained, that he had sought for justice in vain against a rich man; that this guilty person, who had committed such an atrocious outrage on a married woman, and had attempted to set up a defence supported by the most malignant perjury, still more injurious to her reputation, had been merely imprisoned a few days in comfortable apartments, and paid a fine of 20*l.* while the petitioner, the injured party, had suffered great anxiety, and been put to great expense for medical attendance on his wife; had to pay the costs of two expensive prosecutions, one instituted at the express desire of the Court, and the individual at whose hands he had received such aggravated injuries and insults was now walking abroad, and had been seen parading triumphantly before the petitioner's door, exulting in the pride of his oppression, and the glory of his wrong.—The hon. member said he should, after the petition had been laid on the table, move for copies of the indictment, and the order for the discharge of Hoy; and if the case turned out as had been represented to him, he should submit a motion to the House on the subject.—The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

ARMY ESTIMATES.] The Report of the Committee of Supply was brought up, and the first Resolution, for the number of Land Forces, having been read a second time,

Mr. J. P. Grant, in order to give time to inquire into the means of the country before the Estimates of the Army were finally fixed, proposed an Amendment, to limit the duration of the present Estimates, by leaving out "December," and inserting "September" instead thereof.

Mr. Banks objected to the motion. He was inclined to agree to the Estimates for the present year, not pledging himself as to the future. Ministers, he observed, did not present the Estimates as a system of permanent establishment. They had done more this year than he could have expected. Great savings had been made in the public departments, particularly in the charge for extra labour and allowances to the clerks.

Mr. Calcraft was much inclined to doubt whether it could be the member for Corfe Castle whom he had just heard speak. Last year the hon. gentleman appeared to have taken an enlarged view of the state of the country, the relations of Europe, the necessities of the colonies, and the condition of Ireland, and he then proposed a reduction of 35,000 men; but now, he who valued consistency more than any other man, he, who professed the most unwearied zeal for economy, expressed his surprise at the exertions of his Majesty's Ministers. Why did not the hon. gentleman shew the necessity for this great establishment? He (Mr. C.) was decidedly of opinion, that 10,000 men, rank and file, might be spared. A greater reduction, he believed, might be effected: but this proposition was most moderate, and still allowed 30,000 more than the peace establishment of 1792. The hon. gentleman who had reasoned so sensibly last year upon a peace establishment, and the financial resources of the country, could not withhold his support from this reduction. The noble lord (Palmerston) had stated the actual expense of the army for this year at 3,794,000*l.*; it was, in fact, 6,682,000*l.* As to the mode of accounting for the difference, what had that to do with those who have to pay the whole of that money? (Hear.) In 1792, the whole expenditure was 6,200,000*l.*, so that the Army Estimates alone of the present year exceed by 400,000*l.* the whole expenses of the State twenty-five years ago. Yet the other demands now were much greater and more urgent. We had an immense national debt to provide for; we had navy estimates, though these had been lately considered as a matter of minor importance. It did not become us, however, either to neglect our navy, or to forget our insular situation. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord (Castlereagh) had said, that the Yeomanry could not be regularly called upon for daily duty; but it could not be denied, that, in many cases where military duty might be suddenly required, they were the most ready of any force. The reductions that had already taken place would have great effect in that House, and he doubted not, out of the House; but he contended, that the force was still infinitely too large. Never was the country in a state of greater security. He would leave it to those better acquainted with Cabinets to declare their designs; but never was the peace of Europe placed on a firmer foundation. We had an army in France, together with the forces of our Allies. We held the peace of that country in our hands. The natural consequences should be, a reduction of our military establishments, an economical attention to our resources, and a steady application of relief to every difficulty and distress in the country; so as to establish our prosperity in peace, or to be prepared for unavoidable war. Economy in peace was the best preparation for war. The internal difficulties of the country had a great effect on the minds of many. He did not yield to this so much as some of his friends, yet he admitted there was a spirit abroad that required attention; but military force, although grounds of alarm did exist, (or rather had existed, for they were now removed,) was surely not the best security. The conduct of the people of this country in difficulty, privation, and distress, was unexampled for patience and submission. It was a pity, therefore, even on this account, if there were no other consideration, that their burdens should not be reduced. It was admitted by all, by every man out of doors, and even by the gentlemen opposite, that taxation had a considerable share in producing the present distress. Could it be otherwise? We could neither eat, drink, walk, move, live, nor die (Hear, hear.) without being loaded with taxes.

When he had the honour of proposing the repeal of a small tax (on salt), the grievous pressure of taxation was admitted, for never did the Chancellor of the Exchequer appear so gravelled as on that occasion. Yet those great, those expensive estimates, were now supported by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bankes) in the face of the spirit of his former proposal. He should merely repeat, that such conduct surprised him more than he could express; but as he was determined to do his duty to the country, he should move, when his learned friend's amendment was disposed of, to reduce 10,000 men of the proposed force.

Mr. Bankes explained, that he had not expressed himself astonished at the reductions actually made, but that they were greater than he had expected. Last year he had proposed a reduction of from 20 to 25,000 men, and the hon. gentleman magnified the number.

Mr. Calcraft said, he had proposed 23,000, and the hon. gentleman 35,000. He, anxious as he had been for retrenchment, had thought that too great a reduction.

Mr. Robinson said, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Calcraft) should have pointed out where the forces were too numerous, and how he would have the reduced forces distributed. He had stated, that in 1792, there were only 44,000 men, while there were now 85,000. The comparison was not just, for in the 85,000 was included our force in India, which was not paid by Government. It would be proper, therefore, to take out of view the Indian army, about 8000 men. In Ireland, there were 25,000 instead of 15,000. Now, it had been used as an argument on the Catholic question, that to concede the claims of the Catholics would save 10,000 men. He did not know whether concession would have that effect; but the argument implied an admission that 22,000 were necessary in the present state of that country. He was for conceding the claims of the Catholics, but he did not expect any miracle from concession, and believed the number of men in Ireland quite necessary. Here then were 18,000, of the difference between 44 and 85,000 accounted for. The army for Great Britain was 26,000 men, and the hon. gentleman would allow that an increased force at home was now necessary. Three thousand were required for our relations with India; so that there were but 23,000 in all for our home security. If any gentleman considered the situation of England at this moment, he could not say that this was too large. The hon. baronet opposite had admitted it. (Cries of no, no, from Sir J. Newport.) What then would he call a sufficient force? This statement, he thought, went to account for the difference. He did not think it necessary to inquire minutely into the colonies; but if he were to enter into that subject, he could give an intelligible reason for the increase. In Gibraltar, troops were required according to the extent of the works, the number of men on duty, the number of sentinels, &c. Now, as the works were greater than in 1792, a few hundred more men were thus accounted for. A small addition to the number of men in New South Wales could likewise be accounted for from the increased number of inhabitants, whose habits of life did not render them readily subject to control. The number was 890 men, and the wonder was, that so small a force was sufficient. In the Leeward Islands, too, a change of circumstances required an increase of troops. Of the abolition of the slave trade, for which he had given his first vote in that House, and to extend which his zeal, if not his activity, was equal to that of any man, he would never speak unfavourably; but yet it did render a greater number of troops in those islands necessary. No gentleman could regard with indifference the black population of the West Indies. Of Nova Scotia it might be sufficient to say, that our relations with the United States required an increase of force there. But it was, in truth, not an old province. In 1792 we had not a single company there; it was in that year that it was divided into legislatures; formerly it had only been lakes and forests and wilds. These arguments, fortunately for him, were not new; they were used last year, and judged satisfactory; why, therefore, should they not be satisfactory now? The reductions, as fairly admitted by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bankes) exceeded expectation.

Sir W. Burroughs still contended, that a comparison with the establishment of 1792 was proper, and that it would shew the extravagance of the present estimates. At that time we had to form our preparations for meeting a powerful foreign enemy, and opposing the diffusion of French principles: but even in that year, the force voted was very small when compared with these estimates. The whole force then for Great Britain, and her foreign possessions, was only 42,215 men; whereas the present vote was required for 92,600 men, exclusive of the troops for France and India. Could it be proved that Ireland now required thrice the amount of force to aid her police that she did in a period of internal discontent and external alarm? He would concur in the motion of the hon. gentleman for a reduction of 10,000 men, which, according to the data on which the estimates were formed, would effect a saving of 400,000*l.*, a sum by no means to be disregarded in the present state of our finances and national difficulties. It had been asked in what part the reduction of force was recommended to be effected. To this he would answer, that it ought to be distributed over the whole of our army, wherever stationed, in proportion as the public services would allow a reduction.

Mr. G. Grant dissented from the opinion of his noble friend who had proposed the resolutions, (the Secretary at War,) on other grounds than those stated by the hon. gent. opposite, who had spoken on this subject. He believed that the force proposed in the estimates was rather too small than too great. When he delivered this opinion, he should be understood as alluding particularly to the numerical amount proposed for our colonial establishments. An hon. and gallant general (Walpole) had last night stated, that, in 1792, Jamaica was protected with a force only of 1,200 men, which was found sufficient for the security of that valuable colony. The hon. gentleman might have remembered that, when he himself was there in 1795, there was a force of 5,000 in that colony, and that an army of this amount was unable, for some time, to make any impression on the insurgents, whose rebellion then endangered the island. As great a force was now necessary as at any former period, if not greater. The black population of these colonies was now in a different state than formerly. A force of 3,200 men was now inadequate for Jamaica, even although the negroes were disposed to obedience, and manifested no symptoms of discontent. To keep a body of men such as them in due subordination, and to give security to the planters, their masters, an imposing military attitude was more than ever necessary. (Hear.) Were other gentlemen in the House who were better acquainted with the resources of our West India colonies, he would have left it to them to shew their importance, and to enforce the justice of granting them adequate military protection. He would not enter into details, (though with regard to Jamaica he was enabled to do so;) but he thought he should lay sufficient grounds for a considerable force, when he stated, that the British capital in Jamaica, which required protection, amounted to 60 millions sterling. The quantity of sugar exported in 1816, amounted to 98,000 hogsheads; and paid a duty of 2,000,000*l.*, employing 21,000 tons of shipping, and 5,000 seamen. The manufactures exported to the West Indies in the same period, amounted in value to 2,000,000*l.* The distressed manufacturers of this country, therefore, were relieved to that amount by the consumption of the articles of their manufacture; and though they felt the pressure of taxes to maintain our establishments, if they knew their real interests, they would be the last to propose such a reduction of force as would endanger so large a market for the produce of their labour. He could not help remarking, that the people of this country were not sufficiently aware of the advantages they derived from their foreign possessions; and that colonial subjects, when they were incidentally mentioned, made too slight an impression on either side of the House. The more their value was considered, the more important it would appear. Great Britain had increased in prosperity, and had attained her envied political pre-eminence by the trade and resources of her colonies; and so necessary were they to maintain her in her present elevation, that, he would venture to say, her power and glory would not long survive their loss. (Hear, hear.)

From an account which had been laid on the table a few days ago, it appeared that the duties on sugar and rum alone amounted to within half a million of the ordinary charge of the whole army, which, excluding the half-pay and allowances, &c. amounted to 3,794,000*l.* Colonies that contributed so much to the wealth and resources of the mother country deserved from her the most ample protection. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Milton was not surprised at the warmth of the last speaker, who came to the House with great local knowledge, and a greater bias to local interests, perhaps, than a general view of the empire would warrant, and who naturally conceived, that when measures of general good interfered with particular local arrangements, Government were negligent of their duty. He (Lord M.) looked more at general than local interests, and believed, that Government ought not to be swayed too much by the suggestions of individuals, who took only a partial view of matters. With regard to the subject before the House, he could not help remarking, that our forces were every where increased; and a strange reason was given for the increase in some of our garrisons—as in Gibraltar; where, because the works had been rendered impregnable, we had thought it necessary to multiply their defenders. He called upon Ministers to explain the necessity of this increase. To come to particulars, why was such a force to be kept up in England? Were our dangers now greater than in 1793?—if so, what had we been fighting for? We had been fighting gloriously, and as he thought wisely, but what had become of the fruits of our victories? Were our successes gained only to entail on us war establishments after they had led to peace; and not to enable us to reduce our burdens by affording us security? If the present period was fraught with more danger than 1792, and if on that ground double the force was to be maintained, he despaired of ever seeing the country enjoy a period of security, or of returning to diminished taxation and peaceful habits. An hon. gentleman on the floor (Mr. Banks), who surely now thought that we had arrived at a period of peace, and that we were not in that intermediate state so much talked of last year, appeared disposed to support establishments now which he formerly opposed. Every one was allowed to form an opinion, and he could not help expressing his on the present occasion; which was, that the hon. gentleman resisted the proposed motion for reduction because it had not originated with himself. (Hear, hear.) He was, perhaps, doing him injustice, when he stated this opinion, as his conduct might admit of another explanation. Naturalists had amused themselves with measuring the magnitude of objects which the optics of different animals could embrace, from observations on the size of their eyes. Some could see only a small extent around them, but within that range enjoyed a microscopic vision. The hon. gentleman seemed to enjoy this species of vision. His microscopic economy could discover small extravagancies and point out insignificant savings with wonderful precision, but he could not see large objects, or take in great reductions. (Hear, hear.) If he were to measure his optics in this way, he would allow him the power of seeing comprehensively the necessity for reducing the sixth part of a clerkship (a laugh), though unable to discover the reason for reducing 10,000 men. In the Report of the Committee of Finance there was a complaint that the clerks received extra fees for drawing up the estimates. This charge the hon. gentleman wished to abolish; and in doing so, thought he had gone far enough, and entitled himself to support an unnecessary establishment of 10,000 soldiers. Such a reduction would do more good than the Chancellor of the Exchequer's issue of bills for the relief of the poor.—He (Lord M.) objected to the estimates from the increase which the magnitude of the force would give to the influence of the Crown. The younger branches of almost all great families would be induced to select the army as their profession, and to look on its emoluments as their provision; and the character of our country would thus be changed. He pressed on Government, therefore, to reconsider the estimates. It became the House to assist Ministers in this duty, and to support them against the influence that was exerted elsewhere. (Hear, hear.) He believed they would rejoice to reduce them if they could. He believed the right hon. gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would be glad to find that he would have, amidst his financial difficulties, diminished services to provide for. (Hear.)—Adverting to the state of Ireland, the noble lord said, that it had of late been too much the custom to draw a veil over it. This might be prudent in the Administration, as the calamities of that country had arisen from misgovernment. (Hear, hear.) Why was such an army to be kept up there?—because discontent and turbulence prevailed. And why did this feeling prevail?—because Government had not done its duty. Wherever dissatisfaction long existed in a country, it was to be traced to maladministration. (Hear, hear.) The Government had much to answer to Ireland for their conduct, if, being convinced, as some members of the Cabinet professed themselves to be, that certain measures alone could save that part of the empire, and ensure its tranquillity, they neglected to carry those measures into effect, and compromised their own conscience and the safety of their country for their own interests or places. A right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) had said, that whatever other measures were necessary to promote the quietness and welfare of Ireland, there was one point indispensable, and with that we ought to commence; and yet, though this was the opinion of the right hon. gentleman, and his noble friend (Lord Castlereagh), they did nothing in consequence to shew their zeal and honest endeavours but make speeches, the value of which the House could easily appreciate. With all their professions, speeches, and votes, more had been done to shew the temper of Government, and to strengthen the cause of the opponents of Catholic emancipation, by the last appointment to the bench of bishops, (here it is presumed, the noble lord alluded to the elevation of Dr. Marsh to the Bishoprick of Landaff,) than these two members of the Cabinet had done by all their exertions. Ireland would see into their conduct, and comprehend their flimsy device, in offering themselves as her advocates. For Great Britain, he saw no reason for so large a force; the good spirit of the country was a sufficient guarantee of its tranquillity; and if any force was required, the yeomanry, proceeding from the people, and therefore not objects of distrust and jealousy like regular troops, would be found effective for all the purposes of insuring obedience to the magistrates, and affording assistance to the police. He would, therefore, vote for the amendment of his hon. friend for the reduction of 10,000 men, in preference to the motion of an hon. gentleman for postponing the estimates for three months, till the state of our finances was known. He did so because he would not allow it to be supposed that we would maintain one man more than was necessary, though we were able to do it without pressure.

Mr. Peel had stated last year that 25,000 men would be necessary for Ireland. He thought the same necessity for that force existed at present. His attention had been turned to the subject of effecting every reduction; and he could assure the House that he should find it more difficult to state why he recommended a reduction of 3,000, than why he still thought that 22,000 men should be maintained. He protested against the practice of taking the year 1792 as a criterion for establishments of every other period of peace. If he required so many troops to aid the police, or to preserve the peace of the country, it would be no answer to him that there were just so many and no more twenty-five years ago, and that they were then sufficient. The force in Ireland did not much exceed, in proportion to the force in England, its amount in 1792. After the peace of Amiens, the army in that country was 22,000 men, employed only in preserving tranquillity. For seven years after that period, including the years 1806 and 1807, and during the administration when in existence it did not amount to less than 31,000 men, exclusive of the militia. He knew that that was a time of war, but the military power was in a great degree applied to the maintenance of the public peace. In the last year but one, the entire number of troops in Ireland was 40,000; it was now proposed to keep up only 22,000, making a reduction of nearly one half in less than two years. An hon. gentleman had declared that he would not vote for one man, the necessity of whose services was not distinctly proved; but a proof of this kind was not practicable: it was not a question of science or mathematics, nor capable of a positive demonstration. He could however afford him the advantage of the highest military authority, which was in favour of a larger force than that now proposed to be maintained. The noble lord (Milton) who had so heavily censured his Majesty's Government, on the ground of these estimates, and with an allusion to a subject into the discussion of which he would not again enter, might be assured, that at every period of the last century a considerable force had been deemed necessary in Ireland. He had traced its amount from the commencement of that period, and had found that, except during the American war, when it was reduced by the supplies to our army abroad, it had never been so low as in the year 1792. In 1715 it was 11,000 men, and remained at that number till the year 1747. In the year 1764, the Irish House of Commons voted an address, expressing their jealousy of the large reductions which had taken place; and a message was consequently brought down from Lord Townsend, which contained a promise, that the army should be maintained at the amount of 12,000 men in future, to which an addition of 3,000 men was subsequently made; and so the establishment continued till the year 1792. With respect to the argument, that if the Catholic question were carried, further reductions might be safe and practicable, he could not assent to any such opinion; but the statement of his reasons for thinking differently would evidently be to revive the agitation of that subject. It was not true that this force was required for the purpose of keeping the Catholics of Ireland in subjection. (Hear.) It was necessary for the protection of the Catholics themselves, for the preservation of tranquillity, for the maintenance of public justice, and the defence of the lives of many persons who had become objects of vengeance, only by appearing as witnesses against criminals. He had heard it contended, that this state of things was the consequence of ages of misgovernment; but he would ask whether any recent change of policy would have justified an immediate alteration in the proposed vote? (hear, hear.) It would be his duty, very soon, to submit a measure to the House, which would afford him the opportunity of stating on what grounds he was prepared to argue that it could have produced no such effect. The measure in contemplation would have reference to a transaction which lately occurred in the county of Down; and its object would be, not the daunting the people, but the security of innocent and brave men against the most flagitious combinations. Let the House imagine the case of a man, whose house had been attacked only because he appealed to the laws of his country; that he had made a gallant defence, and succeeded in repelling the aggressors. Let them suppose him to decline abandoning his residence, and having obtained arms, relying on his own courage and the assistance of a relative, in the event of a recurrence of the danger; but these precautions they would have to learn were vain; that a Roman Catholic combination, of about forty, invaded his dwelling, surrounded it with combustibles, and doomed him, his son, and six inmates, to death in the flames. This, he admitted, was the most atrocious of the crimes he had yet heard of, but it was one, the recollection of which must fill every heart with horror. (Hear.) Whilst he thus endeavoured to shew the necessity of a large military force, he had never meant to contend that military force alone was the proper means of governing that country. Penal laws, likewise, might check, but could not eradicate the evil. He should ever be willing to lend his aid in revising and improving the system of the administration. It must be obvious, that he could have no interest in swelling the amount of the estimates, for the civil government of Ireland had no share of the military patronage. Let the House look at the present staff, and they would find it much less than when the force was of twice the amount. In the year 1747 it consisted of two lieutenant-generals, three major-generals, and eight brigadier-generals; and in the latter period, to which he had already adverted, of three lieutenant and ten major-generals. He might be taunted with the suggestion that this had little to do with the immediate question: but it at least shewed that the imputation which had been thrown out against his Majesty's Government, of being anxious on all occasions to extend the influence of the Crown, was unjust; and he only referred to it as a strong proof that they had, on the contrary, done all in their power to reduce every part of the estimates.

Mr. Ponsonby was always disposed to attend to the observations of the right hon. gentleman; but his speech that night was one to which he could not help listening with some degree of circumspection. On questions affecting the interests of Ireland he believed him, as perhaps he deserved to be, the most influential member in that House. When the right hon. gentleman, last session, defended an establishment of 25,000 men for that country, he regretted the long and manifold misgovernment under which it had laboured, and expressed a hope, that his own administration would not be the means of aggravating its calamities. The right hon. gentleman had this night addressed his speech, he knew not to what, but certainly not to any facts or arguments stated on his side of the House; for he did not believe one hon. member had advised any immediate reduction in the Irish establishment. (Hear.) The hon. gentleman on the floor (Mr. Bankes) had approved of the labours of the committee as far as they had gone; but why had they limited their inquiries and recommendations to the discharge of a few clerks, instead of examining staff appointments and public departments? The country was now enjoying a profound, secure, and unsuspecting peace; and yet an establishment was proposed twice as large as that maintained in 1792, when there was no yeomanry force whatever. Why was this necessary? It could hardly be from any external danger that threatened us. Of France we had military possession; Spain was in a miserable state, governed by a miserable sovereign, incapable of a single effort, and engaged in a contest with her dependencies. The powers in the north of Europe were bound to us in the strictest alliance. We had not a single enemy, nor any reason for expecting the renewal of hostilities. He asked the House to reflect also on our naval strength and pre-eminence, as a farther security against foreign danger. It was at present equal to the combined naval power of Europe. But then he was told of the internal state of England; and that a spirit was abroad that threatened the stability of the Constitution. He disbelieved the existence of any such dangerous or turbulent spirit to the degree apprehended. Distress might have driven some, in particular districts, to fall into the desperate counsels of a few mischievous individuals; but the utmost effort of their strength had been the disturbance in Spaffield, and he could not think that a sufficient ground for doubling our peace establishment with the addition of 20,000 yeomanry. With regard to Ireland, he must again say, that he would not be responsible for advising a large reduction there at the present moment; but he believed that as long as the present system of policy was pursued, it never would be safe to lessen the establishment. If, therefore, the House were determined to maintain the system, they must have the pleasure of paying for it. The fundamental objection to these estimates was one which proceeded from a regard once generally cherished in that House—he meant a regard for the liberties of the country. It had been said, that Ireland was habituated to a military force; whenever England became so habituated, and learned to abandon her ancient maxim of cultivating her naval resources as her best defence, her public liberty would no longer be secure. Why was the military college maintained in time of peace? It cost us only 30,000*l.* but it was a pernicious institution. He would appeal to the Duke of Wellington, whether it was of use either in promoting discipline or military skill. The naval asylum had met with a different treatment; that, as belonging to a less favoured service, had been subjected to the inquiries of a committee. If the House should think proper to countenance these novel principles, the responsibility was on them; but he believed, that there were few who would not live to repent of the sanction they had given to them. He would only raise his humble voice against them, as not less pregnant with danger to the liberties than to the political security of the country. One hon. gentleman (Mr. G. Grant) had appeared to think, that some in that House cared little or nothing for the colonies, and had told them a great deal about the value of Jamaica. It was, however, rather an odd proof of its importance to our resources, that the customs on its produce amounted to 3,000,000*l.* He was aware that, its rum and sugars were very useful commodities, but it was the consumers in the mother country, and not the people of Jamaica, who paid the duties. But it was curious to observe, that, wherever they cast their eyes, a fund of discontent was said to exist, the danger of which was represented as an incontrovertible argument for a large military establishment. In England it was a bad spirit; in Ireland it was a similar cause; and in the colonies it was the black population. He did not put faith in these representations; Ireland might certainly be in more desirable circumstances, but the colonies were secure under proper management. He should give his support to the motion of his hon. friend (Mr. Calcraft) rather than to that of the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. J. P. Grant), because to vote the whole establishment, for however short a time, might be construed into an admission that it was necessary.

Sir F. Flood should not have thought this large establishment necessary for Ireland, had it not been for the irritating vote of Friday night. He hoped, however, that the Irish would continue to shew the same patience and peaceable demeanour with which they had hitherto borne all their privations. The House should recollect how quiet Ireland had remained, whilst mischievous demagogues were instigating the populace here to outrages and disturbances. Under these circumstances he did not think they deserved the stigma which the late vote had thrown upon them; for no country could always be well disposed, which was deprived of the benefit of the laws. What had Ireland done to deserve it? In the last year there were fifty worse crimes committed in England. The Irish had behaved well both as soldiers and mariners; and he hoped milder laws, and their own loyalty, would soon restore happiness and tranquillity to them.

Mr. Carew urged the reduction of the army in Ireland. He thought, that that country might be left to the protection of her native force.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that if the House would permit him, he would save them the trouble of dividing, by withdrawing his motion, in order that his hon. friend near him might have an opportunity of making the motion for a reduction of the number of the forces, of which he had given notice.

Leave was given to withdraw the motion; but the Speaker remarked, that it was too late in the proceeding to make a direct motion for the reduction of the military force.

Mr. Calcraft said, it had escaped him that the forms of the House would not now permit him to make the motion to which his hon. friend had alluded; as that was the case, he should propose the recommitment of the report. With respect to the forces in Ireland and India, he should not, after what he had heard, persist in demanding any reduction. Under the circumstances in which Ireland was placed, he was sorry to say that he did not consider the establishment for that country too great, and he could not recommend any diminution of the troops for India: but there still remained a force of 20,000, from which reductions might be made, and he thought it would be a wise policy to deduct 10,000 from that number. The noble Secretary had mentioned, that 3,000 men would be wanted for reliefs, but he (Mr. C.) did not think them necessary. He then moved that the resolutions be recommitted.

Lord Ebrington could not help noticing the great inconsistency between the arguments which had been used that night, and those recently advanced, respecting Ireland. It would be recollected, that when the noble Secretary of State moved the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act, he expressly excepted Ireland from its operation, on the ground, that that country was in a state of tranquillity. After that declaration, the House must have heard with great surprise, the state of Ireland assigned that night as requiring coercive measures. With regard to Great Britain, the case who had referred to the year 1792 as affording an example of the amount of military force necessary, had been answered that the state of the country was now very different. His opinion, however, was, that the difference was not in the people, but in the Ministers of the Crown, who had during the present session shewn such a disposition to curtail the constitutional rights of the subject, and to establish arbitrary measures which were totally uncalled for. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh would trouble the House with only a few words, in consequence of what had fallen from the noble lord who had just sat down. What he had stated with regard to the situation of Ireland was this—that he saw no reason for applying to it the measures which were necessary in this country; but in making that statement, he had distinguished between that system of organization which unhappily prevailed here, and that derangement of the public peace in Ireland which rendered it expedient to distribute the military force over the whole country. He certainly had never thrown out any idea that a diminution of the force in Ireland was practicable. Having said this much on that point, he must now beg leave to remind the House, that though they were to proceed to decide on a motion for recommitting the resolutions, that question was brought forward for the purpose of letting in one respecting numbers. The hon. gentleman who proposed to bring forward this question, had, however, admitted that no reduction could be made in Ireland, or in India. It must fall then on the colonies of Great Britain; but the hon. gentleman had not pointed out any colonies in which he thought reductions could be made. Did he conceive it possible that the whole force in Great Britain could be reduced to the extent of 10,000 men? This surely could not be suggested; and yet there was no other quarter to which his scheme of reduction could be applied; for if he could mention colonies in which reductions might be made, it was obvious that the troops could not be brought home within the time to which the resolution that had been agreed to extended. He was confident, that when the alterations were considered, which had taken place since 1792, with respect to the increase of our fortresses, the size of the metropolis, and the troops employed in the collection of the revenue, the number of men for Great Britain could not be reduced. At any rate this must be obvious to every one, that the honourable gentleman could not take 10,000 from the present establishment, and leave enough for the ordinary duties of the home service.

Mr. Denis Browne said a few words on the propriety of maintaining a sufficient force in Ireland. He thought the number proposed for that country absolutely necessary.

The House then divided on the motion for recommitting the resolutions—

Sir J. Mackintosh paired off in favour of the motion.

LOTTERIES.] The House went into a committee on the Lottery Bill.

Mr. Lyttelton, after complaining that the bill had not been printed, stated his objections to the preamble, and proposed the following as an amendment—"Whereas it has been deemed expedient, to turn to account the vices of his Majesty's subjects; and whereas those vices, and especially the spirit of gambling, are generally encouraged by lotteries; and whereas it has been found convenient to replenish the public purse out of the pockets of the people, by means of lotteries, as an easy and pleasant method of raising money, be it enacted," &c.

Mr. Brogden informed the hon. member that the present was not the proper stage for proposing a new preamble. Mr. Lyttelton in consequence postponed it.

The Chairman then proceeded to read the various clauses, and Mr. Lyttelton suggested several verbal amendments. He afterwards proposed a clause by which the price of tickets should be definitively fixed. If these state frauds were continued, the public should at least be warned of the cheat; and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to set up as the arch-gambler of the kingdom, he ought to fix his terms; such practices were directly at variance with his professions of religion and morality.

Mr. W. Smith doubted the possibility of settling the price of tickets definitively.

Mr. Brougham characterized the measure as a bill for the encouragement of crimes and immorality. He animadverted on the various disgraceful schemes that were practised, to induce the public to become purchasers of tickets. The most false, fraudulent, and seductive bills were posted in all quarters of the town, in the highways, and even under the bridges. He had himself, in passing under Westminster bridge, happened to cast up his eyes, when he saw a long bill, couched in the most alluring terms, inviting the reader to buy a share, and exhibiting the portrait of a man with a large bag, pouring out guineas. (A laugh.) All these frauds, and excitements to vice, were countenanced by the right hon. gentleman, (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), but they were totally inconsistent with his superior pretensions to religion and virtue. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lyttelton took the opportunity of stating, that a gross fraud had been practised upon the public with regard to the lottery then in process of drawing; the price of tickets in shares had been raised from 20*l.* 16*s.* to 22*l.* 6*s.* under the pretence that two-thirds of the whole had been drawn; when the fact was, that only one-twelfth part of the whole number of tickets had been drawn.

The question was put upon the amendment, and it was negatived.

Mr. Bennet, in consequence of the ignorance of members with regard to the contents of the bill, from its not being printed, moved that the chairman should report progress, and ask leave to sit again, that in the mean time it might be printed.

This motion was also negatived without a division, after a short discussion.

Mr. Lyttelton then proposed, that no other scheme should be published, except that which is inserted in the London Gazette.

Mr. Brougham observed, that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not agree to this clause, he would make himself a party to all the cheats that are practised by lottery vendors.

The clause was negatived, when the House resumed, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

EXCHEQUER COURT BILL.] Mr. D. Gilbert brought up a bill "to regulate certain offices in the Court of Exchequer in England," which was read a first time.

CIVIL SERVICES RECOMPENSE BILL.] Mr. D. Gilbert brought up a bill "to enable his Majesty to recompense the services of persons holding, or who have held, certain high and efficient civil offices," which was read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, May 14.

GAS-LIGHTS.] Lord Montfort moved the third reading of a bill for incorporating another Gas-Light Company in London.

The Earl of Lauderdale objected to this bill, on the same principles on which he had objected to the bill for incorporating a gas-light company last year. As an individual, he felt no great concern about the matter, but for the sake of the public, he again repeated his warning to their lordships not to listen to petitions of this description. If they did, they would have abundant applications, and would essentially injure the mercantile interests of the nation. Every writer on the subject of monopolies had considered them as highly injurious to the community. Even the East-India company, carrying on a great and distant trade, had been condemned as pernicious to the interests of this country, where there was no want of capital, and it was well known that the great number of incorporations, for the most trifling purposes, which had been established in the reign of King William, had been attended with the most prejudicial effects. He was very far from being unfriendly to the individuals of this company, but his sense of public duty compelled him to make these objections.

Lord Kenyon said, he would not have come down to the House to support this bill, unless he had been satisfied that it was for the public advantage. In the metropolis, these things were much better conducted by a competition between incorporated companies; and, as a security to the public that the object would be accomplished, 100,000*l.* had been already subscribed.

The Earl of Lauderdale observed, that he had in the committee introduced that clause by which the company was prevented from exercising any authority until 100,000*l.* should be subscribed.

The Lord Chancellor said, that the noble earl, by introducing that clause, had done the public considerable service. There could hardly be a greater evil than allowing such companies to begin their operations until such a sum had been subscribed as would afford some security that the object would be carried into effect; and in order to impose some check upon such applications, he would endeavour to take care that these bills should be examined at an earlier stage, and that before they passed, their policy should be sifted to the bottom.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.—Adjourned till Friday.

Wednesday, May 14.

IRISH GRAND JURIES.] Mr. Cooper moved for "A return of the names of the treasurers and collectors of public money in the several counties, counties of cities, and counties of towns, in Ireland, who have made default in their several collections and payments, from the 1st of January 1810, to the present time; distinguishing the sums for which they severally made default, with the amount of any sums which have been recovered from such persons, or their sureties respectively, with the names of such sureties; also the amount of any bills of costs which have been presented by any Grand Jury in Ireland, from the 1st of January 1810, to the present time, either on account or otherwise, upon any legal proceedings instituted for the recovery of the sums due by such persons so in default, or their sureties."—The hon. member then stated, that he should not bring forward again, in this session, the bill for the better regulation of Grand Jury Presentments in Ireland, which he had recently withdrawn, though he still thought it necessary that some remedy should be provided against the abuses which existed in that system.

Mr. Peel said, that he had advised the hon. member to withdraw his bill, because he well knew how much the defects in the system of appointing sheriffs in Ireland required amendment, and he feared that the bill was so voluminous, that if it had been brought before a committee, and any objections had been made to it, a great deal of time must have been lost. He did not consider it advisable at present to repeal all the existing laws on the subject; but he had hoped, that the hon. member would have brought in a bill with a distinct remedy for the evil. If such a measure succeeded, it might be proper, at a future period, to consolidate the various enactments. In case the hon. member should not proceed, it had been his intention to introduce some regulations, if no one more competent should offer; but he had now the satisfaction to state, that his

hon. friend below (Mr. V. Fitzgerald) had prepared a bill for that purpose.

Sir N. Colthurst thought it highly expedient that some measure should be immediately adopted.

General Mathew complained of the mode of appointing sheriffs in Ireland, which he maintained was completely a job. The outgoing sheriff named three individuals, one of whom was always chosen, and who of course was attached to the same interest as the preceding sheriff.

Sir F. Flood contended, that the sheriffs were very properly appointed. The old sheriff nominated three persons to the justices, for them to chat over the appointment. The gallant general was altogether mistaken; and it was highly unjust to say that the grand jury took the most sacred oath for the purpose of a job.

Mr. Ponsonby thought it extraordinary to reject a bill before it had been examined by a committee; and though he was glad that any bill was to be introduced, he hoped his hon. friend would proceed with his measure next session. With regard to the appointment of sheriffs, though a change had been promised, he did not find that any improvement had been made, for the judges still took the names from the outgoing sheriff. He hoped that this would be altered, as the existing sheriff would always name those who were in the interest from which he had derived his own appointment.

Mr. Peel begged to explain respecting the judge he had given last year. His attention had not been called to the subject till nearly the end of the session; and immediately on his return to Ireland, he had communicated with the Chancellor on the subject. The names were still returned by the judges, and the first name was generally chosen. In answer, however, to the allegation of the gallant general, that corrupt influence was employed, he would state, that all the three persons returned for the county of Tipperary had refused to execute the office; on which occasion he (Mr. P.) instead of reverting to any local interest, wrote a second time to the first person on the list, stating that the Lord-Lieutenant had passed his patent, and that he must accept the office, which he did. So far from Government interfering in the appointment, the opponent of his hon. friend for the representation of the King's county had been just returned. The sheriff of Dublin had accepted the appointment from the Lord-Lieutenant, though he declared that he would not have accepted it had the recommendation come from a county member. He had already written to the Chancellor to desire that the judges should not take the nomination of the old sheriff, but make inquiries in the respective counties touching the character of individuals. It was impossible to do better than by asking the recommendation of the judges after such an inquiry.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald said, much more had been done by the Irish Government on this subject in a short time than could have been expected. He thought it very proper that the bill, entirely changing the system of Grand Jury Presentments, had not been pressed through the House at that late period, as due consideration could not have been given to it. He had advised the hon. member (Mr. Cooper) to bring it forward again early in the next session, and described the arrangements which he thought necessary, with a view to provide for the due execution of the law, and to guard against any frauds or defaults on the part of county treasurers. These arrangements were—first, that security should be taken from all county treasurers to the full amount of the sums which they were to receive, and that such securities should be examined and approved by the law officers of the Crown, while the securities for barony treasurers should be examined and approved by some subordinate authority;—2dly, that no one who was to account to a Grand Jury should be allowed to act as a Grand Juror;—3dly, that a longer previous notice should be given of every presentment;—and 4thly, that an assistant judge should be appointed on each circuit, for the purpose of considering and urging all traverses, &c. with respect to presentments, and in his opinion, the accounts of expenditure upon presentments, as well as the presentments themselves, should be subject to be traversed. Such an appointment would he was aware, increase the patronage of the Crown over the Irish Bail, which was already very considerable; but it was indispensable to the due execution of the law, for the judges were at present unable to attend to this department, and as to the expense, it would not exceed 2000*l.* a year for the whole of Ireland.

Mr. L. Foste observed, that the provisions of the bill which had been withdrawn were exceedingly complicated, but it was necessary to devise some means for correcting the evils of the existing system. The commissioners of accounts had too much business already to take this subject properly into consideration.

Mr. Dominick Browne strongly recommended a general survey of the land in Ireland, with a view to the fair execution of the law with respect to presentments.

Sir J. Newport concurred in this recommendation, and while he highly approved of the principles of the law with respect to Grand Jury Presentments, expressed his regret to find that the law itself had been very much abused. The amount of the assessments under such Presentments was very considerable, and as they bore hard upon the occupiers of land or the peasantry, it was peculiarly necessary to provide that they should not be improperly applied.—He understood, that even within the last year, no less than three county treasurers had failed, and their sureties were unable to supply the deficiency; this was a serious grievance, which, however, had long been suffered to prevail in Ireland. Several public accountants in that country had made default in their payments, and he feared the money would never be recovered, especially from the improvident manner in which securities had been arranged by those Crown lawyers whose duty it was to attend to such subjects. For instance, a Mr. Lysaght, who died some time ago in the county of Cork, possessed of a property of 20,000*l.* was a public defaulter to a large amount. He bequeathed his effects to different persons, and although his surety was a nobleman of high rank, not a shilling had been yet recovered for the public—but he could enter into several instances of a similar nature, particularly among county treasurers.

Lord Desart thought the hon. member (Mr. Cooper) had acted wisely in withdrawing his bill. The Grand Jury system, well administered, was highly beneficial. The money was spent among the poor, in employing them on improvements; and thus it contributed to the rapid cultivation and prosperity of the country.

Sir J. Newport explained. He admitted that the system, well administered, was a blessing; but with its vices, it was a curse.

Mr. F. Fitzgerald concurred in the general views of his hon. friend (Mr. M. Fitzgerald), but thought the arrangements which he had proposed required consideration. As to the appointment of an assistant judge to attend to the business of presentments, he had himself suggested the necessity of such an appointment in his evidence before the Committee on this subject three years ago. He had also proposed some other regulations, with regard to the question before the House, which he intended to submit to its consideration on Friday se'n-night, and therefore he gave notice of a motion for that day. As to the allusions of the right hon. baronet to defaulters in Ireland, he hoped they were not to be understood as any imputation on the conduct of the Irish Government. For himself, and for those with whom he had had the honour to act, he could say, that nothing practicable had been left undone with a view to collect the debts of public defaulters. He could, indeed, state, for the credit of the legal department, that some debts, which had been owing no less than 30 years, had been lately recovered. The right hon. gentleman concluded with stating, that he meant on Friday se'n-night, to move for leave to bring in two bills, the one referring to County Treasurers, the other to Presentments.

Mr. Cooper explained as to the withdrawing of his bill. The subject, he thought, was too extensive to be taken into consideration this session.

The motion was then agreed to nem. con.

POOR EMPLOYMENT BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in moving that the House

should resolve itself into a Committee on this bill, took the opportunity of stating, that, since the last discussion upon the subject, he had been enabled to make several amendments; but it would spare the time of the House, and promote the general convenience of members, if they allowed the bill to be committed pro forma, to have the blanks filled up, and, together with the amendments, to be printed. It could then be taken into consideration on a future day.

Mr. Brougham said, he wished to state very shortly what he considered to be the difficulties in the principle of the measure, and which he feared could not be overcome by any of its details. In the first place, he felt a very strong constitutional objection to investing certain individuals with the disposal of a sum, amounting to one million and three quarters, upon the eve of an event, which they all knew would shortly occur, namely, a dissolution of Parliament. In the next place, the offer to advance particular loans to individuals, upon such security as Government intended to require, would, he apprehended, defeat the whole measure. Not that he thought it calculated to produce those benefits which were anticipated, even if it could be brought into full operation. The evils which were now felt, arose not from the want of money, but from the want of a demand for labour. There was no deficiency of capital in the country; but there was a general stagnation of every thing that could employ capital. Besides, if there were really a deficiency of capital, he did not see how the present plan could remedy that evil. No additional capital would, in point of fact, be thrown into the money market by the issue of those Exchequer Bills. It was only an interposition of the credit of Government, to enable individuals to borrow from those who were inclined to lend upon that credit. He was quite persuaded, however, that if Government intended to exact the sort of security which it was understood they would exact, no persons would resort to them for loans. If, on the contrary, they meant to require only the common personal, or real security, which a private lender would demand, a very strong objection would be removed.

Mr. Western said, he was not in the House when the right hon. gentleman opened his plan; but from the fullest consideration which he had been enabled to give the subject, he could not discover any advantages likely to accrue from it. On the contrary, he saw many objections to the measure, which, he thought, would produce considerable mischief. It would place the opulent in a painful situation with respect to the poor, who would be led to suppose that relief was attainable, and was refused only because their rich neighbours would not come forward with securities. But suppose the necessary securities were given? Then the poor rates must be mortgaged, a procedure from which he anticipated the most mischievous consequences. The occupiers of land would be charging and mortgaging property which was not their own. With respect to that part of the money which was to be applied to the promotion of public works, he thought the arguments of his hon. and learned friend unanswerable.—It was not a want of capital that they had to complain of, but a declension in our commerce, manufactures, and agriculture, which rendered that capital useless.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer confessed that some of the objections of the hon. and learned gentleman were not likely to be overcome by any details in the progress of the measure. As to the constitutional fears which he had expressed, he did not consider them of a very serious nature. They might certainly be removed by the House paying a proper attention to the nomination of individuals who were to have the management of the funds. With respect to the question of securities, he could state, that an alteration had been made in the bill so as to dispense with that security which was at first contemplated, under certain circumstances, and to substitute special securities of various kinds. In regard to parishes, so much would depend upon the details of the measure, when it came fully under the consideration of the House, that he wished to defer all discussion upon it at present. He would mention, however, that such checks and precautions had been introduced, as would prevent general and indiscriminate applications from parishes. It would only be in cases of great and urgent difficulty that any relief would be extended to them under the operation of the bill.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that if he understood the right hon. gentleman, he had considerably narrowed the measure compared to its original intention, consequently the benefits expected from it would be encumbered in proportion. He was one of those, however, who always thought that the proposed plan was little likely to be productive of the advantages that were anticipated. The evil that was felt, originated neither in want of capital, nor in want of credit. There was capital enough in the country, and they who had sufficient credit to entitle themselves to a loan from Government, would find no difficulty, with the same credit, in going into the money market and obtaining what they wanted. In no way that he saw could the plan give any relief, except, indeed, the right hon. gentleman meant to introduce his Exchequer Bills into the currency of the country. Then some effect would be accomplished, but whether a beneficial one or not, he did not intend at that moment to argue. At the same time, he was perfectly ready to give the right hon. gentleman credit for the benevolent intentions with which he had proposed the measure.

Mr. Rose denied that any constitutional danger was to be apprehended. It was not likely that the Commissioners, in making advances of money, would be influenced by political motives. Money, he knew, might be easily obtained upon short credit, for 2 or 3 months; but it was not to be had where its return would be delayed for three or four years. Hence the utility of his right hon. friend's plan. Much good might result from it, and he was sure it could not produce any evil.

Mr. Brougham, in explanation, disclaimed any intention of holding out that the Commissioners would be actuated by sinister motives. From what he had heard of the gentlemen who were likely to be appointed, he should expect the very reverse. But it was an awkward thing, in a constitutional point of view, that during a general election, Commissioners of the Government should be sitting with the patronage of distributing one million and three quarters of the public money.

Mr. Lockhart said, he thought the bill would totally fail as to all beneficial purposes.

Mr. Hurst spoke in favour of the measure.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to explain a point which seemed to be misunderstood. The principle of personal security was not to be abandoned. It was only to be modified, so as to enable the Commissioners in certain cases to accept other securities.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee pro forma, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved his several amendments. He also read the following list of the names of gentlemen whom it was intended to appoint as Commissioners under the Act:—Lord R. Seymour, the Hon. W. Lamb, Sir T. Acland, Sir C. Edmonstone, Sir J. Shaw, Sir J. Perring, Mr. Gooch, Mr. E. J. Littleton, Mr. Luttrell, Mr. C. Grant, sen.; Mr. Curwen, Mr. Estcourt, Mr. J. Smith, Mr. Swann, Mr. Casberd, Mr. Reid (Chairman of the East India Company), Mr. B. Harrison (Deputy Governor of the South Sea Company), Mr. S. Thornton, Mr. Phelps, Mr. J. J. Angerstein, Mr. C. Baring, and Mr. Bosanquet.

The House having resumed, the Report was received, and ordered to be taken into further consideration on Wednesday next.

OFFICE ABOLITION BILL.] Mr. D. Gilbert brought in a bill "to abolish certain offices, and to regulate certain other offices in Ireland," which was read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, May 15.

MILITARY PUNISHMENT.] Mr. M. Sutton, seeing an hon. baronet in his place, begged to say, that he had received an official statement respecting the soldier found drowned at Carlisle. (See page 914.) The hon. baronet had stated, from the Carlisle Journal, "that this man having asked permission to marry, and having been refused, had absented himself without leave, and had married; that for this offence he had been sentenced to be flogged, and after having received as many lashes as he could bear, was ordered to receive the remainder on a future day; that under the dread of this, he had terminated his existence." An official return had been made to the adjutant-general's office, and the facts were as follow:—The man, who was a soldier in the 13th Light Dragoons, had asked permission to marry, and had been refused. (The House must understand, that a refusal on the part of the officer did not prevent a soldier's marrying, or his marrying without leave constitute any military offence: but as the barracks could accommodate only a certain number of females, it was thought fit to leave a discretionary power in the officer as to what females should be admitted; so that respectable women already there might not be annoyed by the introduction of abandoned characters. In the present instance the commanding officer had refused his consent, because the man was already married. (Hear, hear.) However, he absented himself for a considerable time, and perhaps went to Greta-green, for he returned married. He was tried for the military offence of being absent without leave, and was sentenced to receive 200 lashes: 100 were inflicted, and the remainder were remitted on the spot. Some days afterwards the man was found drowned, and there was reason to believe that his death was occasioned by suicide. Here he should have stopped, but that he thought something was due to the character of Major M'Alister, the commanding officer. He had received a letter (which had been written voluntarily, and without any inquiry) from Sir J. Byng, who commanded in that district, stating the particulars of the case. (Here the hon. member read the letter, which coincided with the statement above given, and concluded to the following effect:) "Had there been any thing blameable in the conduct of Major M'Alister, he should have thought it his duty to institute an inquiry; but a jury had sat on the body, and were satisfied that the Major had done nothing wrong. They, indeed, considered that the motive which induced the soldier to destroy himself was despair at having rashly married a woman of abandoned character. He knew Major M'Alister to be a mild humane man, much esteemed in his regiment; and was happy in having such an officer on his station. Lord Lonsdale could testify, that this was not the first occasion on which he had proclaimed the merits of that officer."

Sir F. Burdett said, he had cast no imputation on any officer, and he did not even know the name of Major M'Alister; but he had stated the facts as an instance of the mischief of that kind of punishment. On a former occasion the House had very generally agreed, that this species of punishment was improper, and could only be justified on foreign service; but that at home and in peace, there could be no necessity for it. After all, it seemed that the man had been punished for marrying; but the commanding officer could have nothing to do with his marrying twice; and though it might be proper to invest him with the power of excluding abandoned women from the barracks, yet it was an abuse of all military law to punish a man for marrying. He thought, that the fear of farther punishment was much more likely to produce an act of suicide than the repentance arising from a hasty marriage, and he had strong reason to believe that the soldier's sense of honour had rendered life intolerable, after his disgrace; he should therefore bring the subject of military flogging again before the House.

Mr. M. Sutton contended, that the hon. baronet had entirely mistaken him. The officer's consent had been refused merely because he could not give it; and surely a man could be subject to no imputation because he had refused his consent to an illegal act. It was hard if a man in the execution of that act committed a known military crime and was punished, that the punishment should be attributed to other grounds; and surely the official statement of the facts was entitled to more credit than the Carlisle Journal.

Mr. Curwen observed, that the hon. baronet had cast no imputation on the conduct of Major McAlister.

Sir F. Burdett repeated, that he had not complained of the officer, but of the system of punishing the army.

Mr. W. Smith admitted, that the man would have been punished for a military offence, had it appeared that he had deserted; but as he had only absented himself, and his absence was styled desertion, it was fair to infer that he was punished for marrying without the consent of his officer.

Mr. M. Sutton replied, that the man was tried and sentenced by a brigade court-martial, which could not try deserters: he had therefore been tried and punished for absence.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] Mr. Ponsonby, after observing that the act for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus would expire in July, and that the middle of May was now at hand, a period at which, according to all experience, a number of members would retire into the country, begged to ask the noble lord opposite (Lord Castlereagh) if it was the intention of his Majesty's Ministers to apply to Parliament for a farther extension of that power of imprisonment with which they had been entrusted? He did not intend to enter into the question, as the rules of the House forbade it; but he hoped the noble lord would give him an answer one way or the other.

Lord Castlereagh replied, that after the holidays, about the first of June, a communication would be made to the House concerning the internal state of the country; after which the same proceedings would be proposed as had been adopted in the early part of the session, and it would be referred to a committee to enter into an inquiry as to the measures proper to be pursued. After the question put by the right hon. gentleman, without any wish to provoke a discussion, or to commit the House to a premature declaration of its sentiments, he felt it his duty to state, that his Majesty's Ministers, in the present situation of the country, thought themselves called on to propose to Parliament a continuance of the measure now in operation. (Loud cries of hear, hear.)

Mr. Phillips said, that as the matter was of the most serious importance, and demanded a full attendance, he should move for a call of the House.

Lord Castlereagh declared, that he was as willing to have the House called as the hon. gentleman could be.

Mr. Brougham asked, whether it was the noble lord's intention, after the holidays, to propose a committee, as in the early part of the session, or to proceed without a committee?

Lord Castlereagh repeated, that a communication would be made to the House, when a committee would be appointed for the purpose of making an inquiry, as at the beginning of the session; after which, his Majesty's Ministers would propose to Parliament a continuance of the measure now in force.

Mr. Brougham—"Am I then to understand, that a committee is to inquire, and that this is to be the result of the inquiry?" (Hear, hear.)

Sir F. Burdett remarked, that no man could doubt what would be the result of the inquiry. (Hear, hear.) But he should first move for a list of the persons confined under the present act, who they were, when taken, and where imprisoned.

Mr. Brougham hoped that some member, of more weight than himself, would give notice of a motion for an address, praying his Royal Highness the Prince Regent not to dissolve Parliament while the Habeas Corpus Act was under suspension.

Mr. Phillips moved, that the House should be called on the 2d of June.

Mr. J. P. Grant, after observing that the first w-officer of Scotland had stated that the conspiracies at Glasgow were not confined to the poorer classes of the community, said, that only one person above the rank of an operative weaver had been arrested, and he had declared, that he had had no communication whatever with political clubs; 3,000*l.* had been offered for bail, in order that he might continue his occupation; this was refused, and properly enough, as the man was charged with high treason: but he (Mr. G.) had just been informed, that the law-officers of the Crown, after having confined this man six weeks, discharged him without any farther information, and without bail: so that a respectable individual had been incarcerated six weeks without cause, discharged without inquiry, (hear, hear.) and left to seek redress for the loss of his trade, character, and health, in what manner he could. (Hear, hear.) He hoped the House would consider how the powers of the act had been applied, and what was to be expected from the law-officers of the Crown. He did not impute motives, but mentioned facts, and he trusted some explanation would be given. (Hear, hear.)

The House was then ordered to be called over on Monday, the 2d of June; members not attending, to be sent for in custody of the Serjeant.

IRISH FINANCES.] Sir J. Newport rose, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the House to the financial circumstances of Ireland, and began by observing, that he should not have brought forward this subject so soon after the decision of Friday last, if it were not for the candour with which he knew they were always willing to enter into the discussion of any question connected with that part of the empire. The present condition of Ireland imperiously demanded the consideration of Parliament: for while division prevailed in that country—while one class of the inhabitants was set against the other, by the influence of laws which had a direct tendency to perpetuate dissension, instead of consolidating the people in one bond of affection and harmony, it was utterly impossible that Ireland, or any country in which such a system was suffered to exist, could be prosperous or happy. After having expended so much of its blood, and nearly exhausted its financial resources, to defend and maintain the great interests of the British empire, the claim of Ireland to just and liberal treatment must be recognised by every considerate man. As Ireland had been taxed comparatively to a much greater extent than England for several years before the termination of the war, so on the conclusion of peace she was entitled to expect from the Legislature a greater reduction of imposts than England had experienced. Yet the contrary was the measure dealt out to that ill-fated country. When he reflected on the state of Ireland in the years 1781 and 1782—when he remembered the proud elevation upon which she then stood, through the spirit of her population, excited and directed in a great measure by the extraordinary talents and exertions of his illustrious friend beside him (Mr. Grattan), when he considered that while she so nobly maintained her independence, her own volunteer force was sufficient to protect her against foreign invasion, to maintain internal tranquillity, and to enforce the execution of the laws, he could not help feeling the utmost disappointment and the most poignant regret at the situation to which she was now reduced. In 1781 and 2 the Irish people were united, but at present they were divided through a series of measures, promoted principally during the government of the present Lord Privy Seal (Westmoreland), under whose administration the demon of discord was peculiarly active and most mischievously effective. The evils indeed produced by the system of that administration were such, that no remedy appeared but in the surrender of her legislative independence. "But it must not be forgotten, that the better part of the people of Ireland were not to be reconciled to that measure, until the Irish Parliament was completely sunk and degraded by its own conduct—until it had not only forfeited the confidence, but excited the aversion, if not the contempt, of the whole Irish nation. The degradation of that Parliament had, in fact, facilitated the accomplishment of the Union, seconded, no doubt, by certain pledges; or if the noble lord (Castlereagh) did not like that word, by the encouragement of certain hopes and expectations, not one of which had yet been realised. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. baronet then entered into a statement of the finances of Ireland, which appears in the subjoined resolutions, and animadverted upon the great falling off in the revenue and resources which each resolution manifests. He acquitted the right hon. gentleman (Mr. V. Fitzgerald) of any blame in the calculations upon which he had been induced to impose certain taxes that were no doubt productive for two or three years, but which afterwards declined in consequence of the increased pauperism of the country. Those taxes in fact, had fallen off, because they were levied upon the principal rather than upon the interest of the capital of the country; and therefore their present result was a harvest of discontent, without any harvest of revenue, for although they had been doubled, the actual produce of the revenue had diminished one half. The increase of poor rates in this country was in a great measure owing to the distress of Ireland, for the English manufacturers were thus deprived of one of their best markets; and this he demonstrated by reference to the reduced demand in Ireland of late years, for eleven of the most essential articles of British produce and manufacture. The notices which had been given, with respect to the closing of windows and chimnies in Ireland, he thought a conclusive proof of the pauperism of that country, for it was obvious, that while people could afford it, they would never deny themselves the advantage of light and heat. (Hear, hear.) The tax of 7*l.* per annum upon jaunting cars, he pronounced to be not only iniquitous, but also inconsiderate; for the Protestant farmer was thus too often disqualified from taking his family to church, and the church was generally so distant in country places, that without such an accommodation he could not go to it at all, especially in rainy weather. Hence the members of the Established Church were frequently induced by their piety and poverty to visit dissenting meetings. Adverting to the situation of the resident gentry of Ireland, the right hon. baronet dwelt upon their reduced circumstances through the pressure of taxation, arguing, that such reduction of their rank and of that respectability which would have a salutary influence among the people, must serve very materially to aggravate the popular discontents, and to promote a disregard of the connection with England. The House might be assured, that if the present system were continued, those Irish gentry who could afford to live in this country or elsewhere, would absent themselves from Ireland, and hence Parliament must come to this at last, either to impose a tax upon them, or to expose Ireland to the desertion of that order of her people, whose residence was most material for the preservation of peace, for the enforcement of law, and for the prevention of disorganization and disorder. For, it could not be doubted, that those gentry would abandon her, who, to use the language of an eloquent statesman now no more, (Mr. Windham), were essential to preserve the beautiful gradation of society, and, by an interchange of kindness, to maintain the connection between the cottage and the throne. If, indeed, this important question were not duly considered, there was but too much reason to apprehend that the affection of the Irish people would be totally lost, and the union of Ireland with this country most materially endangered, if not ultimately dissolved. In pressing the justice and the necessity of some reduction of the taxes of Ireland, in proportion to that which had taken place in this country, he could anticipate what was likely to be urged on the other side. It would probably be said, that as England had adopted the debt of Ireland, the latter was not justified in complaining, but rather ought to be thankful. To this, however, he would say—"You have taken our debt upon yourselves because you have beggared us by excessive taxation, and you are not warranted in continuing that taxation, because such continuance must not only augment our debt, but disqualify us for every useful exertion." (Hear, hear.) The consequences, indeed, of this system must be misery and discontent in Ireland, without any advantage or profit in revenue. He appealed, then, to the consideration of the House, whether it would be politic to superadd such a prolific source of dissatisfaction, as inordinate taxation must always create, to the chagrin which the great body of the Irish people now felt from the refusal of that right which they were encouraged to expect, not only from the promises made at the Union, but also from the principles of eternal justice, as had been so unanswerably proved by his right hon. friend (Mr. Giattan), whose authority and talents must always be recognised, even by those who declined to adopt his policy. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. baronet concluded with proposing the following resolutions:—

1. "That the gross revenue levied in Ireland during ten years preceding the Union, amounted to 21,614,000*l.*, averaging annually 2,161,000*l.*; in ten years immediately subsequent to the Union, to 45,579,000*l.*, averaging annually 4,557,000*l.*; and in six years ending Jan. 1817, to 38,497,000*l.*, averaging 6,416,000*l.* annually."—"That the annual average of revenue paid into the Exchequer of Ireland from taxes, during six years ending January 1801, was 1,650,000*l.*, and in six years ending January 1817, was 4,570,000*l.*"—"That taxes have been imposed on Ireland since the year 1808, of which the estimated produce was 3,500,000*l.* annual; and that the actual produce of net revenue in the year 1816, exceeds that of the year 1808, in the sum of 10,000*l.* only."—"That the produce of taxes paid into the Exchequer in 1815, was 5,750,000*l.*, and in 1816, 4,540,000*l.*, being a diminution in the latter year of 1,210,000*l.*"—"That the number of barrels of malt which paid duty, amounted in 1814 to 800,000*l.*: in 1815 to 670,000*l.*; and in 1816 to 480,000*l.*"—"That three years' average of wine imported ending January 1806, was 6700 tons, and of three years to 1817, was 2680 tons; and that the produce of duty was in 1803, 390,000*l.*, and in 1816, but 191,000*l.*; and that the rate of duty was more than doubled in the interval."—"That the duties on tea produced in 1815, 576,000*l.*, and in 1816 but 443,000*l.*"—"That the duty on home-made spirits produced in 1815, 1,420,000*l.*, and in 1816, 1,123,000*l.*; and on foreign spirits in 1815, 54,000*l.*, and in 1816, 21,000*l.*"—"That notices were served on the collectors for the year 1816 and 1817, of closing up 42,000 windows, and above 10,000 fire-places, and of a diminution in similar proportion of carriages, horses, and servants, liable to duty."—"That the official value of eleven principal articles of British manufacture imported into Ireland, was in 1813, 3,420,000*l.*; in 1814, 2,490,000*l.*; in 1815, 1,600,000*l.*; and in 1816, 1,100,000*l.*:—of which the woollens had diminished from 2,000,000*l.* to 600,000*l.*:—the leather from 200,000*l.* to 49,000*l.*:—the wrought iron and hardware from 340,000*l.* to 170,000*l.*:—and the cottons (including cotton yarn and twist), from 320,000*l.* to 130,000*l.*"—"That the select Committee appointed in 1815, to examine into and report on the public income and expenditure of Ireland, have stated to the House, That for several years Ireland has advanced in permanent taxation more rapidly than Great Britain itself, notwithstanding the immense exertions of the latter country, and including the extraordinary and war taxes;—the permanent revenue of Great Britain having increased from the year 1801, in the proportion of 16½ to 10; the whole revenue of Great Britain (including war taxes) as 21½ to 10:—and the revenue of Ireland as 23 to 10, and in the 24 years referred to the Committee as 46½ to 10."—"That Great Britain was relieved during the last session of Parliament from payment of taxes amounting to above 17,000,000*l.*; and Ireland from taxation to the amount of only 340,000*l.*"—"That the principles of justice, of sound policy, and of real interest, combine to impress upon the House, the necessity of further reduction of the taxation of Ireland, with a view to the probable permanent increase of Irish revenue, and to the continuance of a beneficial and cordial connection between the two islands."

Mr. V. Fitzgerald rose and said, that as it had been his lot to hold office in Ireland, he was anxious to submit a few observations in reply to the statements which had just been made. To no man could the duty of taxation be more painful than it had been to him; he had found it necessary to impose some heavy burthens on that country, and he perfectly agreed with the right hon. baronet, when he bore testimony to the great exertions which she had made. The right hon. baronet, however, in framing his resolutions, had adopted a mode of comparison that was quite unfair, and untenable in plain argument. It could not be concealed, that there was a great deficiency in the revenue of Ireland last year, but that was no proof of impolitic taxation, or of the wrong financial principles of the last five years. There were other causes to account for the deficiency, namely, the great difficulties that had been experienced in every branch of trade, commerce, and agriculture. The deficit of the net revenue of 1816, as compared with the preceding year, was 1,191,000*l.* The whole of this, with the exception of about 30,000*l.* had happened in the Customs and Excise. The Stamp and Post-office revenues remained much the same as before; they had, in fact, rather increased, but there was an apparent diminution, which was, however, to be accounted for by the expenditure (about 20,000*l.*) in the alterations, &c. of the Post-office building having been defrayed out of the receipts. The decrease in the Excise was owing to the reduction of the Malt and Spirit duties; in the Assessed Taxes it arose principally from the partial repeal of the Hearth tax, he meant that which affected the lower orders of the people, and the entire repeal of the House duty. The latter affected the lower orders exclusively. The duty on Malt had been reduced from 17*s.* 4*d.* to 9*s.* 4*d.* per barrel, and the duty on Spirits, from 6*s.* to 5*s.* 6*d.* per gallon. The Spirit and Malt reduction thus conjointly taken, amounted to a sum of 270,000*l.* But there was also a repayment for the stock in hand of 195,000*l.*, which being immediate in its operation, necessarily fell on the current half-year. The House and Hearth reductions he estimated at the time, at about 40,000*l.* relief, but the Commissioners thought it would be nearer 50,000*l.* In fact, there was upwards of 330,000*l.* accounted for in one view of the subject alone. The whole diminution of the assessed taxes appeared to be 64,000*l.*, but 40,000*l.* of this had been remitted in the Hearth and House duties. As to the notices of diminishing taxable articles, such as carriages and horses, and of closing up windows, he was fully of opinion that they were generally given in consequence more of the vigorous collection enforced, than of any particular objection to the tax. The enforcement of the existing duties led to this reduction in amount, for those concerned in the collection of the revenue could not, of course, take upon themselves the responsibility of allowing arrears to accumulate. They had only to obey the law, without considering the consequence of enforcing its mandate. (Hear.) But he would refute his right hon. friend's general argument, by shewing, that a greater number of taxable articles were now paid for at the increased duty, than when it was at its lowest rate. He referred to the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Grattan) whether the increased assessments of three parishes in Dublin were not greater than the whole amount of duties discontinued in Ireland. The deficiency in assessed taxes, then, was 64,000*l.*, of which 40,000*l.* had been repealed; so that the real deficit was only 24,000*l.* The right hon. baronet (he repeated) had stated the difference of different years, without any reference to the obvious causes of that difference. He had shewn a decrease in these taxes, but it was as compared with the year 1815, the most productive year that ever was known, for, in 1815, they produced 150,000*l.* more than in 1814, and 340,000*l.* more than in the year 1811. The diminution of the Carriage duty, as compared with 1815, was above 18,000*l.* But the produce of 1815 was near 118,000*l.* and in no one year before had it been 50,000*l.* except in the year 1814, when it was 82,700*l.* The same observation applied to the duty on Houses. The produce of 1815, was 104,000*l.* It had never before been 30,000*l.* except in 1814, when it was near 60,000*l.* The duty on Windows yielded in the last year nearly the same as in the preceding year, namely, 385,000*l.* The greatest receipt of any former year was that of 1814, when it produced 354,400*l.* In no preceding year had it been more than 250,000*l.*—The right hon. gentleman then went into the detail of the produce of the Customs, and the amount of the War Taxes, to shew that his right hon. friend had proceeded on partial data in his calculations. The customs in 1815, produced 2,681,000*l.*; in 1816, 2,116,000*l.*, making a comparative deficit of 565,000*l.* Of this decrease 182,000*l.* was caused by teas alone. The consumption, of course, had been greatly diminished, and the article itself was of an inferior price, so that the revenue fell off in point of diminished value also. In the year 1815, the greatest quantity was entered at the East India sale price of 3*s.* 2*d.* per pound, while in the last year the greatest quantity was entered at 2*s.* 7*d.* per pound. The next general head was Wines, in which there was a falling off of 140,000*l.* He would not then argue, whether the rates of duty on foreign wines were not too high in both countries: but he had felt himself bound to assimilate the custom duties of Ireland to those existing in Great Britain, before he called upon England to incorporate her finances with those of a country less prosperous. Home-made spirits were taxed in England at the rate of 9*s.* 6*d.*, while in Ireland the tax was only 5*s.* 6*d.* It was obvious, therefore, that when the general distress induced many in England to exchange wine for home-made spirits, the facility and extent of such a change must have been much greater in Ireland. The deficiency of the duty on Timber and Deals, as compared with the year preceding, was 100,000*l.* There was to be brought to that account, however, about 20,000*l.* recovered in the month of February, which, in fact, ought to have been brought to the credit of the preceding year. This had been the result of an investigation in the port of Dublin, where some merchants had sold goods in bond, previous to the payment of the duty. If the previous returns for this article were carried into account, last year would be found most productive. In 1814, it was 54,000*l.*; in 1815, 250,000*l.*; in 1816, 140,000*l.* which was three times greater than in 1814, and therefore the failure was not as represented by the right hon. baronet, as he himself must in candour confess. In imposing the duties upon timber and deals, on a former occasion, he had stated two objects that should be held in view—first, the promoting the trade with our North American colonies; and secondly, the restricting the trade with Sweden and Norway. Now last year, the produce from the trade with Sweden and Norway was diminished by one half, while that of the trade with America was increased nearly fivefold; for in 1815, it was only 15,000*l.*: last year it was from 60 to 70,000*l.* The next branch he would mention was British manufactures, in which there was a deficiency of 32,000*l.* last year, which afforded evidence, not of improvidence in the system of taxation, but of the depression of trade, of manufactures, and of commerce, that prevailed all over the country. The diminution in sugar, foreign spirits, and tobacco, might be accounted for from the same cause. With respect to foreign spirits, in which there was a decrease of duty of 30,000*l.* it was manifest, that since the termination of the war, during which every port, and every part of the coast, was beset with men of war and frigates that acted at the same time as revenue cutters, smuggling must have increased, and the produce of fair trade diminished. He had thus fairly, and, as he hoped, satisfactorily, accounted for the deficiency in the principal branches of the Customs: and with respect to the rest, he would appeal to the right hon. baronet, or at least to the other gentlemen from Ireland then present, whether the decrease might not be attributed to the general distress of the country, the decay of agriculture, and the almost general impossibility experienced by the landed proprietors of collecting their rents. The state of the country in all these respects was indeed so well understood, that even the right hon. baronet himself had declared the impossibility of exacting any thing from Ireland in the way of direct taxation, which, as he had said, must, if rigidly enforced, cut off the sources of her ancient prosperity. Indeed, Ireland had, from the peculiar nature of her trade, suffered more from the return of peace than any other part of the empire. Her trade had been, to provision the fleets and armies of the country, a trade altogether connected with the war, and which, of course, must terminate with the cessation of hostilities. These and many other circumstances (and, by the way, he had forgotten to mention the deficiency in the salt duties,) might account for the total decrease in the revenue, which could not, by any inferences drawn from the statements contained in the resolutions, be fairly attributed to any improvidence or incorrectness in the mode of administering the finances of Ireland. The right hon. baronet had stated, that since the Union, additional taxes had been imposed to the amount of 3,000,000*l.* from which, however, not so many hundred thousands had been derived. The loan, it would be necessary to observe, for 1813, was 8,500,000*l.*, on which the charge was 595,000*l.* a year. The taxes to meet this amounted, in 1813, to 491,000*l.*, and in the next year to 553,000*l.* In the year 1815, the loan was 9,750,000*l.*, on which the charge was something more than 700,000*l.* which the taxes fully met. These facts were a sufficient refutation of the right hon. baronet's statement.—The right hon. gentleman then praised the liberality of Great Britain, in undertaking to defray the charge on the consolidated fund of Ireland, and remarked, that neither within nor without the walls of that House had he ever heard a single complaint against the consolidation of the two Exchequers. Having stated the decrease in the great branches of the revenue of Ireland, he thought it proper to advert to the great increase that had taken place in them within the last five years. The receipt of Customs had within that time increased by 527,000*l.*, the Excise and Assessed taxes by 1,791,000*l.*, making a total increase in those two great and important branches of the revenue of no less than 2,318,000*l.* When the general increase within that period was so decidedly great, it was not fair to dwell on the partial decrease of a single year, particularly when it was remembered that the amount of these two branches of the revenue alone, at the close of the last year, exceeded the entire revenue of the country in 1801, by not less than 112,000*l.*, and the excess in the entire amount was 3,470,000*l.*; the produce in 1801, being 2,370,000*l.*, and in 1816, 5,840,000*l.*—With respect to the resolutions, he conceived it, at the least, inexpedient to affirm any statements of the character then proposed, from which no practical good could result. It was true, as mentioned in those resolutions, that there had since the war been remitted to Great Britain taxes, amounting to 17,000,000*l.*, and to Ireland no more than 340,000*l.*; but it should be remembered, that Great Britain had for many years submitted to many heavy duties, from which Ireland had been wholly exempt; Great Britain had paid immense sums towards the expenses of each year, while Ireland was called upon to defray her part only by loans, and charge herself with the interest. Such a fact, if introduced in a resolution, could not be denied; but to what purpose should it be affirmed? Objections had been thrown out against the equalization of the assessed taxes, particularly as it seemed to increase the number of absentees; but there was no other alternative that could be adopted for meeting the expenses of the country. An increased duty of 7l. on a particular kind of vehicle used in Ireland by the occupying tenants, called jaunting cars, had been much censured, from the severity with which it pressed on the middle orders of society; and on the representations that had been made to him, he had reduced it to 4l.—(Only in some cases, observed Sir J. Newport.)—True, it was only in some cases, but they were those in which the grievance had been particularly felt, namely, in the middle class of life—for the increased duty was still continued wherever the owner paid also for a four-wheeled carriage, (Hear, hear,)—or where a person kept another description of jaunting car, of quite a different construction, more expensive than the former, and which usually cost about 70 or 80l., for it was thought, that those who could maintain such a vehicle, might afford the increased duty of 7l. as well as a similar class of persons in Great Britain. He put it to the House, whether it would be prudent to let such resolutions as those proposed by the right hon. baronet go forth to the country, accompanied by the report of his speech, telling the people of Ireland that they had been ruined since the Union, and that the Ministers did not sympathise in their sufferings. He begged leave to assert, that he felt the distress and the financial difficulties of Ireland as much as any member in the House; and, were he disposed to count an insignificant temporary popularity at the expense of his right hon. friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), he would now, as he had ceased to be responsible for that branch of service, recommend a reduction of taxes, and concur in the proposed resolutions; but feeling that a remission of taxes was now impossible, and that any comparison between their repeal in this country and in Ireland, without taking into view the circumstances of both, would convey an imputation on the favourable disposition of Parliament towards the latter, he must give the resolutions his decided negative; leaving it to some other member, if he should think proper, to make a motion for disposing of them.

Mr. Ponsonby observed, that the right honourable gentleman had paid some compliments to Great Britain for taking on herself part of the debt and expenses of Ireland; but it must be known, that this arose from the absolute inability of Ireland to support them; and if Ireland could not pay, and England would not pay, the consequence must be, that many persons would remain unpaid. There were many articles of consumption in Ireland which might be exempted from duties with great advantage to the country, and even to the revenue. The capabilities of a country ought to regulate the principle of its taxation: it was impossible to tax a poor country as heavily as a rich one, in the same manner as it was impossible to exact as much money from a poor man as from his more wealthy neighbour. It was an homely, but a correct proverb, "from the cat you can get only its skin." He allowed that, in compa-

ri-son with the amount of taxes in the respective countries, the remission of 17,000,000l. might be as justifiable in England as that of 340,000l. in Ireland; but the relative powers of contribution should be taken into consideration, and it could not be said that every thing that might be effected in the way of remission had as yet been done for Ireland. For these reasons he should vote for the motion.

Sir H. Parnell said, that the weight of taxation was the cause of universal complaint in Ireland. He stated the many inconveniences that resulted from the unconstitutional power possessed by revenue officers of entering houses for the purpose of counting windows and hearths, and trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would pay the most serious attention to that subject.

Mr. D. Browne said a few words, the import of which was understood to be in support of the motion.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, whatever might be the accuracy of the right hon. baronet's assertions, or the general correctness of the statement contained in his resolutions, it would be unwise in the House to affirm them while the finances of the whole empire were under the consideration of a committee. He defended the amount of the remission of taxes to Great Britain, on the ground of her having, during the war, paid 238 millions in war taxes, to which Ireland had not contributed. He contended, that the distress of the country could not fairly be ascribed to the amount of taxation, which position he illustrated by a reference to Switzerland, which was least burthened of any country in Europe with taxes, and which had, notwithstanding, suffered the greatest portion of calamity since the return of peace.—The right hon. gentleman moved the previous question.

Mr. M. Fitzgerald observed, that a discussion like the present was of great advantage to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by giving him a correct view of the real state of Ireland, for which he was about to legislate in financial measures.—He dwelt on the disadvantages experienced by that country from the absence of her great landed proprietors, and contended for the necessity of some considerable reduction in her taxation.

Sir J. Newport said a few words in reply. He appealed to the knowledge of every gentleman who had resided during the last year in Ireland for the truth of his assertion, that the taxes for that period had been paid out of the capital of the country; and left it to the House to decide what must be the consequences to its future resources and ability, by thus continuing to deplete and impoverish the resident gentry.

The different resolutions were then put, and negatived, by the previous question.

N.B. In the Appendix, under the head "Ireland," will be found several official documents explanatory of the details in Sir J. Newport's statement.

DEMISE OF THE CROWN.] On the motion of Mr. Ponsonby, the House went into a Committee on the Civil Offices Continuance Bill, and after some discussion as to the propriety of adding a clause, suggested by Lord Lascelles, to extend the principle of the bill to the duration of Parliament, which was supported by Lord Castlereagh and Mr. B. Bathurst, and resisted by Mr. Ponsonby, Mr. Tierney, and Sir J. Mackintosh, the Report was received, and ordered to be taken into further consideration on Thursday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 16.

Bailey's Divorce Bill was read a third time, and passed.

CATHOLIC CLAIMS.] The Duke of Glocester presented a petition from the University of Cambridge against the Catholic claims. His Royal Highness stated, that though his name, in consequence of the high office which he held in that University, appeared at the head of the petition, yet he desired to be distinctly understood as not giving any opinion upon that question, or as taking any part either in favour of or against the measure.

The petition was then read, and stated in substance, that the petitioners saw no reason to believe that the sentiments and principles of the Roman Catholics were at all changed; that they had not been conciliated by past concessions; and that nothing would satisfy them but a compliance with claims which would undermine the securities of the Protestant establishment.

Lord Grenville presented a petition to the same effect from the University of Oxford.

Both petitions were laid on the table.

The Earl of Donoughmore then rose, in pursuance of his notice, and spoke as follows:—It was his duty now to call their Lordships' attention to the petitions from their Catholic fellow-subjects which had been laid on their table. He had presented two petitions, one of which was from the general body of the Irish Catholics, in the present session; and he had presented two other petitions last session, one from the nobility and others, who had thought proper to petition separately, and the other from the Irish Catholic prelates and clergy. It had been intimated to him by some of those who signed the former petition, that they were desirous to have it now brought under consideration; and the prelates and clergy had sent over two most respectable individuals, selected from their body, to give every information in their power to the members of the two Houses of Parliament, and lend all their aid to the furtherance of any measure of relief which the Legislature might think proper to entertain. Their Lordships would therefore understand, that he stood there the representative, though an inadequate one, of the whole body of his Catholic countrymen, claiming on their behalf, that they should at length be admitted to the privileges of British subjects. In calling their attention to these petitions of no small part of the population of these kingdoms, it was his wish to abstain from all generality, and instead of resting their claims upon the triumphant ground of their merits, he would rather advocate their cause by refuting the calumnies with which they had been loaded. Never had the Catholics been assailed with more violence and acrimony than at the present moment, as their lordships must be aware, from what had passed in both Houses of Parliament, as well as from what had appeared in the public press—a press which was free, and he hoped would long continue to be free—the authentic recorder of the opinions and principles of public men—notwithstanding the extraordinary crusade to which a noble Secretary of State had exposed it, by subjecting it to the control of every magistrate and justice of peace, in the manner stated in his circular letter, for every sentiment and opinion of which they might not approve (Hear, hear); thus constituting himself, through the medium of those magistrates, a sort of licenser of the press on all subjects, religious and political. The question never came before the House under greater irritation of the public mind than at this moment. The Catholics had to complain, that they had been most grossly calumniated, and that while their claims were refused, they themselves had been most cruelly maligned. He himself, and probably others of their lordships, had received tracts, written and published against the Catholics, that might make the hair of any liberal man stand on end. One would think that the object was to provoke a renewal of the riots of 1783. The sufferings of Protestant martyrs were represented in pictures, and the Pope and Priests expressing satisfaction at the tortures which those martyrs endured. This was not a fair and candid manner of meeting the petitioners. Every engine had been set to work to prejudice the public mind against the unfortunate Catholics, and he was sorry to say, that the means adopted to injure them had not been without success. But it was not merely of the exertions out of doors that he had to complain. With all due respect to the noble lord on the woolsack, he must say, that he had contributed to this result. The noble lord had risen from the woolsack the other day, (see page 1004.) and with all the authority which belonged to his high station and unblemished character, and with extraordinary warmth, called the attention of their lordships to this question, as one which concerned the very vitals of the Constitution. The noble lord must have meant a great deal by that expression, for it was not his custom to speak without meaning, and his meaning must have been this—that all those who supported the Catholic claims were advocates for measures which would subvert the Constitution.

The Lord Chancellor rose to order. With the most sincere respect for the noble earl, he must remind him, that he had only stated an opinion which he had ever conscientiously held, and in which he was the more confirmed the more he considered the subject. That opinion he was bound to state and to support, but with a desire that the most liberal toleration should be given to all religious persuasions. If the noble earl thought that he meant to prejudice the debate of this night, he could assure him that he did not mean any such thing.

The Earl of Donoughmore doubted whether the noble lord, who was the master of order in that House, was not himself out of order. He did not think the noble lord entitled to interrupt him when speaking, though the explanation would have been proper at another time. However, he was happy to find that he had endeavoured a little to soften what he said on a former occasion. The noble lord could keep him at a distance; but it must be most painful to his feelings, which were so acute on this subject, to be daily sitting in the cabinet, and in the habit of advising the Sovereign, along with persons who were aiming a blow at the vitals of the Constitution; or whose principles he must be convinced would, if acted upon, give a deadly blow to the Constitution. There were such men in the cabinet, and there could be no impropriety in mentioning the circumstances, as they had openly declared their opinion in Parliament. These strong expressions did certainly often put an extinguisher on a good cause, and great obloquy had unquestionably been thrown upon this cause of the Catholics; but he hoped that, in spite of that obloquy, it would stand fair before their lordships, and meet with an impartial and candid consideration. With respect to the objections against going into a committee, he would first notice one which was constantly repeated—that their lordships ought not even to adopt this proceeding, until some securities should be stated and settled for the safety of the Protestant Church. That mode of arguing was not unparliamentary, although the proper place for considering the securities was the committee; and calling for a statement of them beforehand, was something like an anticipation of what must be considered at a subsequent stage of the measure. The securities which had been mentioned with reference to this subject were threefold: 1st, the veto; 2d, domestic nomination; 3d, the payment of the Catholic clergy by Government—a security which he had not heard of until the present session, and which he had lately seen mentioned in the public papers. The Catholics objected to the veto, and they had been condemned and maligned because they had objected to it with warmth. As to domestic nomination, that was said to be an illusory security: and why? The argument was extraordinary: domestic nomination was illusory, because it was no new security; the appointment of the Catholic bishops having, with one or two exceptions, been made in this manner for a long time past; but was it not an answer to those who were terrified at the bugbear called foreign influence? It at least went to the root of that objection: and it was not illusory in another view, for though it might be no new security, yet it would establish the mode of domestic nomination in future, by means of a concordat with the Pope for that purpose. No individual, nor body of men, public or private, however respectable, ought to insist on making a bargain with a Legislature; but the Catholics had shewn by this offer, that they wished to conciliate, and to do away the fears of those who were alarmed. Now he thought it fitting to state to their lordships the course which he intended to pursue in the committee, in case they should agree to his motion. He certainly had no intention to propose the adoption of the security or regulation of the veto. The Catholics themselves were adverse to it, and he, as a member of the Legislature, should have objected to it, even if they had been willing to concede it. The Catholics in this country were a small body of men compared with the mass of the population; but in Ireland the Catholics formed the nation. The government in Ireland was representative; and if the veto were adopted, the care of the Catholic Church might devolve upon some one better acquainted with making speeches in Parliament than with the Catholic ecclesiastical polity. The care of the Catholic Church, he was very apprehensive, would then devolve upon some second or third clerk in the Castle Yard in Dublin. He did not wish to see the Catholic clergy so managed. He knew from experience that they were the best magistrates—the best conservators of the peace—the best instruments for ensuring the due administration of justice. He was far from being desirous that their minds should be turned away from the discharge of their most valuable and important duties, by the introduction of intrigues and cabals among them. Then, with regard to the security of paying the Catholic clergy, it was one for which he saw no occasion. The Catholic clergy wanted no other remuneration than the voluntary allowance made to them, as a reward for the discharge of their religious labours. He did not, therefore, mean to propose in the committee that the Catholic clergy should be paid by the Government. What then, it might be asked, did he mean to propose? In the first place, he meant to propose that the nomination of the Catholic bishops should be purely national and domestic: and his next step would be to connect the Catholics with the Protestant state, by admitting them to every situation under a Protestant Sovereign, except such as were connected with the administration, government, or patronage, of the established Church. The Protestant Church being thus left to the sole management of the Protestant clergy, he did not see why Protestants should refuse to leave to the Catholics the exclusive administration of their own religious affairs. A great many objections had been raised in different publications against entering into the consideration of the Catholic claims at this period, of which he had made some extracts. The first of these was of a very singular nature. The petitions ought not to be considered, it was argued, because they were the petitions of 4,000,000 of people. The Legislature, however, had been called upon to consider the present state of Ireland, and the condition of its population. The Protestants constituted one million of that population; the members of other reformed persuasions about half a million; and all the rest were Catholics. The Catholics then formed about 8-10ths of the population of Ireland; and, therefore, it was contended, their petitions ought not to be attended to. Now the great object of policy ought to be to render a country as productive as possible, and to secure the attachment of the subjects to the Government. He should rather have conceived, therefore, that the numbers and importance of the petitioners were reasons for, and not against, taking their petitions into consideration. Then their lordships were told, that the Catholic clergy managed the affairs of the college of Maynooth openly, and applied themselves to business of a political nature secretly. This was made a serious ground of charge against the Catholics—that their clergy were remarkable for their attention to the interests of a seminary, with which they were peculiarly connected. In any other case, it would be said, ‘the conduct of these individuals calls for the highest praise;’ but here a different course was pursued. It was also objected, that the clergy had an uncontrolled influence over the minds and opinions of the Catholic people. He most sincerely wished that this charge had been true. It was not true, however, and he was sorry for it. The clergy, as he had before observed, were the best magistrates, and the best supporters of the public peace. Whatever influence they had, was employed for that purpose; and no duties were performed in a better manner than theirs. Another ground of objection was, that the minds of the Catholic clergy were so estranged from the people and Government, that they must feel in the nature of things a hatred against a Protestant State. If they had been as bad as the laws had been calculated to make them, Ireland would at this time have been no part of the united kingdom; but, in point of fact, no accusation ever was more completely unfounded. It was a foul calumny against one of the most respectable bodies of men in the community, which the Irish Catholic clergy certainly were: and though the charge were as true as it was utterly unfounded, ought the great body of the Catholics to suffer for the faults of their clergy? There was another argument used against the consideration of the Catholic claims, to which one could hardly listen with patience; it was founded on the outrages of the Orangemen in the province of Ulster against the Catholics; and this argument, he understood, had been well received by those who were hostile to the interests of the Catholics elsewhere. The case was put in this way:—A Catholic attempted to seize the arms of an Orangeman; the Orangeman fired, and the Catholic was wounded. There were cross-indictments; and the Orangeman, as the charge against him was capital, was of course acquitted by the jury, his brother Orangemen. This argument then rested on a justification of treason and murder, and perjury in the jury. With reference to this, he could not help stating what had been said by the Irish Solicitor-General, who sometimes sat as a Judge, on occasion of an acquittal of the above-mentioned description. Addressing himself to the jury, he said, “I thank God, gentlemen, it is your verdict, and not mine.” The present state of Ireland was, in reality, one of the strongest arguments for entering upon the consideration of this subject, and setting the matter at rest. Another argument against the Catholics was a very curious one. The Pope had restored the order of the Jesuits, and therefore the Irish Catholics ought not to be reinstated in their rights. The Jesuits had certainly been at one time proscribed; and yet he could not help saying, that as far as learning was concerned, no set of individuals ever existed, to whom the world was more indebted. And though formerly they might have been inconvenient to the Continental Sovereigns, he was not aware that any great danger was to be apprehended from them now; at any rate, he could not see how the restoration of that society was of any consequence with reference to the Catholics of the united kingdom. Then it had been argued, that the claims of the Catholics ought not to be allowed, because the Pope had opposed the circulation of the Scriptures without a comment. No one could reverence more than he did, the objects of the societies for distributing the Scriptures; but it was well known, that there was a great difference of opinion, even in our own Church, whether the Bible ought or ought not to be circulated without an accompaniment. The argument would, therefore, cut too deep, and would reach some members of our own Church, and even some members of their lordships’ House; especially of that right reverend body which he saw in such force on the present occasion. He gave no opinion on the subject, one way or the other; but if authority were urged against him, he would meet it with authority. There were, he believed, two members of that reverend bench, one of whom (the Bishop of Llandaff) was then opposite to him—the other he did not see in his place—who were both strongly opposed to the system of disseminating the Bible, without a suitable comment. He wished to avoid any possible misrepresentation or mistake on this point, and to pay every possible respect to the right rev. prelate opposite. With this view, he had copied from the pamphlet published by him, on the subject of the Bible societies, his own words. It might be considered an odd way of defending the Catholics, but as they had been assailed with the Pope, he wished to protect them with the shield of the Established Church. The words made use of by the right rev. prelate were these :—" But it is urged, if you still require that the Bible, however extensively you may be willing to distribute it, should be accompanied by the Liturgy, you must certainly suspect that there is danger to the Established Church from the distribution of the Bible alone. Here let me ask, whether the Bible itself is not capable of perversion?—whether the best of books may not be misapplied to the worst of purposes?—Have we not inspired authority for answering this question in the affirmative? St. Peter himself, speaking of the Epistles of St. Paul, said, ' In which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable, wrest as they do ' also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction.' Would St. Peter, if he had lived in the present age, have thought this admonition less necessary than in the age of the Apostles?"—" But if we neglect to provide the poor of the establishment with the Book of Common Prayer as well as with the Bible, we certainly neglect the means of preventing their seduction from the Established Church. The Dissenters remain Dissenters, because they use not the Liturgy; and Churchmen will become Dissenters, if they likewise neglect to use it with the people. Have the persons to whom Bibles are gratuitously distributed either the leisure, or the inclination, or the ability, to weigh the arguments for religious opinions? Do they possess the knowledge and the judgment which are necessary to direct men in the choice of their religion? Must they not learn it, therefore, from the instructors? and can there be a better instructor, in the opinion of Churchmen, than the Book of Common Prayer?" After this declaration, he (Lord D.) thought his unfortunate Catholic countrymen would stand acquitted of being singular in wishing not to have the Bible disseminated without a commentary. The Pope declared, that the Bible should not go forth, unattended by the general practice of the Church, and the opinion of the Father of the Church. In the same way, some of the head members of our own Church, held, that the Bible ought not to go out unaccompanied with the Book of Common Prayer. He thought, therefore, that the Catholics were acquitted of this part of the indictment.—The last argument of all was, that if we admitted the Catholics to additional privileges, though we might administer the most solemn oaths to them, they would not scruple to break them. So that, if they took the only means in their power to annihilate our fears, they were not to be believed. A Catholic, therefore, who took an oath, purging him of every objection, in order that we might grant him farther privileges, was to be disbelieved, and the indictment, as it might be called, against him, was still to remain in force.—A most extraordinary attempt had been made in another place to give an erroneous application of the opinion of a person who had always been distinguished for his support of the Catholic claims. An extract read from that eminent person's works had been received with applause, as if it had afforded an argument against that liberality of sentiment which he had on all occasions defended. What the meaning of this proceeding could be, except that of making it appear that Mr. Burke had spoken against the Catholics, he was at a loss to understand: but if the preceding passage had been read, it would have been found, that the opinion of that great statesman was completely hostile to the principles of those who opposed Catholic emancipation. It would have been found that, speaking with reference to that great body of his Majesty's subjects, he had observed, that our Constitution was not made for exclusion, and that either we should destroy them or they would destroy the Constitution. He (Lord D.) could not desire a stronger argument in favour of the Catholic claims. Every body (said the noble lord) who writes or speaks on this subject, professes that he is an enemy to exclusion; but most of them, notwithstanding, act up to the principle of exclusion, and make specious excuses for their conduct. He thought he had shewn their lordships that the arguments adduced to perpetuate them, with respect to the Catholics, were not founded in truth—and it was not, he hoped, necessary for him to say more, to induce them to go into a Committee.—He should, therefore, only move, " That this House do resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to consider the petitions of his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects."

The Bishop of Llandaff (in a maiden speech) observed, that having been unaccustomed to trespass on the attention of so august an assembly, and being conscious of his inability to do justice to a subject of such magnitude, he felt considerable difficulty in rising to address their lordships. But, as the question had been so repeatedly discussed in that House, he would not detain them by following the noble mover through the great variety of matter which he had introduced. He should, therefore, merely state the reasons which induced him to dissent from a proposition which had been so respectably supported. Were this a question merely of religious liberty, he would join most sincerely with the noble earl; but the freedom of religious opinion remained untouched in whatever way the present question might be decided. The Catholic enjoyed as full liberty in the profession of his faith as the member of the Established Church. Their lordships, therefore, in considering the present question, had not to concern themselves with religious liberty merely, but also with political power. He surely should not incur the charge of intolerance or inhumanity for making this statement; for the question was so mixed, that its parts could not be considered without a reference to each other. If, for instance, it was a political question only, then why was the discussion of religious opinions constantly introduced into it? It was of little consequence, with a view to religious liberty, to inquire whether the decisions of the Council of Trent agreed with the 39 Articles, or whether the doctrine of transubstantiation were true or false. Let the Pope answer for refusing to the laity the free use of the Bible. These were questions with which, in a political point of view, their lordships had nothing to do; and it might well be said, if the Catholics hold no other opinions, why should they be excluded from the highest offices in the State? If there be no delinquency, why is the sentence of inadmissibility pronounced against them? With all this he most cordially agreed. In short, he was perfectly willing to let the question of admissibility be decided by the civil question. He had listened with great attention to all that had been urged by the noble earl; and he was ready to admit, what was most favourable to the petitioners, that civil eligibility to office ought to depend upon civil capacity and worth. But before their lordships came to a decision on the claims of the petitioners, they must inquire whether there might not be some religious tenets, the holding of which might render a man better qualified to serve the State than one who did not hold them. Let it then be asked, what was the nature of the civil capacity required by our Constitution? The allegiance of a member of the Established Church was complete, both in a religious and a civil point of view. The civil allegiance of a Protestant dissenter, though not equally complete, was not subject to so disqualifying a deduction as that of a Roman Catholic. If Protestant dissenters refused to acknowledge the Sovereign as the head of their church; or if they had any other head, that head was not a foreigner, or a person who had no common interest with the Government of the country; but, notwithstanding this anomaly, it was said that the obedience given to the Pope was purely spiritual, and never interfered with temporal government. Here he must remark, that in religious opinions it was not always easy to distinguish what was temporal and what civil. Their lordships, therefore, could not decide this question without taking religion into account. They, in fact, knew, that on many points connected with this question the petitioners themselves entertained doubts as to whether they involved civil or religious obligations. Now to whom had the Catholics to apply to solve their doubts? To that very power which was essentially irreconcilable with the temporal power of their own Government; for if the decisions of that power should be inconsistent with their civil duties, was it not to be apprehended that the latter would yield to the former? The commands of conscience would always have a most powerful influence, and persons bound by the obligations of such opinions as those held by Roman Catholics must of necessity, by acknowledging a foreign head, be exposed to be acted upon by foreign intrigue. It would perhaps be said, that these views were inconsistent with the enlightened policy of modern times; but what was commonly called enlightened policy was not always a wise and good policy. He might be referred to France, and be told, that there Protestants are admitted to a participation of equal political rights with the Roman Catholics; but he must observe, that the case was very different between the admission of Protestants to political power in a State where the Church of Rome formed the dominant religion, and the admission of Roman Catholics to the like privilege under a Protestant Government. The Protestant owed no allegiance but to the Government of his country; not so the Catholic. He avowedly owes allegiance to a foreign prince, whose views are hostile to the system of policy by which the domestic prince reigns. If the petitioners who now applied to be placed on an equal footing of eligibility with Protestants, could give an equal pledge of allegiance, let their claim be admitted; but if their religious opinions prevented them from giving the same perfect and complete allegiance, then they were not equal in point of civil capacity and worth, and consequently ought not to be regarded as equally admissible to offices of trust, or to seats in the councils of the nation. He did not mean to say that Roman Catholics were bad subjects; all that he meant to contend for was, that, politically speaking, they were not so good as Protestants. He was ready to acknowledge their honour and integrity as individuals; many of them were entitled to his highest respect; but the allegiance which they owed to a foreign prince counteracted that which was due to their own sovereign, and rendered them less fit to be admitted to offices of trust in a Protestant country than those who professed the established religion. After having stated these general principles, it was hardly necessary for him to enter into details. He would, however, say a few words on the subject of domestic nomination. In his opinion, it was not material whether the election of bishops was accomplished by a chapter or entirely by bishops. It was well known that a chapter may obey a precept without having any choice; still, however, foreign interference was to be apprehended. In Ireland, as he had been told, the custom was for the coadjutor to be recommended to the vacant see, and for the Pope to confirm. (Here the Earl of Donoughmore rose to explain, which produced a general call to Order.) It was true, the Romish bishop, when elected and confirmed by the Pope, still owed allegiance to the King; but if their lordships would judge of the value of that allegiance, they should read the oath which such bishop took to the Pope on his consecration, and consider how the one allegiance was affected by the other. He most solemnly conjured their lordships not to agree to the admission of foreign influence into the political concerns of this State. If that influence were once admitted, it would produce a change in the principles of our Protestant Constitution, the consequences of which could not be foreseen.

The Bishop of Norwich then rose, and addressed the House as follows:—"My Lords, the appointment of the learned prelate to the last vacant See, gave great satisfaction to every friend of literature and of religion, and to no one more than to myself. I cannot, however, allow, either my personal regard for him, or the real respect which I have for his abilities, to hinder me from expressing, in this public manner, the deep regret which I feel at the misapplication of those abilities, in support of a proscription, the most unjust, the most unwise, the most cruel, and, in point of duration, the longest, which is to be met with in the history of the world—a proscription, my lords, which excludes between four and five millions of meritorious and loyal subjects from their civil privileges; though they have given to the Government under which they live, the most unequivocal proofs of their allegiance: proofs, admitted to be unequivocal by the very Government which continues their exclusion; and can therefore continue it, solely on account of their conscientious adherence to the innocent religious opinions of their forefathers. I say, my lords, innocent religious opinions (though, in our judgment, erroneous), which were impressed upon their minds, in early youth, both by precept and by example. In this intolerant country, (for so it has lately become) I shall probably be censured for using the phrase, innocent religious opinions; but I should hope still, that the religious opinions of a Fenelon and a Pascal; the religious opinions of some of the most polished nations on the Continent; and of several highly respectable noblemen and gentlemen of this country, with whom we are in the habit of mixing every day, in friendly intercourse: men, who possess natural understandings as clear, intellectual improvements as considerable, and moral characters as irreproachable as the best of us: I should hope, I say, that the religious opinions of such men, may be deemed innocent, without giving just cause of offence, to any well informed, any liberal, or any candid mind. Independently of this consideration, I have the sanction of the Legislature itself, for making use of the phrase, innocent religious opinions. In different acts of Parliament which have passed during the present reign in Ireland, the religious tenets of the Catholics are vindicated from the imputation of being either pernicious or unsocial; (these are, I believe, the words that are used) and it is added, that when they have taken a certain oath, and made a certain declaration, they shall be considered as good and loyal subjects, and fit to serve his Majesty. This oath, my lords, they have taken, and they have made this declaration; I therefore again say, that they are excluded from their civil privileges, solely on account of their innocent religious opinions. Upon what ground, then, does my learned friend rest his defence of a system, which, in defiance of reason and of experience, and of the general practice of other countries, makes religious opinions, and not civil conduct, the qualification for civil offices? a system, which is reprobated abroad by every statesman, on account of its impolicy, as we were last year informed by a noble earl (Aberdeen) on this side of the House, who is a very competent judge; and is most unquestionably disapproved of at home, by every consistent friend to civil and religious liberty. My learned friend, if I understood him rightly, asserts, that an individual who objects to our ecclesiastical establishment, cannot be so good a subject, as he who approves both of that, and of our civil constitution also. To this argument, it appears to me a sufficient answer to say, Cross the Tweed, or take a voyage to Canada, the Roman Catholic inhabitants of which province, not many years since, gave more than common proofs of their loyalty. I beg your lordships' pardon for intruding upon your patience; but it is probably the last time I shall ever trouble you, upon this, or upon any other occasion; and perhaps, I ought not to do it now, for the question is not of a religious, but of a political nature: it is not, whether this or that system of religious doctrines be the most scriptural, or this or that form of Ecclesiastical Government be the most perfect; but whether the Union of Ireland with Great Britain shall be nominal or real; whether it shall be a substantial consolidation of resources, of talents, of interests, and of affection; or a mere empty delusive title: and whether the loyal, the generous, and the affectionate inhabitants of that unfortunate country, shall in future be the firmest bulwark of your Empire, or the burthen and the vexation of it. This, my lords, is a question, not for divines, not for lawyers, not for young and presumptuous politicians, but for sober experienced statesmen to decide; and to them I very willingly leave it, requesting only your lordships' permission to make a few brief remarks upon a subject, somewhat more within my own province; I mean the domestic nomination to the Catholic bishoprics of Ireland. Anxious to meet, not only the reasonable objections, but even the allowable prejudices of their fellow subjects and fellow christians of the Established Church; the Catholics of Ireland bring forward a proposal, which proves at least a strong desire on their part to adopt some conciliatory adjustment, which may be satisfactory to you, and not incompatible with the doctrines of their religion, or essentially injurious to its discipline. Such a desire demands most assuredly from us a corresponding spirit of moderation. The Catholics conclude, and I suppose justly, that the two great objects which the Legislature has in view, are, in the first place, to ascertain the character for loyalty, and a peaceable disposition of the individual who may be nominated to a bishopric, when any vacancy occurs; and in the next place, to prevent, as far as possible, all foreign interference. The plan suggested by the petitioners seems calculated to answer these two purposes with sufficient effect. I do not, however, mean to weary your lordships' attention, by entering upon the discussion of so complicated, and in its different bearings, so extensive a subject, especially as it has always appeared to me, that there is no occasion whatever for departing from the present mode of electing Catholic Bishops in Ireland; and still less for accompanying an extension of civil privileges with additional ecclesiastical restrictions, of such a nature, as in the judgment of one of the parties concerned, will materially lessen, if not entirely destroy the value of any indulgence which may be granted. In common life, we should think a man managed very ill, who granted a favour with so bad a grace, as to confer no obligation upon the person who received it; and in matters of a public nature, the case is still stronger. We all know that Roman Catholics, in the various relations of life, have proved themselves as worthy members of society, and as good subjects, as Protestants. Certain offices have already been laid open to them; and thus the question of their admissibility has been irrevocably decided. With respect to the Catholic Bishops, it would be difficult to point out any body of men, who have displayed more loyalty, upon all occasions, or who have more earnestly endeavoured to impress upon the minds of the lower orders of society, the important duty of civil obedience. Read their "Pastoral Charges;" through every page of those excellent publications, the genuine spirit of christian charity is diffused; and the beneficial effects of their exertions have been acknowledged, in more instances than one, by the Government of Ireland. Nor are the Catholic priests of Ireland less remarkable for the exemplary discharge of their ministerial functions. I speak, my lords, of what I have repeatedly seen and known. Is infancy to be instructed—is youth to be admonished—is old age to be comforted—are the consolations of religion to be administered to a dying peasant, in his last moments—the priest, however inconvenient to him, is always at his post. He traverses a wide and dreary bog, in the midst of the darkest night, and of the most tempestuous weather—

and for all this laudable performance of professional duty, he receives nothing which deserves the name of a compensation in the present life. It is, my lords, with heartfelt satisfaction, that I go out of my way to bear my humble testimony in favour of men whose merits are very much underrated, and who are but too frequently neglected by those, who, from worldly motives, should pay them attention; were it only on account of the influence, which they deservedly have over the minds of their numerous congregations; an influence, which, if properly directed, would prove incalculably useful to the Government of Ireland; an influence, to which we are, at this moment, in great measure indebted for the calm resignation with which thousands of miserable wretches bear up against an almost total want of food, of clothes, and of fire. Such being the character and conduct of these excellent Ministers of the Gospel, where, I again ask, is the expediency of making any alteration in their ecclesiastical discipline; admitting for a moment, the right of a civil government to interfere in the ecclesiastical discipline, or doctrine, of individuals, dissenting from the Established Church, but maintaining no doctrines, either subversive of morality, or injurious to the welfare of the State, a right, which I was taught in early life to call in question, by two of the greatest masters of reason whom this or any other country ever produced—I mean Locke and Hoadley? It is not, however, my intention to abuse your lordships' indulgence by engaging in abstract disquisitions. I shall therefore add only one observation, in answer to those who may say, and say most truly, that it is indispensably necessary that we should have ample security for our own civil and ecclesiastical establishment. Nothing, my lords, can be more incontrovertible than this position—nothing more just than the principle on which it rests; but surely it is a principle which ought to be applied with some reference to a reasonable apprehension of danger. It is not every idle fear—every mean and narrow suggestion of bigotry—every injurious suspicion—every ill-grounded jealousy, which can justify the exclusion of five millions of loyal civil subjects from their civil privileges. Shew me, said a very able, a very eloquent, and a very honest patriot, in another place—shew me a real danger, and you shall have any security you desire. This challenge, my lords, never has been accepted, and, though no prophet, I dare venture to foretell, never will. With a man who can seriously persuade himself that the admission of six respectable noblemen into this House, and of not twenty-six into the other House of Parliament, would undermine the fabric of our incomparable Constitution, it is impossible to reason; there must be something more than reason at the bottom of his objections. In truth, he who now talks of danger from Popery, would, (as Dr. Johnson observed) have cried out fire in the deluge. I shall detain your lordships no longer. You have it still in your power, by acceding to the prayer of the petitioners for civil privileges unaccompanied by Vetoism, to tranquillize one third part of your population; and to gratify exceedingly another third part, consisting of Protestant dissenters, and of many, very many, members of the Established Church; but may I be permitted to add, that no time is to be lost. The Catholics of Ireland, and of England also, have, for more than a century, displayed a mo-dération, a forbearance, a meek endurance of ill, which would have done credit to any of the primitive martyrs; but it is not reasonable to expect, that they will always continue equally patient and submissive; nor, perhaps, is it even to be wished that they should do so: for there is a degree of insult and oppression, which not only justifies resistance, but which makes non-resistance a tame, passive, criminal servility, unworthy of freemen, and dangerous in a free state; for slaves have ever been, and must always be, dangerous subjects. Whether the wrongs of injured Ireland have reached this degree, I shall not presume to determine; but, sure I am, that there is very little of human policy, and still less of Christian charity, in suffering them to approach it so nearly."

The Bishop of Ossory rose next, and spoke to the following effect:—"My Lords, I feel myself imperiously called upon by my duty to my King, my duty to my country, and my duty to that most pure and reformed Church, of which I am one of the prelates, not to give a silent vote upon this momentous subject. Nothing could exceed my astonishment at hearing my right rev. friend (the Bishop of Norwich) find fault with the excellent speech of the learned prelate (Bishop of Llandaff) who preceded him. Little did I expect to have heard any of the right rev. prelates on this bench receive something like a reprimand for defending that ecclesiastical establishment, and that Protestant religion, which we all, at our consecrations, have sworn to defend. Far, very far, indeed, be it from me, to presume to compare myself with my right rev. friend in learning—but, my lords, in memory, I may, I trust, without presumption, in some points compare myself with him; and if my memory does not greatly deceive me, Mr. Locke has asserted the very reverse of what my right rev. friend has declared him to have done. My lords, I think, Mr. Locke, in his first letter on Toleration, has made use of almost these very words, "I will not grant even toleration to the Roman Catholics, because they will not grant toleration to any other sect." I am almost certain that this is the spirit of the great philosopher, if they be not his very words. If then, my lords, this great man would not grant toleration (which God forbid that I should refuse) to the Roman Catholics, how can we suppose, for a moment, that he would grant them the power of sitting within the walls of Parliament? No, Mr. Locke never entertained such an absurd idea. He well knew that England was, and must be governed by a Protestant King, and that she ought to be governed by a Protestant Ministry, and by a Protestant Parliament. My lords, the right rev. prelate, at the latter end of his speech, uttered a sentiment which I am certain was heard by every noble lord with pain. From my long knowledge of my learned friend, and from my acquaintance with the goodness of his heart, and the suavity of his manners, I could not have believed that such a monstrous doctrine could have escaped his lips. It must, my lords, have been produced by the heat of debate—for that right reverend prelate knows too well that it is his duty, as well as that of all the prelates on this bench, to inculcate "submission to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake." I am confident that nothing but the heat of debate could have led him to declare, that there was a point at which non-resistance, on the part of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, would cease to be a virtue. I have no doubt but my learned friend will qualify this unconstitutional and irreligious doctrine. How widely different is it, my lords, from that sound and truly constitutional doctrine, held by a noble earl opposite, (Earl Grey) in his most luminous speech the other night. The noble earl declared, "that it was for your lordships, and the other House of Parliament, to legislate; and for the people to obey." The noble earl, who introduced the Catholic petitions into this House, has told your lordships, that very inflammatory and wicked publications have been sent to the houses, and thrust into the hands of almost every member of each House of Parliament. For my own part, I can assure the noble earl, that my opinion has not been biassed by any such publications; for I have never seen them, nor have I heard of them before. I am, therefore, inclined to think that the noble earl may rest satisfied that those little pamphlets have been very harmless. The noble earl has told your lordships, that although he was once an advocate for the veto, he was now convinced that it was a measure which would never be acceded to by the Roman Catholic hierarchy—and, even if it were, the noble earl has been pleased to say, that from the frequent absence of the first Secretary in England, the matter would possibly be left to a third or fourth clerk in the Castle of Dublin. Fears have been expressed by the noble earl, of some great parliamentary influence appointing the Roman Catholic bishops. I confess, my lords, I see no great probability of either of these events occurring. I have never seen any nobleman who has exercised the high station of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who would so scandalously neglect his duty as to leave a matter of such moment to a third or fourth clerk—and I am perfectly convinced, that neither of the noble lords immediately behind the noble earl would have so grossly misconducted themselves: and although I differ from those noble personages in politics, I entertain much too high an opinion of them to imagine them capable of being guilty of such a dereliction of duty. The noble earl has told your lordships that a plan has, at length, been devised which will remove all difficulties, and enable your lordships, in a committee, to frame such a bill as, whilst it shall give ample security to the Protestant, will open the door of the Constitution to the Catholic. If it be so—it is, indeed, a very important discovery, and well worthy of your lordships' most serious consideration. Let us, then, calmly and dispassion-

ately consider what this scheme is. The noble earl has been obliged, at last, to confess that this mighty talisman is nothing more nor less than domestic nomination. Why, my lords, the noble earl knows, that the Protestants have enjoyed this most invaluable blessing for many, many years. This boasted security has been granted by the Roman Catholics for ages—because for a very great length of time, indeed, have the Roman Catholic bishops been nominated in no other way. As I wish as much as I possibly can, to prove to your lordships the almost utter impossibility of coming to a right understanding with the Irish Roman Catholic ecclesiastical body, who differ as much from their own opinions declared and published by their authority, as they do from me, I shall be obliged to read many documents to you on this subject, as well as on their difference of opinion with M. Quarantotti and the learned bishops and doctors of Rome: and I can assure your lordships, that I will quote them fairly, and “set down nought in malice.” I will now, my lords, shew you that the veto was by no means considered by the Roman Catholic prelates of Ireland, assembled in Dublin on the 17th, 18th, and 19th days of January, 1799, as contrary to their religion, or as leading them into the heavy guilt of schism; nor had those titular bishops, at that period, any objection to receive through his Majesty’s Government, a provision for the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland. At a meeting of those prelates, held to deliberate on a proposal from Government of an independent provision for the Roman Catholic clergy, under certain regulations, not incompatible with their doctrines, discipline, or just influence—it was admitted, “that a provision through Government for the Roman Catholic clergy of the kingdom, competent and secured, ought to be thankfully accepted.”—The noble earl has just now told us, that the Roman Catholic clergy ask for no remuneration, and wish for no stipend except what their flocks think proper voluntarily to give them. I must beg leave here, my lords, to observe, that I believe it will be found, that for every office performed by a parish priest, there is a regular fixed price, which the individual (however poor) must pay, if he or she will have the assistance of the parish priest. But we will return to the resolutions of the titular bishops. They continue to state, “That in the appointment of the prelates of the Roman Catholic religion to vacant sees in the kingdom, such interference of Government as may enable it to be satisfied of the loyalty of the person appointed, is just and ought to be agreed to.” Now, my lords, these very same Roman Catholic prelates have lately told the clergy and the people of Ireland, that they could not consent to the veto without being guilty of schism, and that any interference whatever on the part of the Protestant Government of the country, is contrary to the doctrines of their religion, so that your lordships may perceive they say one thing to day, and unsay it to-morrow. I will leave your lordships to determine how you would act in private life with individuals who conducted themselves in this manner. I am inclined to think, your lordships would have no dealings with them. The resolutions of the above date conclude thus:—“Agreeably to the discipline of the Roman Catholic Church, these regulations can have no effect without the sanction of the Holy See, which sanction the Roman Catholics of this kingdom shall, as soon as may be, use their endeavours to procure.” The noble earl will be so good as to remember that even in this treaty (if it may be so called) the foreign influence has the sole power: the prelates are the members, the sovereign pontiff is the head, and recognized as such in the treaty with their sovereign lord the King, and his Parliament.—The document I have just referred to, my lords, was signed by two of the titular archbishops, and several of their suffragans. Of the other security which has been proposed, the veto, your lordships are aware, that the Catholic Irish prelates differed most decidedly in opinion with the bishops and learned divines assembled at Rome; the former declared, that the Relief Bill “was utterly incompatible with the discipline of the Roman Catholic Church, and with the free exercise of their religion;” they said, that without incurring the heavy guilt of schism, they could not accede to such regulations, nor could they dissemble their dismay and consternation at the consequences which such regulations, if enforced, must necessarily produce.”—How, my lords, can you treat with such persons with any prospect of coming to a fair and equitable arrangement? By an extract from the rescript of his Eminence Quarantotti, we learn that, “in a full council of bishops and divines, after having read the letters from Dr. Poynter and from Dr. Troy, (the titular Archbishop of Dublin,) and the matter being duly considered in a meeting convened for the express purpose; it was decreed, that the Catholics should receive with gratitude the law which was proposed for their emancipation.”—Here is a difference indeed between these learned doctors! Those of Ireland knew very well, that the bill was neither incompatible with the discipline of their Church, nor would it have involved them in the heavy guilt of schism. But it seems they had an insurmountable objection to any measure tending to give the slightest security to the Protestant Church. To escape out of the dilemma in which they were involved with the council at Rome, they called a meeting of all the Romish parish priests and clergymen of the Archdiocese of Dublin, and I will read to your lordships their three first Resolutions, which are well deserving of notice:—“That we consider the rescript of M. Quarantotti as not obligatory; particularly as it wants those authoritative marks, whereby the mandates of the Holy See are known and recognized, especially the signature of the Pope.”—“That we consider the granting to Government any power direct, or indirect, with regard to the appointment and nomination of the Catholic Bishops of Ireland, at all times inexpedient.”—“That circumstanced as we are in this country, we consider the granting such a power not only as inexpedient, but highly detrimental to the best and dearest interests of religion; and pregnant with incalculable mischief to the cause of catholicity in Ireland.”—Here appears the truth: and the real cause of their opposition to any interference on the part of the King’s Government, respecting the appointment of Catholic bishops, is now declared: “It would be pregnant with incalculable mischief to the cause of catholicity in Ireland;” in other words, it might impede their plans for the subversion of the Protestant establishment, and the erection of Popery in its place. I must beg leave to trouble your lordships with a statement which appeared in the Catholic official paper of that period, the Dublin Evening Post of Tuesday, May 10th, 1814, soon after the receipt of the rescript from Rome, exhorting them to receive the bill gratefully.—“On Saturday many pathetic admonitions against the Papal rescript were pronounced from the different altars of this city. This (continues the statement) is a glorious instance of the liberty of the Irish Church, and an answer to all those who were in the habit of accusing Catholics of a subserviency of spirit, and a blind obedience to the decrees of the Vatican. The clergymen exhorted their flocks to be patient—to remain tranquil under so severe a visitation; but to be prepared, if necessary, to sacrifice their lives, rather than surrender the freedom of their Church to Prelate or Pope. The exhortations were heard with deep emotions of indignation, and it was easy to see that the resistance will be universal.”—Here, my lords, is a true but very melancholy picture of the real state of Ireland. Your lordships may exercise your legislative right of enacting laws: you may pass a bill by which you may flatter yourselves the Roman Catholics of Ireland would be greatly benefited; it may receive the fiat of the Bishop of Rome and the conclave of Cardinals—and yet the Irish prelates and priests may be of a very different opinion, and may tell your lordships, and the other House of Parliament, that although you imagined you were conferring a favour, you were entailing upon them a curse. You may be told (as resolutions from the Roman Catholics of Kilkenny have declared) that any bill of which the veto forms a part, is “a penal law, and a persecution, which, if persisted in, would shake the British Empire to its foundation.” So say the Roman Catholic Clergy of the diocese of Ossory. I, the Protestant Bishop of that diocese, must take the liberty of declaring to your lordships (and I believe I might say that my clergy would unanimously agree with me in the opinion), that if you ever admit persons professing the Roman Catholic religion into the Houses of Parliament, you will endanger the throne of your Sovereign and his illustrious family; you will endanger the Protestant establishment in England, as well as in Ireland; for nothing can be more erroneous than to suppose that the one may be overthrown, and the other continue in safety: or that there is not a most intimate connexion between the Altar and the Throne—they must stand or fall altogether. By acceding to the claims of the Roman Catholics, you will, in my humble opinion, endanger the existence of the British connexion in Ireland.—I shall doubtless be told by the noble lords on the other side, that the petitioners have offered to bind themselves by the most solemn oaths (in which the clergy and laity had concurred) to support our Protestant establishment. What, my lords, the Catholic clergy swearing to support the Protestant establishment! On this point I must confess my want of faith—“Credat Judæus Apella; haud ego,”—for my weak understanding is unable to comprehend how they can do this, and adhere to the tenets of their catechism of Trent, which contains this very remarkable passage—“The words of the pastors of the Church, are to be received as the word of God.” I must now read an extract from a pamphlet attributed to a right hon. and exalted character, (the Right Hon. Charles Abbot) who for a series of years has filled, with equal honour to himself, and advantage to the public, one of the most distinguished situations in the State, upon the subject of oaths. It bears date May 14, 1813. “As to oaths, I do not think they are to be undervalued; but they cannot be accepted without some discrimination. That they are not to be entirely relied upon, is apparent, by the very conduct of the friends of the bill, and by the necessity they have felt, of superadding regulations to enforce the same purposes. We must also bear in mind by whom these oaths are to be interpreted, and how they have been interpreted. Nor can we shut our eyes against the notorious fact, that the sovereign pontiff, not in ancient times, but so lately as the year 1809, by a solemn instruction to the prelates of his Church, has commanded them to distinguish between the passive oaths which may be taken, and the active oaths which may not be taken, by the Roman Catholics of any heretical state; and has declared, that all oaths taken to the prejudice of the Church, are null and void: nor are these doctrines to be found only in Italy: it is well known that in London also, and within the last eight and forty hours, distinctions of the same sort have been promulgated, in the name and by the authority of a leading prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, and circulated throughout this metropolis.” Most happy do I consider myself in having my opinion backed by such high authority.—To convince your lordships how extremely absurd it is to imagine, for a moment, that any oath which may be taken by any Roman Catholic prelate or priest will give security to the Protestant establishment; I will read you an extract from M. Qua-rantotti's famous letter to Dr. Poynter, dated 16th February, 1814, by which the melancholy fact will evidently appear, that although they (priest or bishop) may take the oath, a foreign influence will put whatever construction on it may best suit the interest, not of the Protestant, but of the Romish Church. "In case the bill be already passed, containing the same words," (this, my lord, alludes to the oath which was inserted in the Relief Bill,) "or that nothing in it is allowed to be altered, let the clergy acquiesce, and it will be sufficient for them to declare, that this, and this only, is the sense in which they have sworn to it; so that nothing in the oath may be adverse to orthodox doctrine, and that this protest may be generally known, and be for an example to posterity, this construction of it shall be publicly recorded."—Here, my lords, is an ex post facto interpretation of an oath, commanded by a foreign authority. How then is it possible to rely on the faith of persons professing such principles? As I cannot find words sufficiently strong to express my abhorrence of such double-dealing, I shall be silent. Of the present head of the Catholic Church, I must now beg leave to say a few words. Your lordships must recollect that he was the Pontiff who travelled from Rome to Paris to assist at the coronation of (not to crown) Napoleon Buonaparte, for the newly declared Emperor would not permit even his holiness himself to place the imperial crown upon his head. He took it from the Pope, and placing it on his own head, exclaimed with a very loud voice, "Dieu me la donne; garde qui la touche." The sovereign head of the Catholic Church, declared the new Emperor of the French the eldest son of the Church. This child of jacobinism, this religious Proteus, who even on the very ground on which his Saviour trod, denied his Divinity, was nevertheless styled by the Bishop of Rome, the eldest son of the Church. Better would it have been for the character of his holiness, had he laid down his life at the threshold of the Vatican. To Pius VII. are we indebted for the re-establishment of the Society of the Order of the Jesuits in Ireland, a favor no doubt conferred upon the subjects of King George the Third, for the many signal instances of protection shewn to his Holiness by his Majesty. It is well worthy of remark, that Ireland and Spain are the only two places where the Jesuits have been permitted to establish themselves. Another act of the present Pope was a Bull, dated the 29th of June, 1816, to the Primate Archbishop of Poland, in which he calls the dispersion of the Bible "a crafty device, by which the very foundations of religion are undermined," and informs the Archbishop, that he has convened the cardinals to consider what measures ought to be taken "in order to remedy and abolish the pestilence, as far as possible." In this production of Pope Pius VII., the members of the Bible Society will doubtless perceive much toleration. My lords, if your lordships ever consent to admit those into Parliament whose spiritual organ thunders out such language as this, you will, with your eyes open, admit a set of individuals, whose primary obligation is "to support the Catholic faith, and destroy the Protestant religion;" that religion, my lords, which every King of England, at his coronation, must swear "to the utmost of his power to maintain." I must beg your lordships' attention to the force of these words: for in the other parts of the oath the word utmost is not mentioned. I will now read to you, my lords, extracts from the declarations and solemn pledges given by every King of the illustrious House of Hanover to Parliament, on their accession to the Throne, with the answers of the Commons thereto.—(Here the right rev. prelate read the extracts, and then proceeded as follows:—) Far, very far, be it from me, my lords, to presume to deny the omnipotence of Parliament. Parliament has, most undoubtedly, a right to alter and amend the Constitution of the State. It has frequently and wisely done so—but, my lords, if it ever change the Constitution so far as to admit those persons into Parliament, whose spiritual head, or heads, deem it no disgrace to put an ex post facto interpretation upon a most solemn oath, which was supposed to have been inserted into an act as a measure of security, it will, I most conscientiously believe, shake the British empire to its foundation; and, my lords, I am at a loss to imagine how any Minister, remembering the solemn pledge which our beloved Sovereign gave to his Parliament, could bring himself to advise the Prince Regent, "acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty," to give the royal assent to any such bill. When the noble earl who introduced the Roman Catholic petitions into this House, assured us how much it was the wish of that body to conciliate their Protestant brethren, I own, my lords, I was absurd enough to expect that an offer would have been made by the Pope, and by the Popish clergy and laity of Ireland, to grant to his Majesty the same privileges as the King of Prussia, or any other Protestant sovereign possesses, with regard to the appointment of Bishops, &c. But the noble lord was not authorized to make any concession. His clients ask for every thing, but will yield nothing. My lords, I perfectly agree with Dr. Dromppole, when he says, "that if the Church of England wants securities, she must seek them elsewhere, for the Roman Catholics have none to give." It has been the fashion among the advocates for concession, which has been very improperly termed Catholic Emancipation, to state, that the Roman Catholics of Ireland were a degraded and enslaved people. Now, my lords, no statement was ever more unfounded in fact than this; and I defy any noble peer on the other side to point out any Catholic State in Europe, whose subjects enjoy more civil liberty, or possess more religious toleration : and some of your lordships will, probably, be surprised when I inform you, that the Roman Catholic Clergy of Ireland, with respect to marriages, exercise a power which the Protestant clergy are forbidden by law to exercise. A Protestant clergyman is subject to certain pains and penalties, if he marries any persons whose banns have not been three times published in the churches of their respective parishes, or without a licence is shewn him, which dispenses with the publication of the banns. A Roman Catholic clergyman marries his parishioners without any banns, and is liable to no penalties. Your lordships are well aware, that the great majority of forty-shilling freeholders in Ireland are Romanists : and, I trust, you will always bear in your remembrance, that the minds of the great mass of Irish Roman Catholic population are in a state of absolute subjugation to the priesthood. If then you leave the qualification of the voter at the absurd low rate of forty shillings, and open the doors of the Legislature to Catholics, you will find sixty of that body out of the one hundred Irish members seated within the walls of the other House. And let me seriously ask your lordships, whether you would wish to see sixty very respectable Catholic gentlemen assembled in a committee of the House to consider the merits of the bill proposed for the better regulation of the Protestant clergy ? The Catholic religion, my lords, is every where the same—active, busy, and meddling with the political affairs of every state. It does not, like the Protestant religion, “study to be quiet, and mind its own business ;” but it expects the people and the Government to yield implicitly to whatever its hierarchy may deem most expedient for its aggrandisement. If proof of this were wanting, a very signal instance might be found in a kind of pastoral letter (signed by the Archbishop of Mechlin, and, I believe, by all his suffragans, except two) which was thrust under the doors of the shopkeepers of Brussels, a few days prior to the inauguration of the King of the Netherlands, in which the Catholics were told, that they could not, as good Catholics, take an oath of fealty and allegiance to a Protestant prince : and what is still more extraordinary, this curious production could not be obtained two days after it had been so dispersed—although very great pains were taken to procure a copy, and much money offered for one. My lords, I will proceed no further, although much remains to be said. For the reasons I have assigned, I must oppose the motion of the noble earl ; and, I trust, your lordships will recollect, that if the majority of the Irish be Romanists, the majority of the people of England and Scotland are Protestants.

The Bishop of Norwich explained. He would yield to no man in his recollection of the part of Mr. Locke's works to which he had referred ; and notwithstanding the contradiction he had received, he insisted that that great writer laid it down as a principle, that no man ought to suffer for not being a member of the Established Church, unless it could be proved that he maintained opinions injurious to the State. He entered into the same writer's reasoning upon the subject, to shew that he even carried it farther than was generally supposed.

The Earl of Harrowby said, he could not give a vote upon this great and often agitated question without some explanation. In the course of previous discussions it had often been his fate to hear speeches on both sides containing positions equally untenable, and the present debate had afforded a fresh instance of the kind. If any thing could have driven him to give a vote in a contrary direction to that which he intended, it would have been a part of the speech of the right reverend prelate who spoke last ; and if any thing could have added to the conviction to which he had come, it would have been the address delivered by the other right reverend prelate who spoke last but one. The former (the Bishop of Norwich), without due reflection, had uttered sentiments, which, if weighed with the utmost candour, must be held to be extremely dangerous ; as tending to set up a power superior to the law, and to inculcate notions that might lead to the extremes, not only of sedition, but also of rebellion. (Hear, hear.) On the other hand, the right reverend prelate had been equally imprudent in expressing his opinions, and had advanced doctrines to which he probably would not adhere on reconsideration. The right reverend prelate who spoke first (Bishop of Llandaff) had stated the question with great distinctness, and had wisely discarded a great deal, often formerly found in long speeches and large volumes, which proceeded upon the principle, that a difference of religious opinion alone was a just ground of exclusion from civil office. Civil qualifications and civil guards were therefore only contemplated by him ; but he, unavoidably it should seem, mixed them up with religious points, regarding the comparative degree of allegiance to be expected from a Protestant and a Catholic. It seemed, however, clear, that the allegiance of a man who was attached to both Church and State must be more perfect than that of a man who was of a contrary religion to that of the establishment. The chain that bound the subject to his country was composed of a variety of links ; and when one of those links was wanting, its strength could not be so great ; but the question for a politician, in a case like the present, was—whether in the absence of that link to make the chain complete, it was not sufficiently strong to bind firmly and effectually. (Hear, hear.) Even in Catholic countries, the civil and religious allegiance were not directed to the same individual ; and if the foregoing proposition were not true, it would be no difficult task to prove, by every rule of logic, that a Catholic could not be a good subject to any king of any country. It was politic as much as possible to avoid all differences and disputes between the allegiance to the Sovereign, and the allegiance to the Pope. History shewed that the consequences of such discordances, in former times, were misery and disorganization. It was but fair at present to take into consideration the different circumstances in which the country was placed: no man would refuse to admit that a great distinction prevailed. In the reign of Elizabeth the fidelity of the Catholics had been put to a severe test: the Sovereign was excommunicated, and yet how small a portion of the difficulties of her reign originated in the active disloyalty of the Catholics of her kingdom? In the reign of Charles I., who adhered with more firmness, or made greater sacrifices, than the Roman Catholics? and even in severer trials, no class had exhibited more exemplary firmness and resolution in support of the State under which they lived. In Acts of Parliament they had over and over again been declared the loyal subjects of the Crown of England; and the only fair question now to be put was, whether, when they had greater inducements to fidelity, they would not if possible, more steadily adhere to the Government under which they enjoyed so many advantages? (Hear, hear.) The right reverend prelate (the Bishop of Ossory) had taken great pains to shew that the opinions of the clergy had perpetually varied: if the argument were good for any thing, it removed all objections on the score that their present tenets were adverse to any arrangement, because it shewed, that those tenets might easily be altered, and the disposition of those who held them rendered favourable to the measure. Such, however, was an unfair line of argument as applied to any set of men; and it might be employed, not only against Catholics, but Protestants, and every denomination of Christians. Some bloody acts that remained in our statute-book not long ago, would have entitled England to the appellation of the most sanguinary and pitiless nation known in the history of the world; and were the Scotch clergy of the present day to be reviled, because their ancestors of the same faith had solemnly declared at the Union, that episcopacy should never be introduced into their country? To conciliate, and not to irritate, should be our present object; and surely, to bring into employment, for the benefit of the State, the talents and the industry of so large a portion of the subjects of the Crown, was an object worth attaining. The question then resolved itself into this point—where did the danger exist? If a satisfactory answer were given to it that night, it would be for the first time. (Hear.) Foreign allegiance and its consequences had been spoken of by a right reverend prelate, who had asserted, and truly, that when foreign influence was abandoned, the Catholic became not a Roman but an Irish Catholic. Was it possible to afford to this objection of allegiance to the Pope a more complete answer? Could any thing better be desired, than that four millions of subjects should become Irish Catholics?

(Hear, hear.) It had been urged, as another objection, that if a few Catholics were admitted into the army, navy, or parliament, they would soon form a dangerous majority; but surely this danger was chimerical on all accounts, whether the numbers or the motives of the men were considered. Assuredly, if they could overthrow the State, the Church would be in great danger: but was it not demonstrable, that the Protestant members now returned by Catholics to Parliament were more to be dreaded than as many Catholics in their seats? A Protestant member, if he wished to retain his place, would be obliged to vote as his constituents should dictate—he had not the possibility of being impartial; while the Catholic would be left to the free exercise of his discretion. The impolicy of excluding Catholic from the naval and military services had been so often proved, that it was scarcely necessary to repeat it; but he would ask, was it prudent to make enemies of those who had fought and bled for their country? Was it just, while they exposed themselves in defence of the State, to deprive them of the honours due to their martial achievements? Or was it a wise system, as applied to the bar, from whence the greatest dangers to a Government might arise, to give those who were called to it an incentive to discontent? If the opponents of the Catholic claims would declare, that Catholics should never be allowed to open their mouths for the purpose of speaking, the argument would be intelligible; but they were permitted to gain influence, fame, and fortune, and then they were told “thus far shalt thou go and no farther;” they were not to be allowed to ascend the Bench, lest the due administration of justice should be impeded by their notions upon some abstract points, though subject to the censure of an enlightened Bar, and the tribunal of a public equally enlightened. Just so much privilege was allowed them as to make them dangerous; while they were excluded from every thing that could attach them to their country and to the State. (Hear.) The House ought not to forget that this question was progressive, and that it was impossible for things to remain in their present condition. Was it expedient, he would ask, that this discussion should be renewed year after year? and if it was not, were their lordships sure that the ground upon which they stood was so secure as to extinguish all apprehension of danger? To his judgment it certainly appeared, that an unaccountable and unreasonable division of sentiment between two parts of the same empire, situated on different sides of the Channel, never could conduce to the well-being or security of the State. He did not think it at all necessary, in his view of the subject, to enter into any discussion, either of the veto or of the plan of domestic nomination. It was for Parliament to determine that question; and if it should adopt the measure, to prescribe the necessary conditions. (Hear, hear.) It would then be for the Catholics to say whether they would accept the arrangement so provided, or not; and if they should refuse, Parliament would have the satisfaction of having performed its duty. Few who then heard him, he was persuaded, were desirous that the law should continue as at present, unaltered in any of its parts. If the committee were appointed, an inquiry into the whole system might be accomplished; and if all the good that in his opinion was desirable could not be attained, some concessions might be agreed to, and some obnoxious grievances removed. If the Catholics should not then obtain the boon, which had been so long in their view, they would have the consolation of reflecting that their case had been considered, and must receive with gratitude the assurance that the Legislature had been actuated by a desire to yield to their claims, if it could have been done consistently with the safety of the Constitution. With these views he hoped their lordships would support the motion for a committee, and trust to the investigation which would then take place for the best decision of what might wisely be surrendered, and of what it was essential to withhold. (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of Liverpool said, he had heard with no less satisfaction than the House, the speech of his noble friend, marked as it was, not more by that acuteness of mind and force of thought which always distinguished him, than by the most candid and unexaggerated statement; but although he felt thankful to him for his clear exposition of the argument, he was sorry that he must differ from him in his conclusions. He wished, in the first place, to refer to what he considered the real merits, of the question. It was, undoubtedly, competent to his noble friend to say, in support of a motion for appointing a committee to examine this or any other subject, that it was not bound to come to any certain resolutions, or to recommend any specific measures: but he must contend, at the same time, that their lordships were entitled, before they assented to such a proposition, to look at the real intention with which it was brought forward. It was not pretended that the object was to redress any partial grievances, to make any partial concessions, or to remove any particular anomalies: it was not urged that some new modifications of the act of 1793 had become necessary in the present circumstances of the country; but the professed purpose was, to place the Irish Roman Catholics in every respect (some provisions with respect to the Church alone excepted) on a footing of equal privileges with Protestant subjects. This, he apprehended, was the real ground of the question. If the motion contemplated nothing but some farther indulgences, or as complete a toleration as was compatible with the existence of a Protestant Government, the argument for a committee would be unanswerable, nor should he be disposed to object to it; but the fact was, it was all or nothing that was required. A bill which went to the extent of granting every demand, was brought into the House of Commons in the year 1813, and was read a first and second time. In the committee it was proposed by a very great authority (the Speaker), to omit that clause which enabled Roman Catholics to sit in Parliament. The clause was consequently negatived, and the authors of the bill considered that omission as a defeat of the whole measure. They exhibited no desire to obtain additional advantages for the Catholics in the army, in the navy, or at the bar; but because they could not carry all, refused all; and the bill was thrown out, not by those who were the most unfavourable to it, but by its friends and promoters. (Hear, hear.) Having said so much as to the light in which the immediate question ought to be viewed, he wished to make a few observations on the ecclesiastical branch of the subject. He must, however, express at the outset his desire to clear the discussion of this point from all extraneous considerations. If concession were to be resolved on, it was desirable, in his opinion, that it should be made without any interference with the doctrines or discipline of the Irish Catholic Church. The case of those foreign Catholic churches which existed under Protestant Governments was essentially different from that under consideration. For example, he might allude to the relation between Prussia and Silesia, or Russia and her Polish provinces: these were territories annexed to great states by treaty or conquest, in which the population, the property, the Church, all were Catholic; and in which the Roman Catholic was, therefore, the established religion. They could not deny the temporalities to the Government; and we were equally entitled to claim a jurisdiction over the civil establishment of Ireland; but the Catholic was not the established religion of Ireland, nor ought Parliament therefore to assume the authority of legislating on matters affecting the principles of its ecclesiastical system. Much as had been said with regard to the veto, and with regard to domestic nomination, he attached no importance to regulations of that nature. They might be judicious restraints, if the object of jealousy was the character of individuals; but he believed that no men could be more respectable than the Catholic prelates; and if there had been any exceptions to this remark, they had not proceeded from Irish nomination, but were to be traced to a very different cause. It was not about the form of the nomination that he entertained any scruples: the source of his objections and apprehensions was, that, however named, they were necessarily subject to foreign influence, the pastors of the Romish church, and bound to pay obedience to a foreign ecclesiastical jurisdiction. (Hear, hear.) He agreed entirely, that if concessions were to be granted, they ought not to be made in an ungracious manner, a manner which must excite painful feelings without affording any additional security. The only question with him was, were they prepared to make concessions? A right reverend prelate (the Bishop of Llandaff) had observed, that in point of abstract principle no description of persons could complain of unequal privileges, who voluntarily placed themselves in a situation which forfeited the equality of them. He should ask, not only as it affected the Catholics, but every other body of dissenters from the Established Church, did they, when they required equal privileges, offer equal conditions? And if they did not, could it be contended that there was any injustice or inexpediency in distinguishing between them? (Hear, hear.) Without pretending to decide positively, he certainly entertained great doubts whether any Civil Government could long exist without the aid and union of some form of ecclesiastical establishment. However that might be, he trusted this country would never make the experiment. At the period of the Revolution the connexion between the State and the Church was solemnly recognized; it was a connexion which pervaded all our institutions, and characterized every part of our system. It was then settled, that the King himself must communicate with the Church of England. The same rule was applied, although since not unwisely relaxed, to the army and navy. The two Houses of Parliament were, on some occasions, parties to the performance of its rites and worship; and the judges of the land, if not by positive law, yet by immemorial custom, never opened their commissions without repairing to the Established Church. (Hear, hear.) Thus deeply was the union he had described impressed upon all the forms of the Constitution. Upon what principle, he desired to know, if these concessions were allowed to the Roman Catholics, could they be refused to every other class of Dissenters? He admitted that all exclusion must sometimes operate harshly on individuals; and could only be justified, therefore, on adequate grounds of political expediency. The sect of dissenters called Quakers was a very respectable body, who were excluded by an act of their own. Why was not concession to be extended to them, or why not to the Jews, who might also conscientiously maintain their own peculiar opinions on theological subjects? Might he not, however, here call upon their lordships to consider how far they were going? The result of equal and general concession must be, to leave no difference between any description of Dissenters and the Established Church, in any respect beyond endowment. Parliament must immediately cease to be a Protestant Parliament. (Hear.) He could not be supposed to mean that the majority of members would be no longer Protestant; but the Catholics, whatever their numbers, would constitute an integral part of the Legislature, which must thus cease to be exclusively Protestant. This would at once effect an entire change in the system of the Constitution, and must dissolve that intimate alliance between the Church and State which had been established at the Revolution. He wished their lordships to contemplate the consequences of adopting such a principle. How would it apply to the law which excluded every other than a Protestant King? Would it be possible to maintain this part of the Constitution, whilst every obstruction was removed to all other offices, in favour of all other individuals? It would be hard indeed, that one family alone should be excepted from the right of adhering conscientiously to their religious opinions, unless by the sacrifice of the Crown. He was aware that it had been proposed (in the bill of 1819) to except likewise the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He should only say, that these were regulations quite unsatisfactory to his mind. This question, however, yet remained to be considered, with relation to the special and peculiar circumstances of Ireland. The proposed measure had been represented as one calculated to heal all past dissensions, to soothe and allay all animosities, and to create what had been termed a moral union throughout every portion of the empire. If he could really believe that these consequences would follow from its adoption, he should be extremely reluctant to withhold his support from it; but because he did not believe so, and thought it would produce an opposite effect, he felt his objections to it fortified and invincible. (Hear.) His noble friend had argued that things could not remain as they now are: he would rather ask, could they, if this measure should be carried, remain as they now are? (Hear, hear.) In that case grievances, or what would appear to be so, and be so called, would remain behind. It would then be considered as a grievous hardship, that where the majority of the population was Catholic, the establishment should be Protestant. It was useless to compare the circumstances of Ireland with those of countries in which the population and establishment went together. It would at last become a question, whether the faith which had been pledged to the maintenance of a Protestant establishment should be preserved or broken. Was it wise, then, with such a prospect before them, to weaken the foundations of the establishment by stripping it of part of that influence and power which might be essential to its defence? The practical effects of exclusion were only felt occasionally and by a few. Neither ought it to be forgotten, that the Roman Catholics themselves were the greatest exclusionists in the world. To prove this, it would not be necessary to appeal to the Councils of Trent and Lateran, but to modern recent decrees, in which it was expressly declared, that toleration was not consistent with the principles of their Church. Could it then be doubted, that if by any succession of events or combination of circumstances they should acquire the ascendancy, either civil or religious, they would exclude Protestants? This was the result of the best founded consideration he had been able to give the subject: he admitted that it was a case of difficulty; much of the policy that had been pursued in that country he regretted; but they were under the necessity of providing for circumstances as they actually existed. They must take things as they found them. At such a period as the present he conceived our best security would be in supporting and keeping together the Church and the State as established at the Revolution. All the indulgence and all the liberality that was consistent with this fundamental principle, he should feel happy to support: but he could not help regarding the design of bringing all religions to a level, as tending to unhinge the minds of all classes of the people; and, by unsettling opinions, to render society liable to receive every accidental prejudice or impression: thus impairing the ancient foundations of a Constitution under which we had long enjoyed the utmost happiness and security. (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of Darnley said, he was surprised that the noble lord should express a disposition to grant some farther indulgences to the Catholic body, and yet refuse to go into a committee, where that purpose might be immediately accomplished. He (Earl D.) was satisfied that a prejudice had been created against their cause, by the misconduct and intemperance of particular individuals; but although he regretted those circumstances, they convinced him more fully of the propriety of acceding to the claims of the petitioners. The very persons who had done so much injury to the progress of the measure, well knew that their consequence would cease when the question was carried. He was of opinion, that the admission of Roman Catholics to the full participation of the benefits of the State, so far from creating any danger, would increase our security. By granting them privileges, we should engage them to support the Constitution and laws under which those benefits would be enjoyed. He could not see any ground for the apprehensions of the noble earl opposite (Lord Liverpool.) Dangers had been stated, but they were merely ideal, and ought not to preclude concession. It had been said, that the full admission to privileges would not allay discontents and produce immediate and effectual conciliation. He was willing to allow that such an effect could not be produced at once. As he did not believe that the present exclusion was the cause of all the evils of Ireland, so he did not think that the removal of restrictions would operate to produce a complete cure. Many other remedies would be necessary, but this was indispensable as the commencement, and the qualifying principle of all the rest. We could not possibly remain where we were; we must grant more, or we had granted too much. Government should take up the measure as an essential part of its policy; and then there could be no doubt of the acquiescence of Parliament, from the numbers already zealously disposed in both Houses to exert themselves for its completion. It was a measure necessary for the well-being of Ireland, and the general security of the empire.

Lord Grenville began by saying, that, as the House must feel that his opinions had long been settled on the great question then before them—that, as on many preceding occasions he had endeavoured, with his utmost energy, to press upon their lordships to confer this important boon on England and on Ireland, it would not, he hoped, appear any diminution of zeal, if, at that late hour of the discussion, when the minds of their lordships were in possession of every argument, and the sense of the public was so fully enlightened on the subject, he should decline again to proceed into that wide and comprehensive view of it which on former occasions he had felt to be his duty. Nothing, indeed, that he could say could contain in it more than had already been brought forward and urged with such ability by a noble lord opposite (Lord Harrowby), who had cast his eye over the whole subject; who had taken a liberal and enlightened view of the interests of the empire; who had examined the question in all its bearings, with the tolerant spirit of a statesman. Most fully, likewise, did he (Lord G.) concur in the sentiment of a right reverend prelate (Bishop of Norwich)—a man who adorned the station in which he was placed—a man whose name was revered by the country—with whom he had lived long in habits of intimacy, and whom he was proud to call his friend: most fully did he agree with him, that the question of that night was not one of nice and metaphysical distinction; was not one of theological investigation, or religious discussion; but a question of justice and expediency; one of a purely and extensively political nature; one not for divine, or lawyers, or logical disputants, but for statesmen; one not for the school, but for the Legislature; a Legislature which had proceeded in its other enactments on enlightened principles; which had consulted the interests and endeavoured to promote the happiness of other parts of the empire, and other classes of the State: but which, in legislating for Ireland and Irish Catholics, had disgraced its statute-book, and distorted its policy, by some of the most oppressive, unjust, illiberal, cruel, and unwise enactments, that had ever stained the code of any country. He would not then enter into any theological dispute about the measure of spiritual obedience required of the Catholics, and other points of a similar nature. He would not go into considerations so narrow, so limited, so unstatesmanlike as those. He would not endeavour to draw their lordships' attention to points so little connected with the question. It would not be a proper subject of inquiry in that House what retired scholars in their closets might think or say about the limits of temporal or spiritual power exercised by the head of the Catholic Church; about the extent of obedience, or the degree of submission claimed or enjoyed by churchmen: their lordships were called upon to view the present question with a different spirit and for a different purpose; to look to it as one of legislation, to consider what experience had shewn on the subject, and what wisdom would point out to be done. When he viewed it as a question of policy, and followed the light of history and experience, he could not entertain a doubt. But instead of attending to these considerations, it seemed to be thought sufficient, by those who opposed the measure, to advance some nice subjects of difficult explanation, to recur to irrelevant matters of fact, or to point out some remote cause of apprehension, or some minute appearance of distant danger. When they had done so, they thought they had laid sufficient grounds for stopping farther proceedings, and called upon the Legislature to pause in the progress of concession. In opposition to such a mode of thinking and acting, he conceived that we ought not to view a question on one side, and to anticipate danger only from one quarter: that the difficulties and dangers attending a measure ought to be balanced, and that we ought to desire, not that course which was entirely free from circumstances of remote apprehension or contingent evil (in most cases not to be attained), but that which was attended with the fewest of them. If we never adopted any measure which had apparent wisdom and justice on its side, and positive good for its object, till it could be demonstrated that in the remote possibilities of events, in the unseen concatenation of causes, no natural evil could result from it, except by a special appointment of Providence, or a change in the laws of nature, he knew of no acts which a Legislature could pass with safety. He knew of no line of policy which would not, in such an event, be liable to objections. But if noble lords were so alive to the dangers of concession, could they shut their eyes to those evils which had threatened the empire for the last 60 years, from the want of it? This was no subtle point, no nice, abstract, metaphysical question: it was a practical question, that came home to the feelings of every man; of which all the empire heard and saw much; and which every person, who felt for the happiness of his country, or wished for its stability, had examined. We were placed in a situation of great difficulty. It was proposed by the opponents of the Catholic emancipation to remain where we were, unless we could shew that it was not possible for danger to arise from an endeavour to ameliorate our condition. In this situation we were destined to stand, not because it could be shewn clearly that by such an endeavour our interests would be endangered; not because it could be pointed out by what power, by what means, from what quarter, or at what time, difficulties or evils were to result from it; but because the House were told by the noble earl opposite (Liverpool) that the connection between Church and State, between the civil power and religion, had been long established, and ought to be maintained. He (Lord G.) held that very opinion as firmly as the opponents of the present measure; and it was because he held it firmly, and would zealously support it, that he asked their lordships to look at the question in all its bearings; to grapple with it; and not to be deterred from legislating upon it, because they might bring about evils no man knew of what nature; and might shake our establishments no man knew in what manner. If he were asked how the decision of this question could endanger the empire, or shake our establishments, he would answer, not by concession, but by withholding concession; by irritating the feelings, by insulting the pride, and calumniating the character of four or five millions of our fellow-subjects; and thus uniting them against our intolant principles and oppressive institutions. He would tell, on the other hand, the means of perpetuating our establishments, and confirming our religious institutions; and that would be by a measure which would demonstrate the liberality of our principles; which would admit to an equal participation of civil privileges those who differed from us on religious grounds. Nothing could strengthen our empire more than a cordial union and conciliation with Ireland: nothing could tend to our disadvantage more than the belief that we could stop where we were; and could, without concession, arrest the growing evils of that country. These evils were produced at first by intolerance, and had been perpetuated by an obstinate adherence to illiberal restrictions. A noble earl, on the other side, had spoken of the danger of relaxing farther these restrictions; but he had not specified how this danger would arise, and he (Lord G.) believed it never could arise at all. If danger were to arise from concession, it must now be as great as ever it could be by admission to farther privilege. All that was dangerous had been already granted. In the army, if there was any disposition to rebellion, or to the overthrow of our establishment, the Catholics had already acquired the means. They could accept of commissions below that of a general officer, and a colonel might have more influence over the minds of the soldiers of his regiment, than a general officer less connected with them. They might be governors of fortresses in the same manner, and might produce as great evils by betraying their trusts as if they were general officers. He would not go over the different heads of service, to point out the admissions and exclusions, so as to shew the impolicy of the latter in conjunction with the former, although he might instance the same thing in the navy. The Bar, likewise, was open to a display of their abilities, though the Bench did not offer them its honours; and he need hardly say, that in a country deprived of its Legislature, the influence of the Bar was proportionably increased. This was the case in Scotland, and would be the same in Ireland. To admit the Catholics into Parliament could be attended with no danger. It could not be supposed, considering the small numbers that would be admitted, that they could exclude, as seemed to be dreaded by the noble earl,

the majority of Protestants. If any alarm of this kind were really felt, it was superfluous to describe how needless and chimerical it was. A more distant and indistinct danger still had been apprehended by the noble earl. "If you remove this grievance (said he), would the Catholics be satisfied with their situation, and make no farther demands?" In return, he would ask the noble earl, if they were disposed to proceed these lengths after obtaining the intermediate privileges, would they be prevented by their refusal; would the discontent excited by ulterior wants be lessened by a feeling of present oppression; would their irritation be allayed by increasing its causes, or their power of doing mischief be diminished by multiplying its excitements? They would not become less attached to the State by sharing in its benefits, or less disposed to overturn its establishments by being excluded from them. In fact, if ever they were to be inclined to ask for greater privileges, or a distribution of church funds, they must be so at present; and had in addition the irritating consideration, that they were not only debarred from advantages which they might think they had a right to possess, but were excluded, wantonly, illiberally, and ungenerously excluded, from privileges they had a right to enjoy. Parliament should, therefore, remove this great cause of irritation; should shew them that Protestants could be liberal in concession, while they were firm in maintaining what they considered right; and demonstrate that a Protestant Church was perfectly consistent with the enjoyment of civil privileges by those who differed from it. Let the evil first be removed for which there was no necessity; and a firmer hold could be afterwards taken on ground which could not be disputed: this might be a sufficient answer; but he would go farther, and contend, that by concession we should not give the Catholics any advantage in their ulterior objects, but should deprive them of the wish to proceed, and interest them in the support of Protestant establishments. He knew no man who would be so presumptuous as to attempt to answer the noble lord's question, "would things rest there?" He could not tell what decision the wisdom of Parliament might come to, but this he would not hesitate to say, that no measure could produce such beneficial effects as concession; nothing could so promote peace and tranquillity; nothing could so guard against danger; nothing could more effectually counteract a long train of impolicy and misgovernment. This was what was represented as dangerous by the noble lord, and what he (Lord G.) thought the only means of safety. This was no new opinion of his. He had long entertained it; and every thing that he saw and heard only impressed it more deeply on his mind, and made him feel it with the greater force. It was a gross misrepresentation to attribute the illiberal spirit in which the present system originated to the Revolution. There never was a greater or more glorious prince than William III.—one more disposed to support freedom—more wise in his plans, or more successful in his undertakings; but if there were any thing more remarkable than another in all his great qualities, it was the liberal spirit by which he was guided; and the toleration that appeared in his life, his principles, his government, and his conduct. (Hear.) His example had been admired, and his principles had been diffused over Europe; and he (Lord G.) reckoned it hard, indeed, that the most disgraceful restrictions were identified with the reign of the most liberal prince of his own age, or of any other (Hear, hear, hear.) He maintained, that the principles of the Revolution had reconciled liberty with a Protestant Government; intolerance had afterwards followed; and the present measure could alone bring religious toleration back to its union with civil freedom. The system of relaxation began about 40 years ago; much had been effected in 1793, but all could not be accomplished then: all that could be done, all that the state of the country would admit of, was done. He (Lord G.) should always look back with pride and satisfaction on the share that he had in those measures. It was remarkable, that all those concessions were passed in times of distress and difficulty; and though no man could say that in the American war, when engaged with our own colonies, or at the commencement of the war with France, we were not in a situation in which every thing should have been done to promote our internal union, and to increase our resources, yet we ought not to allow, that what we then granted was extorted from us. As sinister motives, however, might be found for every thing, our situation at that time was considered as the cause of our liberality; and the relaxation of our restrictive policy was considered as the result rather of our fears than of our justice. This objection, however, no longer existed. We had now arrived at a situation in which we could afford to be liberal and tolerant without being suspected of displaying those qualities from an apprehension of danger. In arriving at this situation of security, we had been eminently assisted by the people of Ireland (Hear, hear); they had contributed largely their resources, they had shed their blood; they had spared nothing; they had refused us nothing. If we now granted concession, it would appear not to proceed from a fear of danger, but from a stronger principle—the operation of affection; and he might even add, the influence of gratitude. (Hear, hear.) It was happy that we could confer a favour now without any mistake of our motives. He would press, therefore, the granting of this measure—in the first place, because it was our duty; in the second place, because it was our interest; and lastly, because the feeling of every heart told us, that now the time had arrived for removing all jealousies, for allaying all discontents, and for producing perfect conciliation. (Hear, hear.) Thus Ireland, already united to us by geographical position, and by a common Government, would be still closer attached by the indissoluble bond of affection, and by the enjoyment of common laws and equal privileges. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Earl Bathurst asked for what purpose they were to go into a committee, without having settled certain principles on which they were to proceed? To go into a committee without some specific plan would only be to excite expectations which could not be fulfilled. The veto and domestic nomination had been mentioned as specific plans at different times: but the veto had been rejected by the clergy, and was afterwards withdrawn by their friends. It was understood to be an article of the Union, that there should be no bar to the discussion of the Catholic claims: well, we had discussed and inquired, and we found that it was not expedient to grant those claims; and surely it would not be said, that because the Act of Union did not bar discussion, it was to be considered as having taken away all bar to concession. Suppose there had been no Union, were their lordships prepared to say, that the Roman Catholic religion would have been established in Ireland? No, it would not: because it was contrary to the very principles of the Constitution, that a religious establishment should be set up in opposition to the Protestant establishment: this would be to take away the very key-stone of the arch of our system. The great argument on the other side was, that concession would dissolve that bond of union which at present existed between the Catholics of Ireland and foreign powers; but this argument was of no great weight, unless it were also shewn that the Catholics of Ireland would be completely satisfied with what was proposed to be granted to them. Would they not want more? As to the incapacities under which they at present laboured, he thought more than necessary stress had been laid upon them. Surely there was something visionary in the idea that a nation was injured, because some individuals were prevented by law from filling certain situations which it was impossible the great body of the people should ever attain; yet such was the reasoning of one class of the advocates of the Catholic claims. The peasant quietly tilling his potatoe ground, and who had no thought beyond it, was represented as a debased and injured man, because he could not become a colonel or general on the staff. To another class of advocates, who conceived that great additional concessions might still with safety be made to the Catholics, he was ready to give his acquiescence—that is, if a fair line could be drawn between what should be granted and what should not; and if he could believe that the grants so limited would be satisfactory, he would be one of the first to give his vote in support of them. But then let the advocates of such concessions produce their bill at once, and let the specific objects be fairly described: for why should the House go in the first instance into a committee? His noble friend (Lord Harrowby) had asked whether we thought we could stand where we did? To this he (Lord Bathurst) would answer, yes; I think I can stand, because I have stood; and I do not choose to go from the spot where I do and can stand, till you can prove to me that the spot to which you recommend me to move is quite as good as that which you ask me to leave (a laugh): but he thought this argument proved too much; for if the concessions were so dovetailed that they must go together, and that we must either repeal the past or go on to more, then he would ask when and where we were to stop? If the Catholics of Ireland were put on the same footing as the Protestant Dissenters, would they go farther, and ask also for a Church establishment? These were the grounds on which he felt it necessary to resist the present application: for these reasons he would not by his vote give a notice to quit till he was sure of having another house over his head. He was not prepared for that fundamental change in the establishment of the country which the proposed measure would effect. He was disposed to look with gratitude to the period of the Reformation: he did not mean to that bloody and licentious reign which first started that blessing, but to the mild and solid virtues of the succeeding monarch, who placed the Church upon a rock, from which he hoped in God it would never be displaced. (Hear, hear.)

Earl Grey said, that exhausted as the subject was by the speeches of his noble friends, and the noble earl opposite (Lord Harrowby), he felt some apology was necessary for troubling the House, and yet he could not reconcile it to his sense of duty to give a silent vote. He must therefore beg the attention of their lordships, while he expressed, in a few words, his sincere concurrence in the promotion of a cause supported by every principle of policy and justice. He had felt much pain and surprise at the course of argument pursued by a noble lord (Liverpool) and a right reverend prelate (Bishop of Llandaff) who had preceded him in the debate. They had made an objection, truly of an extraordinary nature, to the demands of their Catholic fellow-countrymen. What! was it at this period of general information that the British House of Peers was to sanction the monstrous idea that the Protestant religion was not such a religion as might, with safety, grant to the Catholic body that participation of power, which a Catholic Government had thought it expedient to grant to a Protestant body under similar circumstances? He had heard that assertion thus broadly and unequivocally delivered with considerable regret, because he had always thought, and until that evening he had never heard any thing to shake his conviction, that if our religion differed in any thing from the Catholic religion, it was in the liberality of its doctrines and of its professors.—(Hear, hear.)—It had been stated, that when the great duke of

Guise fell by the hand of an assassin, in the time of the religious disputes in France, under the reign of the most cruel enemy of the reformed Church, he exclaimed to his murderer, "mark the difference between your religion and mine; yours inculcates assassination as a duty, mine commands me to forgive!" (Hear, hear, hear.) A sentiment in itself so noble, that it had been introduced into one of our best theatrical pieces, the play of Tamerlane, in these words:—

"Now learn the difference 'twixt thy faith and mine—
"Thine bids thee lift thy dagger to my throat;
"Mine can forgive the wrong, and bid thee live."

The distinction here drawn by the poet he had always thought peculiarly applicable to the Church of England; but the doctrine of the reverend prelate, and of the first Lord of the Treasury, seemed to intimate that he had been mistaken. The noble earl who spoke last had asked, "Why go into a committee? why not bring forward some specific measure?" To this he would answer, that it was the Parliamentary usage to go into a committee on all matters of high importance, where great grievances required great remedies. Surely there was no man who could think that the exclusions under which the Catholics laboured were not great grievances. A right reverend prelate indeed had said, that he, forsooth, should be perfectly satisfied if the Catholics were allowed to enjoy merely those privileges which had been already granted to them: but he (Lord Grey) could never be satisfied while any individual, in a free country, remained cut off from his right—the capacity of power; such an exclusion was utterly inconsistent with the real principle of toleration. He was of opinion, that if such exclusion were not justified by State necessity, it was unjust, and could not be supported on any other ground. A noble earl had said that our Government was essentially Protestant, and that concession could not be allowed without altering the very nature of the Constitution. He (Lord Grey) had not so read the Constitution. Sure he was, that the great man under whom the laws now so much relied on were introduced, was, as his noble friend had expressed it, disposed to the greatest toleration; and if he did not carry his principles into full effect and practice, it was not his fault, but that of the spirit of the times: it was the State necessity of opposing a family then struggling for the Crown. That danger had ceased; and the laws enacted under it ought to cease with it. No danger now remained that could be pointed out or defined. None at least had been stated: he begged pardon: a noble lord opposite had stated one danger: that was of a nature somewhat unsubstantial. He had said, that if Catholics were admitted into Parliament, it could no longer be called exclusively a Protestant Parliament. But what was it now: was it really now a Parliament of an exclusively Protestant bias? Were not the Protestant members returned by Catholic electors as likely to be supporters of the Catholic interests as Catholics themselves would be? This was the first time that he had ever heard it avowed that the name was more important than the substance. He had heard and known that the forms of a free Government sometimes survived when the substance was gone; but never yet, when the liberties of a country had sunk under a military despotism, had he heard that it was considered any consolation that the names of those liberties remained. The mere name was but an insult when the reality was no more. (Hear, hear.) Yet the noble earl argued in this manner: he thought, that though the Parliament might be substantially the same, yet great danger was to be apprehended if two or three Catholic peers should be restored to their hereditary seats in that House, which had been filled by their illustrious ancestors with such glory to themselves and to their country. (Hear, hear.) And what was the danger of admitting these eminent persons into the enjoyment of their ancient rights?—Why, that the name of an exclusively Protestant Parliament would be done away; and with the name, according to the noble earl, the securities of the Protestant establishment would likewise be extinguished. Surely never was an argument more futile, never was danger more imaginary than this. (Hear.) After we had gone so far in removing the disabilities of the Roman Catholics, he could not conceive either the policy or the wisdom of stopping where we were. By withholding the claims of so large a body of his Majesty's subjects, we must make their discontents more formidable to the State. What could be more absurd in principle, what more dangerous in practice, than the exclusion of that body from the army? Nothing, he maintained, could be more absurd than to withhold from the Roman Catholic the name and rank of a general, whilst, in many cases, from the necessity of the service, we gave him the command and authority of a general. This, he believed, had actually occurred in the field of Waterloo, and from the accidents of war it must perpetually happen. With respect to the Bar, the system of exclusion was equally impolitic and dangerous. The Roman Catholic lawyer, whatever his abilities might be, was not only precluded from sitting on the Bench, but could not be admitted to the situation of King's counsel. The effect of this was, that we gave him a retaining fee against the Crown, and threw into his hands the means of making the discontent of the people most formidable to the Government. Was there any policy or wisdom in this? On the contrary, we rendered the Catholic population of Ireland not only useless, but dangerous to the State. He felt that at that late hour he was trespassing too much on the patience of their lordships, but he was anxious to explain the reasons upon which he should give his vote. The noble earl (Bathurst) had said, that if these claims were conceded, the test laws must be repealed; but so far from thinking that any danger would arise from adopting that measure, he (Earl Grey) thought it would be a material advantage to the country. He conceived it would be extremely beneficial to admit the English Catholics to a full participation of all civil, naval, and military privileges: and that it would be a measure of the greatest injustice to continue the operation of the test laws; they imposed a sort of stigma which the Dissenters did not deserve, and enforced a nominal and unnecessary disqualification. In the history of modern times we did not find that the spiritual fear of the Pope had prevented Roman Catholics from adhering to the Government in opposition to him; and, therefore, he was desirous, that their religious adherence to the Pope should not interfere with their civil interests. Unless he were greatly mistaken on this subject, he saw at once the danger and the remedy. The danger, he thought, was merely ideal; but the remedy consisted in uniting the Catholics to their own Government, when all danger, if any existed, would immediately vanish and disappear. It was a principle of the Church, to which the reverend prelates would not object, that we should do unto our neighbours as we would they should do unto us. In what situation did he find the Government of Holland? It was a Protestant Government; and the union of the Netherlands with that Protestant Government was adopted as a means of strength and alliance. The Treaty of Union said, that the two Governments should form but one State, of which the Protestant Government of Holland was the foundation. The second article declared, that equal protection and favour should be extended to every sect, and that all classes should be eligible to every office of the State. This treaty was framed upon the soundest principles of policy, and had been sanctioned and approved by the British Government. Here, then, we had a Roman Catholic State united to a Protestant Constitution, in which every individual was made admissible to every office whatever. We had done this for other countries; and having done so, he was wholly unable to comprehend, if it was safe for Holland, how any sound reason could be given, why a similar course of proceeding could be productive of the danger which some of their lordships seemed to apprehend. He was sensible that in what he now stated he added nothing to the strength of the arguments which had been so ably supported by his noble friend (Lord Glenville); but he had this satisfaction, that he had once more raised his voice against what he believed to be as impolitic as it was unjust; and which, instead of adding to the security, diminished the real tranquillity and welfare of the nation. (Hear, hear.)

The Lord Chancellor could not agree with the noble earl who had just sat down, that any argument could be drawn from the instance of Holland in favour of the emancipation of the Catholics of Ireland. In the treaty to which the noble earl had referred, that general extension of privileges was given, because the Government of the Netherlands was a Roman Catholic establishment. The ground of his opposition was, the nature of our Constitution with respect to the King's supremacy. He would pass over the time of Henry VIII., when that supremacy was first established; he would pass over the statute of the 1st of Elizabeth, when the supremacy of the Church was again established; but let their lordships remember, that, if ever a legislative measure was adopted to secure to the utmost the Protestant establishment, it was at the Revolution. Much had been argued from the writings of Locke; but he would venture to say, that no man in the world had been more decidedly hostile to the claims of the Catholics. That eminent writer had positively declared, that, according to the Romish Creed, faith was not to be kept with heretics; that they pronounced all who were not of their own communion to be heretics; and that they claimed the power of excommunicating kings: he, therefore, thought that they ought not to be admitted into power, since they delivered themselves over to another prince. When he stated, that these were the opinions of Mr. Locke, at the Revolution, he hoped he might say, that there had been times when the principles of the Catholics were considered to be dangerous. He hoped he might be permitted to call to the attention of their lordships, that they were now debating what they should do between Catholics and Protestants, considering the obligation they had all come under to maintain the Constitution of England. It could not be forgotten, that an act was passed in the reign of Charles II., to enforce a declaration against transubstantiation. That act was made for the better prevention of Roman Catholics being admitted into Parliament: and no man living could read the Bill of Rights, without seeing, that the civil and religious liberties of this country were to support each other. The preamble of that bill expressly stated, that the late King James had endeavoured to subvert the Protestant religion (hear, hear); and therefore certain persons had sent for King William,—for what? Not merely to secure their civil liberties, but also their religion. (Hear, hear.) They tendered the Crown to him, as a Crown to be worn by a Protestant, and by a Protestant only: and it was positively declared, that in case the Crown should devolve on a person professing the Roman Catholic religion, he should be considered as ipso facto dead, and the Crown should devolve on the next Protestant heir. (Hear, hear.) It was utterly impossible that any man could read the Bill of Rights without understanding that Popery was inconsistent with the principles of our Constitution. The oath of supremacy was established at the same time; and it asserted, that no foreign power ought to have any jurisdiction, either civil or religious, within this realm. (Hear.) Again, if we looked at the oath of a privy councillor, it denied the authority, both civil and ecclesiastical, of all foreign prelates whatsoever. (Hear.) With respect to himself, he had long entertained an opinion utterly inconsistent with the principles on which this question had been debated that night. He must say, that, according to his reason and apprehension, it went to the destruction of all the safeguards of the Constitution. His Majesty was to lose his throne, if he became a Roman Catholic; and he it remembered that the Bishops were specially summoned to consult as to the good of the Church. (Hear, hear.) If the King, then, could not be a Roman Catholic, how could the affairs of the State be administered by Popish officers? He would repeat, that our ancestors, at the time of the Revolution, had made it their business to secure this nation against the effects of Popery; and this was the Constitution which we were bound to transmit to posterity. (Hear.) The Roman Catholic religion was decidedly hostile to the principles of a free Government. The most eminent writers, Milton, Locke, Temple, Somers, and King William himself, had recorded this opinion; and James the Second was deprived of his Crown because he had attempted to introduce that religion into the State. What, then, should we now overturn all that our ancestors had done? What would the nation say to this? What would be the feelings of the Protestant part of our people? As he understood the Constitution, it was his bounden duty to dissent from this motion: it was hostile to the liberties of the country, both civil and religious; and went to the destruction of every security for which our ancestors had so gloriously struggled. (Hear, hear.)

The Bishop of Norwich and the Lord Chancellor mutually explained.

Friday, May 16.

[POOR RATES.] The bill which had been introduced (see page 782) to make Lead Mines chargeable to the Poor Rates was withdrawn, and another bill was ordered to be brought in by Lord Lascelles and others.—His lordship accordingly now presented a bill "to render rateable to the relief of the poor, proprietors of Lead Mines, or Mines of Lead and Silver, in respect of any income or beneficial interest, not liable to the risk of working such Mines," which was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Friday next.

[SAVINGS BANKS.] On the motion of Mr. Rose, the Savings Banks' Bill was recommitted, when a long discussion took place on its various clause and provisions. Sir C. Monk and Mr. Dickinson opposed the clause which obliges the trustees of these institutions to vest all monies received by them in the Public Funds or in Exchequer Bills; the former contending that such a measure would tend to degrade the country gentlemen, as leaving it to be inferred that it was unsafe to trust them with the amount of the contributions; and the latter, that the contributors would have no redress, in case the Public Funds should be unable to pay the full amount of the dividend.

Mr. Huskisson and Sir J. Newport, on the other hand, maintained, that the Public Funds were the least objectionable security that could be proposed; and that if they were unsafe, which no man could say, mortgages would be equally ineligible, in any event that might shake their credit. It was, moreover, advisable to take the charge out of the hands of the country gentlemen, who would be almost unavoidably exposed to the imputation of partiality in the execution of their trust.

Mr. Sumner was of opinion that the Funds were the best and most sufficient security.

Mr. Preston thought the clause would be mischievous, by rendering it difficult for the owners of small property to borrow small sums on good security. It threw that money into the Funds which might be lent on mortgage, to the relief of the agricultural interest.—The clause was finally agreed to.

The clause which allows persons who have money in Savings Banks to receive parish relief, unless an order to the contrary be made by two Justices, was next discussed.

Mr. Rose observed, that this clause had been considered more than any other in the bill. He had called a meeting of several gentlemen connected with Savings Banks, and though five or six of them objected to it, the great majority were in its favour. Indeed the objections to it were much obviated by a limitation which he had introduced, forbidding parish relief to be given to any person who had more than 30*l.* in one of those institutions.

Lord Milton observed, that the clause would be much less objectionable if it were enacted, that no person having any money in a Saving Bank should receive parish relief, without an order from two Justices, instead of authorizing them to receive it, unless two Justices made an order to the contrary.

Mr. Brand objected to the clause, as it would destroy all the independence of spirit which Savings Banks were calculated to promote. If the poor man was subject to lose his hard-earned savings by illness, he had rather induce him to apply to the rich for their charitable assistance, for thus a feeling of benevolence on the one hand, and of gratitude on the other, would be preserved. The proper place for this enactment, if it were necessary, would be the bill on the subject of the Poor Laws.

Mr. Barclay thought, that the introduction of Savings Banks would rather tend to benefit the parish funds than to diminish them.

Mr. Huskisson agreed, that if they had to legislate on this subject, unimpeded by the habits which the Poor Laws had created in the country, it would be unwise to adopt the clause. But it was necessary under the present system of Poor Laws—so mischievous in its principle and administration—to hold out to the poor man some inducement to save, which he would not do, if, on the first fit of sickness, all his stock were to be swept away; he would be then left in a condition not better than the most improvident of his neighbours.

Mr. Philips objected to the clause. How, he observed, could the idea of disgrace be attached to the fact of receiving parish relief, when it was confessedly extended to persons not indigent? If the clause were once passed, it would be difficult to repeal it; while it would be very easy to add it at a future period, if it should be necessary to do so.

Mr. Western objected to a clause which seemed to be connected with that before the House, and which gave a bonus out of the parish rates to those who should contribute to Savings Banks for three years. This would create a suspicion that these institutions were intended to relieve the rich from the support of the poor, and not to rescue the poor from distress.

Mr. Brougham observed, that he wished well to the bill, but felt much difficulty with respect to the two clauses under consideration. The first, however, he would pass over; but his objection to the second was invincible. It was an application, or rather a misapplication of the Poor Rates, not to support the poor, but to give premiums for certain savings. The practical evil was, he admitted, small, but the principle was inadmissible. When a person had contributed for three years, he was to be entitled to a premium of 6*s.* or 7*s.* 6*d.*, according to the rate at which he had contributed. He could not approve of such a mode of coaxing and cajoling persons into industry and economy. Besides, it was in fact a premium upon previous conduct, rather than an incitement to future industry. As to the effects of the Poor Laws, he really believed that they degraded the character of the people; but a circumstance had been mentioned as an aggravation of those effects, which he thought should rather be stated as a set-off against them. It was said, that the poor were led to look upon parish relief as a matter of right; now if they did so, was it not obvious that they could not feel degraded by receiving what they considered as their right?

Mr. Wilberforce thought the effects of the Poor Laws upon the characters of the people most baneful. They precluded benevolence on the one hand, and prevented gratitude on the other. They likewise placed the dissolute and the unfortunate on an equality in point of destitution and relief. Some years ago, when this subject was discussed in the House, it was recommended that those who had some small property should not forfeit it by obtaining parish relief; which proposition was most favourably received,

The principle in this case was the same, and entitled to the same indulgence. He therefore approved of the clause which granted parish relief, but had considerable doubts as to the propriety of the clause for giving premiums.

Lord Milton was inclined on the whole to approve of the clause for relief, though he thought it a difficult point to decide. As property in many shapes might be concealed from the Overseers of the Poor, while money deposited in Savings Banks would be always known to them, it would not be fair to lay the contributors under a disadvantage. He must however object to the clause for giving premiums.

The first clause was then agreed to, and the second was negatived without a division.—The other clauses of the bill were then discussed, after which the House resumed, and the Report was ordered to be taken into further consideration on Monday.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] On the motion of Mr. M. Sutton, that the House should resolve itself into a Committee on this bill,

Mr. Babington rose, and expressed his apprehensions, that the present, like every former measure of a similar character, would fail in its object. It appeared by the returns which had been made to the House, that in between 10 and 11,000 parishes in England, the number of clergymen resident were, in 1806—5,545; 1807—5,512; 1808—6,758; 1809—no return; 1810—5,240; 1811 and 12—no return; 1813—6,375; 1814—6,804. This statement was rather against his own argument, but still the proportion of resident clergymen in so many parishes was very small. (Hear, hear.) The number of resident curates for the last three years in which returns had been made, were 1,587, 1,884, 1,948. He thought these statements proved that the parishes were not sufficiently supplied. The right reverend Bishops might be very good men: but having themselves experienced the indulgence of their superiors, they would be apt to extend the same favour to others. This, he conceived, must be regarded as a very serious evil by every one anxious for the interests of religion, and the maintenance of the Established Church.

Sir W. Scott said, there were several parts of the bill which he introduced in 1803, of which he had himself disapproved, but in suffering it to pass, he had yielded to the judgment of Parliament. In the effervescence of contention and zeal, occasioned by various discordant opinions at the Reformation, the clergy naturally became objects of suspicion and restraint, and informers were encouraged and constituted their superintendents. This system continued for 300 years. Now he did not know what episcopacy meant, if it did not place the administration of the Church in the hands of Bishops; yet during that period informers possessed the power which those dignitaries ought to have had. Informers were a most odious kind of prosecutors; the one part acting from spite, the other from avarice. At length informers having been discouraged by courts of law, the clergy became careless, and there appeared wholesale informers; the whole public cried out against the non-residence of the clergy. He then, multa gemens, brought in his bill, in which two principles were admitted. 1st, Informers were authorized under certain regulations. He detested public delation, but he was obliged to submit to the judgment of others. 2dly, The Bishops were restored to their proper authority in exercising discipline in the Church. He knew there were certain persons who had no love for Bishops, and who wished to destroy their authority; he had himself borne the first fire of the attack from the liberal, (for they were one class) on the one side, and from the austere and the rigid on the other. He considered it as one objection to that act, that it imposed too much inconvenience upon the clergy. There were some clergymen, such as the Rector of Bow Church, a most respectable man, and professor of divinity in Oxford, who had not any house of residence in the parish. But residence had been much increased of late in Berkshire; where he had resided, there was no clergyman non-resident; the same could be said of other parts of the country. As to pluralities, when it was considered that several livings did not exceed 50*l.* a year, any indiscriminate objection to the system could not be consistently maintained. Mildness was one of the principles on which he should advise the House to act on such a question. All that could be done practically, not theoretically, to render the bill effectual, should be resorted to.

Lord Ebrington objected, that the Bishops themselves were often non-resident, and consequently could not be acquainted with the characters and circumstances of their clergy; in one diocese in Wales the Bishop never resided; it might be invidious, but he felt it his duty to mention this. (Hear, hear.) He objected likewise to the discretionary power given to Bishops in the appointment of curates. The prohibition of farming was illiberal and unjust. Farming was often necessary, generally amusing, and even an inducement to residence.

Mr. Dickinson thought, that as all professions were obliged to attend to their duties, the residence of the clergy ought to be enforced; but it was some difficulty in this view, that many of them had no more than 80*l.* a year, and some not more than 35*l.*

A Member stated, that the cause of the Bishop's non-residence (alluded to by Lord Ebrington) was the want of a palace.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee.

Mr. M. Sutton defended the clause which restricted spiritual persons from taking to farm, for occupation, above a certain number of acres, without the consent of the Bishop of the diocese, under the penalty of 40*s.* per acre: every such permission to specify the number of years (not exceeding seven) for which it might be given.

Mr. C. W. Wynn thought, that the clergy ought to be secluded from secular affairs. It was not enough that they read the lessons and the prayers: they ought to attend to the habits and feelings of the people: they should establish their own authority by disinterestedness, moderation, and theological industry; above all, they were bound to avoid any interference with their parishioners in the petty traffic and selfish transactions of secular concerns.

Mr. Courtenay, Lord Milton, and Mr. W. Smith severally supported the clause. The last hon. member observed, that the practice of taking tithes in kind was a growing evil, and he hoped that the present enactment would check it.

A division took place upon the question, whe-

Ayes, 88 | Noes, 35 | Majority, 53.

The clause having been thus carried, Mr. M. Sutton moved, that the number of acres of which the farm should consist should be 50. An amendment was moved, that it should be extended to 100; but no division took place, and it was agreed that the blank should be filled up with the word "eighty."

The House then resumed, and the chairman of the Committee asked leave to report progress; and to sit again.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Mr. Davies Gilbert brought up the third report of the Finance Committee, respecting the Oidnance. It was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, May 19.

CONVEYANCERS.] Two petitions were presented from certain attorneys and solicitors, stating, that, as the law now stood, persons of no professional education were permitted to practise as conveyancers, and praying an alteration of the law in that particular.—Laid on the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, May 19.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Petitions were presented from the inhabitants of Sutton in Ashfield, and Keyworth, praying for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Lambton presented a petition from Great Yarmouth, praying for Parliamentary Reform, Economy in the Public Expenditure, and the Reduction of the Military Establishment. The hon. member stated, that the meeting at which this petition was framed, had assembled without any contravention of "the Gagging Bill," and that, within 50 hours after it was voted, it was signed by no less than 2000 persons.—Ordered to lie on the table.

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR LAW.] Sir S. Romilly presented the following petition from persons in and near the metropolis, complaining of the evils in the way of recovering small debts. He was not prepared to propose a remedy, but one was loudly called for:—

"That your petitioners, with no less concern than regret, have witnessed for many years past, but more particularly of late, the cruelty and oppression of suits for the recovery of small sums of money in his Majesty's courts at Westminster, the Marshalsea, and other subordinate courts, as well on bailable as on servicable process.—That the enormous expenses a person is put to when arrested upon a demand of 10*l.* or 15*l.* and the persecution, extortion, and inconvenience he suffers to obtain his liberty for even a short period, arising from the almost insurmountable

difficulty of procuring bail, is far beyond the conception of your honourable House.—That in term-time it frequently happens a debt of this description, including the bailiffs' charges, the spunging-house, and other attendant expenses, is doubled, if not trebled, in a few days.—That in like manner the costs of an action for the recovery of 40s. are speedily run up to more than four times the original sum.—That it must be obvious to your honourable House, if a defendant be unable to discharge a demand of this amount, he is rendered still less competent so to do, with so rapid and grievous an accumulation of expenses.—That your honourable House having extended the powers of the Court of Conscience for the cities of London and Bristol, your petitioners trust, in reference thereto, as also to the great and progressive depreciation in the value of currency, that your honourable House will deem it but just and reasonable to extend at least to an equal amount the provisions of this summary and more effectual mode of recovering small sums to all parts of the kingdom.—That many a debtor would willingly struggle hard to pay his just debts, but his affairs frequently become so overwhelmed with the law expenses, that he is under the necessity of surrendering himself to a prison, thereby fixing the plaintiff not only with the loss of his debt, but the costs of the action.—That in the present state of public affairs and national distress, it is earnestly hoped, as well from equity as policy, that your honourable House will listen to your petitioners, and apply forthwith a remedy to their complaints; for your petitioners are thoroughly satisfied, that there are thousands and tens of thousands of his Majesty's once loyal and dutiful subjects, who, after being totally ruined by law charges of the most vexatious nature, and exposed to indeterminate imprisonment, have become so soured and dissatisfied with the whole government of their country, as to dwindle but at best into a state of sullenness and disgust.—The petitioners, therefore, prayed the House to grant such relief as in their wisdom and humanity should seem meet.

Ordered to lie on the table.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS.] Sir M. W. Ridley rose to ask the noble lord opposite (Lord Castlereagh) when he proposed to name the Secret Committee on the State of the Nation?

Lord Castlereagh replied, that the committee was to be appointed immediately after the holidays.

Mr. Tierney said, he supposed the committee was to be appointed that day fortnight, not for the purposes of inquiry, but in order to frighten the House. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh admitted that it was, in the judgment of his Majesty's Ministers, necessary to continue the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act beyond the period at present limited; they were convinced that the state of the country was such as to render it unsafe to dispense with that mode of ensuring the public security; and at the same time, if the House did not find good grounds for such a measure they would not give effect to the intention of Ministers.

Mr. Tierney supposed that either something very terrible had been discovered by Ministers, or something very terrible was to be discovered by them before the 2d of June, since their resolution upon the subject seemed so decided. (Hear, hear.)

LOTTERIES.] The order of the day for the third reading of the Lottery Bill having been read,

Mr. Lyttelton rose and said, that none of the objections to this bill had been removed; it was quite unchanged even in its most offensive parts. It was so bad in its principle, and so objectionable in all its branches, that the House must feel ashamed of it, and consider themselves bound in honour to reject it. He therefore moved that it be read a third time this day six months.

Mr. Wilberforce could not allow that opportunity to pass without bearing his testimony against the bill. The bad principle and the injurious effects of lotteries had been always perceived and denounced by the wise and good. The aversion to their continuance had of late made considerable progress. The higher classes reprobated them, and the lower classes were beginning to see their ruinous tendency. They were not productive of much benefit to the State, and were most injurious to the morals and industry of the people. He, therefore, hoped that the hon. gentleman below (Mr. Lyttelton), who had signalized himself by his opposition to those measures, would soon be finally successful.

Mr. J. W. Ward agreed with the hon. gentleman, that lotteries were most injurious to morals, and at the same time were not good financial measures; yet he thought the bill should pass at this time, inasmuch as none of the hon. gentlemen on the other side had pointed out any other mode of raising the money. (A laugh.) Gentlemen might laugh, but he considered a deficiency in the revenue a great evil, and the deficiency created by rejecting this bill would be 500,000*l.*

Lord A. Hamilton said, he had been fully convinced of the insufficiency and injurious effects of such bills by the arguments of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ward) on a former occasion. (See page 640.) The House were to proceed that night to consider of a compensation to the Crown for sinecure offices. Why should not that compensation embrace the lottery bill? Surely it was more important to protect the morals of the people than to give a compensation to the Crown for sinecure places. The arguments of those who supported the bill were of no force, either in truth, expediency, or necessity.

Mr. Grenfell said, that the lottery did not produce one half of the sum alleged by the hon. gentleman on the other side.

Mr. Tierney observed, that there could be no difficulty in supplying any deficiency occasioned by the rejection of this bill. The right hon. gentleman opposite had contrived to make the income and expenditure meet by Exchequer bills. (A laugh.) Navy bills and debentures were issued at two months and two months without any interest, and Exchequer bills from 2d. to 2½d. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could easily, therefore, supply the deficiency of the lottery.

Mr. Ward explained, that it was the desponding view of the finances held out by the right hon. gentleman himself, that had induced him to consider the deficiency a great evil.

The House then divided—

For the third reading 73

Against it 48

Majority —25

Mr. Grenfell then moved, that the clause for granting a remuneration to the Bank for receiving money arising from the sale of lottery-tickets, be expunged: 1,000*l.* was allowed for every 20,000 tickets, and as there were 60,000, 3,000*l.* was to be given to the Directors in addition to the profits they derived from monies passing through and remaining in their hands. This might appear to the right hon. gentleman a very trifling sum; but in the present state of the finances, a saving of even 3,000*l.* was not to be overlooked; besides, it was of much consequence that this sum should be withdrawn, as forming a link of the chain of ministerial extravagance and Bank rapacity. Upon this subject there was but one opinion beyond the walls of that House, where unfortunately the eloquence of economy was wholly inoperative. It saw also of importance, as indicating the spirit and feelings with which the Bank had acted for the last twenty years.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that if the hon. gentleman would point out any plan more economical than the present for managing the business of the lottery, it might be taken into consideration before another bill was proposed. He did not believe, however, that any better management could be adopted, and that the experiment might be injurious: he should, therefore, oppose the amendment.

The question was then put, and the amendment being negatived without a division, the bill was read a third time.

Upon the question being put on the preamble,

Mr. Lyttelton rose to propose a new one. In the time of King William, an act was passed to prohibit the mischievous gaming, commonly called lotteries, as injurious to the morals and welfare of the people. He would propose that the preamble of the present bill should be taken from the words of that act, and that it should be entitled, "An act to enable the lords commissioners of his Majesty's treasury to raise certain sums of money for the service of his Majesty by the mischievous practice of gaming, commonly called lotteries: against the common good, the trade, the wealth, and morals, of his Majesty's subjects."

Sir J. Newport observed, that at the Revolution, the Crown stood as much in need of money as at the present time; but the Ministry of that day never proposed to compromise public morals for national revenue. It was then believed that the common good ought not to be sacrificed for a measure of finance, and that revenue was nothing when compared with morals. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had reversed this maxim, and seemed to think that morals were, nothing when compared with revenue.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer reminded the House, that the act of King William was made to prohibit not public but private lotteries; not a State lottery, but private gaming of that kind.

Mr. B. Moreland denied that the act of William referred only to private lotteries. The prohibition was general, and extended to all lotteries, which it described as common and public nuisances. The State lotteries of the present day, were affected by this act, which remained unrepealed; and were it not for the annual licenses which the lottery act gave to this species of gaming, he was convinced that persons engaged in them might be indicted under its provisions. It even went farther than the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Lyttelton) had gone, for it not only prohibited all lotteries whatever, but declared that those engaged in them should be branded as common rogues. (A general laugh.)

Mr. Brougham thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should introduce a clause, exempting contractors and others from the penalties of the act, as experiments, dangerous to lottery contractors and speculators, might be tried under the statute of William, which was still in force. If the preamble taken from that statute would not suit, he (Mr. B.) suggested that it should be entitled, an act to raise money to his Majesty, by encouraging vice and immorality among the lower orders. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Grenfell trusted, that if the country should again have such an evil inflicted upon it, the management of the lottery would be transferred from the Bank to the Exchequer.

The original preamble was then agreed to, and the bill passed.

OFFICE ABOLITION BILL.] Mr. D. Gilbert moved the second reading of the Justices in Eyre Abolition Bill.

Mr. Boswell, after regretting that some member of more influence than himself did not step forward to oppose the series of bills which originated in the abolitions recommended by the Finance Committee, observed, that he would not be deterred by the unpopularity to which he should be exposed; nor did he think that Parliament ought to yield to clamour in legislating for the country. Economy was necessary at the present moment; but the abolition of these places would produce no immediate relief, and no great ultimate saving. He quoted Mr. Burke against the present system of abolitions, and objected to the compensation bill, as a measure which would make duration of service, rather than transcendancy of talent or brilliancy of exertion, the criterion of merit. In the history of the country there would be found names which had become illustrious in a short career, and the records of individuals, who had conferred immortal obligations on their fellow-citizens and mankind. Length of service might be a proper mode of estimating the reward of clerks, or ascertaining the value of mechanical perseverance. He denied that the influence of the Crown had increased to any undue or alarming extent. Favouritism had not placed Nelson in the command of a fleet, nor conferred on Lord Wellington the conduct of our army. He would oppose all the bills, as parts of a system for making inroads on our present Constitution and Government.

Lord Milton wished to say only a few words on a measure which he thought would have met with no opposition; and he would not have said any thing at all, had he not been induced to animadvert on some parts of the hon. gentleman's speech. He had quoted Mr. Burke on the civil list, and seemed to consider himself an hereditary commentator on his meaning; but he had totally misapprehended him. If he (Lord M.) had any fault to find with the committee, it was because they had not viewed the whole subject so comprehensively as Mr. Burke, but had taken scraps and shreds of his principles. The hon. gentleman had said, that Mr. Burke was against the abolition of sinecures, and quoted a part of his speech that seemed to countenance that idea; but had he read the whole, he would have seen that Mr. Burke, in advising the alienation of the Crown lands, contemplated the abolition of this very office of justices in Eyre, as one of the beneficial consequences of that measure. Thus, said he, would fall the justiceship in Eyre, &c. Mr. Burke, then, not only recommended the abolition of these sinecures, but the removal of the very foundation on which they rested. The hon. gentleman had said, that the proposed system of abolition would make inroads on our Constitution, but these sinecures were no parts of our Constitution. As efficient offices, they were parts of our Government formerly; as sinecures, they had ceased to belong to it. He (Lord M.) was as little disposed to yield to the clamour of which the hon. gentleman had spoken as any man, but it was not clamour only that was against sinecures; the middle ranks of society, and even the highest order of the public out of doors, had expressed a decided opinion against them; and though he would not yield to clamour, he would say with Mr. Burke, God forbid that he should oppose the universal and decided sense of the country. (Hear, hear.)—The bill was then read a second time.

OFFICE REGULATION BILL.] The second reading of the Exchequer Offices (England and Ireland) Regulation Bill being moved,

Sir J. Newport said, he had formerly mentioned the possibility of one or two of these bills being taken by the other House along with the Compensation Bill, while the rest might be rejected. He hoped the House would not lose sight of this.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the suggestion of the right hon. baronet had not escaped the attention of his Majesty's Ministers, and he could assure the House, that every precaution would be taken to render any apprehensions on that head nugatory. He could state on the part of his colleagues and himself, that they thought it better to put the business of the committee into separate bills, for the sake of gaining the object; and on their part, no exertion should be wanting to accomplish the great end they had in view. In fact, these bills, though divided, were but one great whole, all embracing the same economical principle, and in consistency, Ministers must and would support them all. (Hear, hear, hear.)—The bill was read a second time.

The Exchequer Court Bill, the Offices in Scotland Regulation Bill, and the Offices in Ireland Abolition Bill, were severally read a second time.

Sir J. Newport expressed his surprise, that in the last bill no notice was taken of the Board of Works in Ireland, which had been some years since the subject of a distinct report, in which its abolition was recommended.

Mr. Peel said, that this subject was at present under consideration. The principal officer had hitherto been also employed as superintendent of the barrack department. Some new arrangement, however, in the present circumstances of the public service, was felt to be necessary, and he had a clause to propose in the committee which had that object in view.

The bill was then read a second time, as was also the Board of Trade Regulation Bill, after a few words from Mr. Calcraft, who gave notice of his intention to move some alterations in the committee.

CIVIL SERVICES' RECOMPENSE BILL.] The order of the day for the second reading of this Bill having been moved,

Sir Robert Heron rose and observed, that he could not consider the measure in any other light than a gross, but, as he sincerely trusted, vain attempt, to impose on the people of England. The reports of the Finance Committee professed but little, and did not perform what they professed. When the House recollected the manner in which the Treasury had regulated offices formerly, as for example in the Civil List, there could be little doubt how they would act on the present occasion. The abolition of offices was agreed on, but it was to take place only at the death of the present possessors. He was obliged, when alluding to this, to differ from some of his friends for whom he entertained the greatest respect; for he could not see on what grounds it could be maintained, that because a man had for ten years held an office acknowledged on all hands to be useless, he should therefore hold it for twenty years longer, and that because he had obtained 20,000*l.* of the public funds, he should obtain 20 or 30,000*l.* more, especially at a time when we were on the eve of not being able to pay even what was due to justice. It was worthy of notice, that when the question of suspending the rights of the people was before the House, the delay of a few days was thought too much, but when the question was to take away pensions from those who had rendered no service, and were entitled to no reward, then no delay was considered too long, for it was better that the country should be disappointed than that the sinecurists should suffer; and therefore the people must wait till the office-holders expired before they obtained relief, and that relief perhaps would not arrive till many of those who now asked it were dead. To him it appeared, that the bill for compensating the holders of offices was likely to be abused, and indeed one would naturally think that by this measure Ministers wished to drive the people to say, "Give us back the system of sinecures, but keep the Compensation Bill to yourselves:" and no wonder, for the bill itself was founded on a fallacy. For the first time in the history of the country, he found the principle avowed, that places of high political power were fit objects of pecuniary speculation. Formerly the offices of Tellers of the Exchequer were given to Lord Chancellors as a reward for eminent services, and sometimes to their sons, as in a case well known; but a bill had been lately passed for granting pensions to them, so that the tellerships were reserved for political ambition and intrigue. The people had been taught by demagogues to believe, that the only remedy for their distresses consisted in the abolition of sinecures, and Ministers were certainly much indebted to a certain orator in Palace-yard for such ill-founded harangues, as he had rendered them the most essential service. (Hear, hear.) Every independent man in the country knew this to be the case, and he could not help thinking that the Committee had lent itself too much to the wishes of Ministers, and the House knew well what those wishes were. If there existed any doubt on that point, he would only remind them of the conduct of Ministers during this and the last session of Parliament. In the last session they put the word "Economy" into the Speech delivered from the Throne, which was one of the greatest insults that could be offered to the illustrious person exercising the functions of Royalty, and a mockery of the sufferings of the people. Yes, whilst those hoarse words hung upon our ears, they were detected in endeavouring to raise the salaries of offices, the labours of which were diminished, and whenever any measure of economy was proposed, it was always stoutly resisted. At last, however, in one instance, popular feeling (even though it was stigmatized as "ignorant impatience") prevailed, and awed by the remonstrances of their friends, who threatened to desert them unless they attended to economy, they appointed a Finance Committee, which made three Reports, of which he had seen one (but from its specimen he could only say "much good may it do them"), and while the people expected, as they had a just right to do, that the expenditure of the Civil List should be regulated, they were insulted by the appointment of a new officer, and the addition of 260,000*l.* to that establishment. True it was that that sum had been nearly expended in the Civil List before, but then, be it remembered, it was drawn from iniquitous and illegal funds, the Droits of the Admiralty, which at once were a source of injustice to the nation, and the prey of royal piracy. (Loud cheering from the Opposition benches.) A magnanimous Prince required not the gaudy show of mere appearances to make him respected in the eyes of his subjects; and it was, therefore, no more than just for the people to expect that some diminution should have taken place in the vain parade and pageantry of the Prince Regent—things which a great Prince always despised who wished to live in the hearts of his people. Such savings would not, however, have suited the purposes of an Administration like the present, which had always governed by corruption. (Hear, hear, hear.) He did not deny that some reductions had been made in the army, but it was absurd in the extreme to keep up such an establishment as the present, merely for the sake of defending our foreign possessions. Surely there was no great necessity for robbing our Dutch allies of their colonies, when we knew such expense would be incurred in keeping them. But the truth was, the people were goaded by excessive taxation, and began to murmur, and therefore it was deemed necessary to maintain a large army in order to fill them with terror. (Hear, hear!) This might go on for a little, but it would soon be seen that England, familiarized to a military system, would lose her liberty, and sink into the awful gloom of despotism. For his part, he would prefer throwing up all the bills to the passing of that which was immediately under consideration. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham observed, that application ought to be made to Parliament, to enable the Crown to provide for public services, as each individual case arose, which should be examined on its own peculiar circumstances. He objected to the present plan, because it was systematic and prospective, investing the Crown with an annuity of 42,000*l.* in addition to the Pension List of the country. It had been justly said, that this was the first time in which the idea had been embodied into an Act of Parliament, that politics were a trade. He entreated his hon. friends, before they gave their approbation to this measure, to examine it in all its bearings. The pretence on which it was founded was undoubtedly plausible; it was, that a power should be reserved to the Crown of rewarding effective services, now that a large share of its former influence was to be taken away. He denied, however, as a proposition of fact, that this influence would be so diminished as not to leave the Crown possessed of ample means of rewarding meritorious exertions. The amount of the Pension List in 1809, a year when the 4½ per cent. fund fell extremely short, was 220,000*l.*, and its average was probably not less than 240,000*l.* Upon that list were to be found the names of persons who had rendered no service; persons who belonged to families not more distinguished for their antiquity and rank, than for their wealth and splendour, and whose only title to their pensions, he presumed, was their invariable support of the Ministers of the Crown, whoever those Ministers might be. (Hear, hear.) The present bill ought to be entitled, a bill to enable the Crown to continue the misapplication of funds which the Constitution had given it for public purposes, not for the indulgence of its private bounty, gratitude, or charity. It was monstrous, in the present state of the country, that such an object should be contemplated. He saw on the opposite benches some hon. members who enjoyed pensions of 800*l.* or 1,200*l.* a year, which he regarded as nothing more than the fair remuneration of their official labours; but this only served to prove that for this purpose the Crown was already in possession of adequate funds. It was not enough to shew that some patronage had been taken away; it should be proved that enough had not been left for the due reward of efficient services. The old grounds on which these sinecures were defended, were, that they were necessary to the splendour of the Crown, to its weight in the country, and its influence in both Houses. It was said also, that there was something in their antiquity that made them dear to some people: but it had of late been discovered that they had another merit, which was that of constituting an useful provision for a certain class of men of great talents, but of small private fortunes. This was just as unfounded as any of the other topics of justification, and must appear so, if it could be shewn that they never had been so applied. He would prove this by referring separately to a few of them. And first he would take the wardenship of the cinque ports, and governorship of Dover-castle. At the commencement of the present reign, this office was held by the Duke of Dorset, and then by the Earl of Holderness. The latter was succeeded by Lord North, who was far from being a poor man; for at that very time, he was heir apparent to a very wealthy family. After him came Mr. Pitt, and then the present possessor, the Earl of Liverpool; who certainly did not belong to that class for whose encouragement it was pretended that such an office, or a compensation for it, should exist. With respect to the office of Chief Justice in Eyre, he should be happy to meet his hon. friend, the chairman of the Committee, on that point. The first of those very poor and humble adventurers was, as in the case of Dover-castle, the head of the Dorset family. Why, then, were such persons to be compensated? Was it on the principle that they had relinquished a lucrative profession? This was impossible, because a peer could not enter into a lucrative profession. Of the 60 persons who had held the chief justiceships in Eyre there were only five commoners, of whom only two were known to recent times, Mr. Grenville and Mr. Villiers. Not one single individual had held those offices who could reasonably apply to the Crown for any compensation on the principle of being poor. Of the Lords Justices General there had been 33, and only 3 that had not been persons of great rank. The offices of Lord Registrar and the Keeper of the Great Seal of Scotland had also, since the Union, been held by wealthy peers, except perhaps in one instance. After this statement, he would ask the House, whether they were prepared to say that the argument of compensation was founded in good faith, or would bear to be examined? The Crown had the means of rewarding effective services from the pension list; and they might safely take away all those sinecures without preventing poor persons from becoming statesmen, except in one or two instances, in two or three centuries. He requested the House to observe what a great proportion of those offices had been held by wealthy persons since the American war. The argument that men should be paid for public services was of very recent date. Why should it be laid down that statesmen must look for compensation from the Crown, when they remembered the Somerses, the Godolphins, and all those illustrious statesmen who had devoted themselves to the service of their country? What new light had come over this age, that we were to take men into the pay of Government, merely with a view to reward them on their retirement from office? When Chancellors were remunerated, the case was very different. The man who was promoted to that elevated station had been a barrister; and when he went to the bar, he went to it for no one object but to advance his fortune, just as a merchant or a tradesman goes into his counting-house or behind his desk. He was, therefore, to be treated as a professional man to the end; and when he retired, we should give him half pay, in the same manner as we rewarded the man who had served in the field. This was the principle that was applied to the discharge of clerks in office, and he sincerely wished that they had more. He objected, however, to considering men in the higher situations of life as mere traders in office. Had a statesman no higher view? Was his conduct influenced by no better motive than the prospect of a pension on retirement? He could not, he would not believe that any man sincerely desirous of serving his country, or of preserving.

the high reputation which his talents might acquire, could be actuated by principles of so low and sordid a nature. But, supposing for a moment that men got into Parliament, or even into office, with such interested motives, was it decorous in that House to tell it to the world? Was it politic in them to proclaim to the country by Act of Parliament, in the black letter of a statute, that men entered into Parliament as into a trade? Were these the principles upon which the illustrious statesman of former times had acted? Was this the way in which England had attained her pre-eminence over every other country? No; it was by having a race of high-minded, sound-principled men, who stated their opinions in Parliament because they were their opinions; who were not picking up a little paltry pelf on every occasion that presented itself, but who did that which their consciences and their principles directed them to do, looking for their recompense to that consciousness of desert which was not to be put in competition with any reward which an act of Parliament, such as that before the House, could bestow. (Hear, hear!) There lurked, therefore, in the argument of the supporters of the measure, this gross fraud (for he would not call it a fallacy), that public men were to be treated as traders in politics, and the inference sought to be drawn was, that power must be given to the Crown to compensate those who entered into that trade. This, he maintained, was a fraud on the Constitution, and on the country. But the principle of this compensation bill was not what it professed to be. It did not go to reward the services of all who devoted their time and their talents to the benefit of their country. He admitted that there was one class of public men whom it did call forth; but who were they whose labours, it was said, were to be thus rewarded? Was the State only to be served by men in office? Did those who gave up their days and nights to their attendance in that House, and to the studies necessary to make that attendance valuable, confer no benefit on the community? These indeed served their country—the others served themselves. He saw around him many hon. friends who had toiled long and hard in the discharge of their duty to their country; who had on many occasions rendered it the most essential service; but who, in the whole of their political lives, had not been above eleven or twelve months in office. Was he to be told on that account, that their labours had not been eminently beneficial to the public? Was it to be established as a principle, that he only was a public servant who held an office? The great business of Government in this country was carried on, not behind desks and in cabinets only, but in the great council of the nation. During the administration of Sir Robert Walpole, of Lord North, and of Mr. Pitt, the country derived no inconsiderable advantages from that counter-action, that opposite force, which persons on one side of the House employed against their opponents. If to this we added the positive and direct effects which Opposition produced on the measures of Ministers, whoever they might be, it was impossible to doubt that the substantial Government of this country was carried on in Parliament. Here then was the inconsistency of the bill. Under the pretence of calling forth generally the exertions of statesmen, it only tended to call forth the exertions of those who were devoted to Government. It was true, that to the nature and capacity of such individuals, the rewards held out by the bill were peculiarly adapted. And yet office wanted no such charms. He appealed to the experience of the gentlemen opposite, and to the observation of the gentlemen surrounding him, whether, in their time, at least, there had been any fear of a scarcity of individuals ready to hold official situations? Notwithstanding all that, a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) had said, at the beginning of the session, of the little value of office, that it was hardly worth having, that it had lost all its attractions, &c. he did not perceive any symptom of a lack of candidates for it. All those homilies, however, had been read from the opposite side, to deter others from the vice of covetousness. Why then offer a bounty to persons to enter that House for the purpose of running an official career? If this must be done—if the patronage of the Crown must be strengthened for such an object, at least let the object be called by its plain name—let its real character be exhibited—let it at once be stated to be to enable poor men to serve the Crown. In his opinion office was not a situation for a poor man; who might, however, as effectually serve his country as the most wealthy peer. By continuing in his original poverty he might still support his principles, and numerous instances might be adduced of the greatest and most solid benefits which the public had derived from persons of no superior rank and property. But it was obvious, that the gentlemen opposite did not seem capable of forming a conception of a man devoting himself to public life, without the hope of lucre; they could not conceive the possibility of making the business of the State any thing but a matter of trade and gain to the individuals engaged in it.—The hon. and learned gentleman concluded by recapitulating his objections to the bill. They were, first, that the Crown already possessed sufficient means of compensating public services; secondly, that the proposed addition to those means would only lead to their misapplication; thirdly, that under the pretence of encouraging individuals to devote themselves to the public service, the bill merely tended to draw such men from their respective avocations in life as were desirous of becoming office-bearers; and lastly, that it was the first time of proclaiming to England by Act of Parliament, that politics had become a trade. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Banks observed, that the principle of this bill was by no means novel; it had received the approbation of many great men, and was precisely the same as that which enabled the Crown to give pensions to Chancellors on their retirement. No man of late times had enriched himself in office; and it was proper that the Crown should have the power of rewarding long and faithful services. It would have been impossible for Mr. Pitt, after having so long filled the situation of Prime Minister, to have lived in the same retired manner as before he entered into office. He did not mean to deny, that the sinecures now proposed to be abolished had become objects of public odium. Had they, however, been given as rewards for eminent services, this never would have happened; but as they had sometimes been perverted to the purposes of favouritism, the tendency which public opinion had taken with regard to them was easily accounted for. There were many instances in which their application had not been liable to the reproach so generally cast upon them. He would mention one name which had lately come before the public in a very honourable and popular way; Lord Camden held an office which had been given to his father as a remuneration for eminent services. In such cases the means of remuneration must exist in some shape or other. Compensation, however, was necessarily distributed through the medium of the Crown; if it depended entirely on offices or pensions in the gift of Ministers, it was not to be expected that they would be forward in rewarding individuals who had been opposed to themselves, though he was by no means inclined to undervalue such services, especially when he recollected how long Mr. Burke had been in opposition. Some legislative provisions were therefore necessary. With regard to what had been said on the subject of pensions, though he agreed that they were not such vested interests as patent offices, he could not concur in all that had been stated respecting them. They were granted by the Crown either for life or during pleasure; but he thought that the ground on which any pensions had been granted could not be inquired into. By abolishing these offices, we deprived the Crown of a large share of what it had to give for services, and, therefore, we ought in justice to render something to it in return. The proportion might be too large, but it could be limited in its extent. He should, however, reserve for the Committee his view as to how far any limitations or restrictions ought to be carried.

Lord A. Hamilton said, that although he had on a former occasion assented to a bill which contained a clause for granting compensations, he had not thereby expressed his concurrence with the principle of that measure. He was decidedly of opinion, that no compensation ought to be given for the offices proposed to be abolished. They had been always misapplied, and never could be proper objects for the patronage of the Crown. He agreed with the observation of his hon. and learned friend that as the Crown was already possessed of so large a fund, there could be no need whatever for increasing its powers of rewarding meritorious services. He wished the House to consider, whether circumstances did not call upon them to contract the means of expenditure as much as possible. Would it satisfy the country to learn, that because a set of useless offices were abolished, compensations had been provided as substitutes? It could not be doubted, that they would see through the fallacy of this measure, which, as had been justly observed, was a fraud upon them, and upon the Constitution.

Mr. J. Smyth did not think it necessary to defend his consistency on account of any vote he had given on a former bill. He did not regard the compensations which might be granted under the present measure as establishing the principle that pecuniary reward was the object of public services. He could not conceive that any pecuniary remuneration was a consideration with those who filled great offices of the State. How could the value of such services be measured by money? Great public officers devoted the whole of their time by day and by night to the public service, and it was difficult to say how such men could be sufficiently rewarded. On these grounds, without considering money as a reward for public services, he should vote for the bill.

Mr. Douglas objected to the whole of the bills, and the principle on which they proceeded, which went to denude the Crown of the means which it ought to possess of rewarding public services. The consequence of these bills must be to make every man enter into office with the character of a pensioner. Measures of this description had already been carried much too far. Public men had thought it necessary to offer up part of their salaries as a sacrifice to popular prejudice, though they must know it was a delusion to hold out that any benefit could be derived from such a proceeding. That was not the best way of obtaining the confidence of the country.

The House then divided—

SUPPLY.]—The House resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, when the following sums were voted.—75,300*l.* to defray the expense attending the confining, maintaining and employing convicts at home, for 1817:—80,000*l.* to defray bills drawn, or which might be drawn, from New South Wales, for 1817.

SAVINGS BANKS.]—The Report of the Savings Banks Bill was taken into consideration, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time on Wednesday.

A Bill was also brought in “for the protection and encouragement of Provident Institutions, or Banks for Savings, in Ireland,” (see page 170.) which was read a first time.

SHERIFFS IN IRELAND—RECOGNIZANCES.]—A Bill was brought in “to amend the Laws relating to Sheriffs in Ireland," and also a Bill "to amend the laws in respect to forfeited recognizances in Ireland," which were read a first time.

Tuesday, May 20.

The Lottery Bill, and other Bills, were brought from the Commons and read a first time.

NAVY ESTIMATES.]—Lord Melville laid the Navy Estimates on the table.

POOR LAWS.]—The Earl of Hardwicke moved, that the Commons be requested to permit some of their Members, Mr. Calvert, Mr. Finlay, Mr. Phillips, and Mr. Hall, to attend their Lordships, in order to be examined before the Committee appointed to consider of the Poor Laws.—A message was ordered to be sent accordingly. (For the reply see the Commons.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, May 20.

STEAM BOATS.]—Mr. Curwen presented a petition of William Lester, stating, that he had invented an Engine to ensure the safety of the Boilers of Steam Boats, and praying the House to refer the same to the examination of the Committee on Steam Boats, which was ordered accordingly.

POOR LAWS.]—Mr. Curwen presented a petition of Inhabitants of Trowbridge, praying for a revision of the Poor Laws.—Referred to the Committee on the subject of those laws, and ordered to be printed.

A message from the Lords requested, that this House would give leave to Mr. Calvert, Mr. Finlay, Mr. Phillips, and Mr. Hall, to attend their lordships, in order to be examined before the Committee on the Poor Laws.—The three first members being present, and having given their consent, the House gave them leave to attend, if they should think fit, and the messengers were called in and acquainted therewith; and that the House would send an answer to that part of the message which related to Mr. Hall.

STATIONARY (IRELAND).]—Copies or abstracts were ordered "Of all correspondence which may have passed between the Chief Secretary, or any of the Public Boards of Revenue in Ireland, and the King's Stationer there, relative to the supply of stationery for the public offices, the rates of such supply, and the privileges claimed by such King's Stationer, by virtue of letters patent or otherwise, during five years last past."

LOTTERIES.]—Mr. Lyttelton presented a petition of Mary Sparks, a respectable woman residing in East Smithfield, who was taken into custody some time ago, upon the information of a person of the name of Solomon, that she had been engaged in illegal insurance in the Lottery. The petitioner stated, that her house was entered by the informer, accompanied by some police officers, and papers being found, which were placed there by the informer, she was committed to hard labour for two months, by a magistrate, under the existing law. But upon discovering that the informer was guilty of perjury, she was liberated under a Habeas Corpus, by Mr. Justice Holroyd. That she thereupon preferred a bill of indictment against the informer; for perjury, which bill was found by the Grand Jury of Middlesex; but the cause having been removed by Certiorari into the Court of King's Bench, she had not the means of prosecuting the indictment, and therefore she appealed to the House for redress. The Hon. Member said, that he had received an excellent character of the petitioner, from the churchwardens of the parish in which she resided; and he hoped the House would take her case into consideration, which was, in fact, but one of many instances that had come to his knowledge, of the oppression and injustice of these informers, who were employed by that respectable person, Mr. Hesle, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer called him, under the sanction of a system which the right hon. gentleman so zealously defended, but which he (Mr. L.) should never cease to deprecate.

Mr. Bennet bore testimony to the accuracy of his hon. friend's statement, adding, that the petitioner was a respectable fancy-dress maker, and that the inferior officers of the police were too much in the habit of hunting out individuals in this and other cases, for the sake of obtaining pecuniary reward.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

ABOLITION, &c. BILLS.]—Mr. D. Gilbert proposed to have the several Bills founded on the first Report of the Finance Committee, committed pro forma.

The Justices in Eyre Abolition Bill was considered in a Committee, and reported, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

On the Committal of the Exchequer Offices (England and Ireland) Regulation Bill, Mr. Tierney objected to investing the Lords of the Treasury with the power of settling the amount of the salaries to be granted to such officers as might be appointed upon the actual abolition of the sinecures. This proposition bore immediately upon the Compensation Bill, as the amount of compensation to be granted to the Crown could not be settled, until the amount of the loss sustained by it were ascertained. It was also to be considered, that upon the extinction of any sinecure referred to in this Bill, five or six small officers might be appointed, and so the patronage of the Crown might rather be extended, for the aggregate of the allowances to those small officers might really exceed the amount of the sinecure, while it was notorious that the appointment of five or six small officers always extended the influence of the Crown more than that of one officer.

Mr. D. Gilbert said, that as the present was quite a prospective measure, the Committee thought they could not fix upon the salaries proper to be granted to officers at a distant period, and therefore that arrangement was referred to the Lords of the Treasury, whose conduct would of course be subject to the review of Parliament.

Sir W. Burroughs supported the views of Mr. Tierney.

Lord Castlereagh justified the opinion of the Committee, observing, that it would be absurd to call upon the Treasury to draw up at present a schedule of the salaries to be allowed to the several officers in the contemplation of those Bills, at perhaps a very distant day.

After a few further remarks from Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Tierney, the Bill was gone through, the House resumed, and the Report was ordered to be brought up to-morrow.

The Exchequer Court Bill, the Offices (Ireland) Abolition Bill and the Board of Trade Bill were severally committed, and the Reports ordered to be received to-morrow. The Civil Services' Recompense Bill was also committed and reported, and the Report ordered to be taken into further consideration on Friday next.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.]—A Petition of Incorporation of Weavers of Dunfermline, praying for Reform of Parliament, was presented; also of Inhabitants of Kirton.—They were ordered to lie on the table.

General Mathew observed, that he had a petition to present from the inhabitants of Dublin, signed by many thousand persons, praying for a Reform in the representation of the people; but previously to presenting it he would say a few words. The petition was couched in sound, energetic, and constitutional language; and it came from the once wealthy and commercial, but now impoverished and depressed capital of Ireland. After the late decision respecting the Catholics, it might be considered almost useless to approach that House; but the petitioners were not without hopes, that the voice of the people might ultimately induce them to attend to their prayers, on the important subject of Parliamentary Reform. That ill fated country, part of which he represented, felt the sad effects of the present defective system. The consequences were seen in a ruined agriculture, a degraded nobility, an impoverished gentry, a famished people, an insolvent trade, and a bankrupt nation. The Parliament of Ireland had voted for an hereditary union—a vote that they had no right to give; but it was obtained by corruption. He was prepared to prove, if the House should afford him the opportunity, that the members, at the time of the Union, sold themselves. Some had contracted for places and pensions; others for bishopricks and archbishopricks; even the judgment-seat did not escape the influence of corruption; and others bartered their country's condition for honours and ribbons, which would hang around the necks of the possessors as long as they lived, the badges of their degradation. The petitioners, amongst other things, prayed for Annual Parliaments, and they had great authorities in support of their claims. The authority of Chief Justice Raymond was great and decisive, and the Bill of Rights declared, that there ought to be frequent Parliaments. The Septennial Act was avowedly passed only for a temporary purpose, and no satisfactory reason could be adduced for its continuance. They had now no rebellion to dread; there was no fear of any insurrection but in the imaginations of a weak and pusillanimous Committee, and a corrupt Ministry. The desire of keeping their places alone induced them to raise the alarm of jacobinical conspiracies, to frighten the nobility and gentry, and persons of landed property, into the support of their measures; and they succeeded in frightening those who were ready to believe in every old woman's tale—(A laugh)—or in gunpowder, pop-gun, or warming-pan plots!—(Much laughter.) He had heard, that Britons would never make a cowardly surrender of their rights; but what did he now behold? The Constitution was suspended, and some of our ablest writers were obliged to fly from the country. All things tended to shew the necessity of Reform; and he implored them not to forget what the great Lord Chatham had impressively stated, that if they did not reform themselves within, the people would reform them without, with a vengeance. All eyes were now fixed on Parliament, to witness their decision on the measure to be proposed that night; and by the votes which they gave, it would be easily decided, whether members were really independent, or only the tools of Ministers. (Hear, hear.)

After a few words from Mr. Talbot, in support of the petition, it was brought up, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Sir F. Burdett presented a petition from the City of Cork, praying for a Reform in Parliament. The misery and distress, he observed, which prevailed in that part of the country, could be equalled only by the uniform good conduct of the people, who were suffering under their piessure. They could not quit the country, nor could they get any employment in it. The meeting at which the petition was agreed to, was conducted with the greatest order and decorum.

Sir N. Golthurst said, he could confirm the statement of the hon. baronet as to the order which prevailed at the meeting, but with regard to the persons who attended it, he could not say much of their respectability.

The petition was brought up, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Sir F. Burdett then rose, and spoke to the following effect:—He said, that he felt himself placed in rather an awkward situation upon the present occasion, when it was his duty, pursuant to the notice he had given, to bring forward the subject of Parliamentary Reform. At any former period, he should have thought it sufficient, in order to induce the House to institute an inquiry, if he had presented strong and decisive grounds for believing, that elections were not conducted according to the laws of the land. He should have thought, that he had performed all that could have been demanded of him, if he had tendered evidence of the truth of what he asserted, that the House of Commons did not fully and fairly represent the people, consistently with the principles of the Constitution;—that the elective franchise was most partially and unequally distributed;—that gross and flagrant corruption was employed in returning members; and that the great majority of them were nominated, not by the collective voice of those whom they appeared to represent, but by the recommendation of a few powerful individuals, who, by these means, obtained a weight of parliamentary influence, forbidden by the spirit of the laws, and in its consequences most dangerous to the liberties and happiness of the country. New doctrines, however, had been promulgated on this subject; and what, in better times, would have been denounced as corrupt and ruinous, was now recommended as necessary for conducting the affairs of the nation. What was formerly regarded as a seed whose fruit was productive of disease and death, was now maintained to be the seed of a tree whose fruit yielded nourishment and strength, and under whose shade security and repose were to be found. They had been recently told, and unblushingly told, that corruption, both within and without those walls, was absolutely necessary; that avowed corruption, in short, was the practical form of Government under which we ought to live, because, unhappily for ourselves, we had lived under it for no inconsiderable period. It was certainly, therefore, an unpleasant and awkward predicament in which he found himself placed, to appear as the advocate for the aggrieved in the presence of those from whom the grievances proceeded; to demand from those who had declared corruption necessary, the remedy and protection against its future effects. He was persuaded, however, that the voice of the people, decidedly pronounced as it had been, the number of petitions laid upon the table, and the almost equal number which had been rejected from informalities, would have their weight, and that the House would no longer refuse to take their grievances into consideration. He would venture to say, that more petitions had been lately presented, complaining of the inadequate state of the Representation, and declaring it to be the source of all the abuses that had crept into our Government, than were ever presented on any prior occasion of any description whatever. When formerly motions were made for Reform, the friends of that measure were told, that the people did not desire it. They were triumphantly asked, where are your petitions from Birmingham—where from Manchester, and from other places, that were excluded from all participation in the choice of representatives? That question, however, would not now be repeated; for the House were aware, that petitions had been laid upon their table, not only from Birmingham and Manchester, but from every part of the kingdom, and signed by not less than one million of people. (Hear, hear.) Whether, therefore, the allegations of those petitions were well or ill founded, whether they believed the facts as stated or not, whether re-

drugs could or could not be given, they were bound to institute some inquiry into grievances so generally felt and complained of. It was said, that many of the notions entertained by the friends of Reform, especially out of that House, were wild and visionary: and the people were represented as praying for what had never been sanctioned by the laws, nor recognized by the practice of the country: they were charged with having invented novel grievances, and demanded novel remedies. Among those visionary claims, was that of Annual Parliaments, which, it was contended, never existed in any former period. It was really almost incredible that so little attention had been paid to the real history of the country, by those who maintained that proposition. It was quite clear and incontrovertible, that Annual Parliaments were the law and practice of England, even before any history we had of it. For centuries before any history was written of the events of this country, but of which tradition had handed down some facts, Annual Parliaments were in constant use. It might, perhaps, be said, in reply to that argument, that they were to consider, not so much what had been the practice of their ancestors, as what ought to be adopted now: but it must be allowed, that the proof of such a system through a long series of ages strengthened the present claim of the people, and at least relieved them from the accusation of promulgating new fangled doctrines. The practice, then, was as old, and older than the reign of William the Conqueror. The word Parliament was not in use at that time; but by the law of the land, the Great Council (as it was called) had a right to meet, at least, once every year, for the purpose of watching over the general weal, of controlling arbitrary power, and correcting whatever abuses might be found to exist. This law William the Conqueror was sworn to observe. It would be no answer to say, that he was a perjured monarch, because perjured kings might be found in every country; the enemies and oppressors of their subjects: this was the law, and the whole history of England went to establish the fact. It was said, that in the reign of Henry III. Parliaments were more regularly constituted, and then the word Parliament itself was first used; but it could not be denied, that during the whole of that long reign, (with one or two exceptions, which proved nothing against the law,) Parliaments were annual, and so they continued, till the time of Edward II. In that reign, it appeared, there had been an omission of holding these Annual Parliaments, which Andrew Horn, (in his "Myrrour des Justices") called, "an abuse of the law, and a main one too:" and, therefore, in the 4th year of Edward III. it was thought necessary to pass an act, which declared, "that a Parliament should be holden every year once, and more often if need be;" and in the 86th of the same king, another act was passed, which provided, "that a Parliament should be holden every year, as another time, (namely by the former act) was ordained." It had been a question, whether the king was obliged by those statutes to call a new Parliament every year, or only to permit a Parliament to sit annually, for the redress of grievances and dispatch of business. In reply to that, he would ask, what was the actual practice? During the long reign of Edward III. and a more constitutional and more glorious reign was not to be found in English history, not one Parliament was continued beyond one year, but a new Parliament was called every year. It was not indeed necessary that every Parliament should continue a year. They often continued but for a month or two months, and there was an instance of five new elections in one year. It was therefore the constitutional, legal right of the people of England to have a new Parliament every year; it was imperative upon the kings of England to call a new Parliament every year. Many gentlemen of great ability and patient research had fully investigated and clearly traced the history of this practice, and yet not one instance had they found of a Parliament prorogued or continued beyond one year down to the 22d of Henry VI. In the time of the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, the party that happened to prevail could do every thing or nothing: and those were certainly not times from which constitutional precedents could be drawn. But even in those turbulent periods, it was astonishing how few instances there were of Parliaments having been long kept together. In fact, when they looked to the particular times in which the practice of lengthening the duration of Parliament was first introduced, it afforded a striking argument in illustration of the motives. It was in the reign of Henry VIII. when that monarch was anxious to be divorced from his wife, when he had quarrelled with the Pope, with the Church, and with the people, and was bent upon effecting what was called the Reformation. He kept his Parliament together for five years; and that was the first instance upon record of its having been continued so long. The reason of his doing so was obvious. He had resolved to accomplish a measure, which, whatever might be thought of it now, was then in opposition to the wishes of the great bulk of the nation, and conformable to the views of only a party in it. He intended to carry on his government in a way contrary to the will of the people, and therefore he unconstitutionally kept together that body of men who would give him their support. Bishop Burnet, in his history of the Reformation, observed, that "the king took great pains to manage the elections, and to obtain a suitable Parliament." He succeeded, and secured so subversive a House of Commons, that he did not suffer them to separate, till he had carried his two great measures, the divorce from his Queen, and, as the nation considered it, the plunder of the property of the Church. Religion was made the cloak for the latter, as it was now made the cloak for many other designs. In the following reign of Edward VI when the Protestant interest, still the minority of the nation, prevailed, the same course was followed, and, by the influence and intrigues of the Protector Somerset, Parliament was again continued for nearly five years. Mary next ascended the throne, a Princess justly condemned for her sanguinary persecutions, and which had acquired for her the epithet of Bloody Mary; but when the Catholics, who had been plundered and persecuted, came again into power, smarting with their ill usage, it was not surprising, though it was not justifiable, that they had retaliated: yet the first thing she did, was to repeal all the odious acts relating to constructive treason which had been passed in the reign of Henry VIII., and to place the security and freedom of her subjects under the protection of 25 Edw. III.; so that the people of this country were at this moment, so far as life and liberty were concerned, less secure than under the bloody Mary. (Hear, hear, hear.) She, proclaiming that the people had been deprived of their just rights, and of the great security for their liberty, had recourse to short Parliaments, and there was not one during her reign which lasted above nine months. The reign of her successor (Elizabeth) transcended all praise. Too wise to force, too honourable to impose upon the people a system of government inconsistent with the principles and practice of the Constitution; without millions of money to corrupt, without laws to oppress, without a standing army to overpower; she gained the affections, and ensured the obedience of her subjects, by the wisdom and vigour of her administration. In her reign there were only two long Parliaments. With the Stuarts commenced a long course of violations on the Constitution. It was remarkable, however, that James I., a prince who mounted the throne with high ideas of prerogative, stated, in his first proclamation for calling a Parliament, that the sheriffs of the counties should not direct such boroughs to send members, as were so utterly ruined as to be incapable or unentitled to contribute their share to the representation of the country. (Hear, hear, hear.) And yet he kept his first Parliament nearly eight years. But the people were not then jealous of that encroachment. All the evils which they had suffered arose from other quarters; and they thought themselves perfectly safe in the hands of Parliament, because no previous evil had been felt, and no present evil was apprehended from them. We had now come to the interesting and eventful reign of Charles I. That monarch had not learnt the principles of the English Constitution, and studied not to rule according to its laws and usages; he tried to establish a Government without Parliaments. This innovation he supported, too, by the authority of Westminster-hall. (Hear, hear.) The judges of that time lent themselves, the subservient tools, the industrious servants of despotism. The greatest lawyers of that age, or of any age, sanctioned the unprecedented, unconstitutional, arbitrary attempts of Charles. (Hear, hear.) because he had not a standing army to enforce the opinions of his law-officers. (Hear, hear.) If he had had a permanent military force, this great question of Reform could not have been argued that night. At length, for his own convenience, he was obliged to call Parliament together; but as he had not the millions at his disposal which Ministers now had, as he had not the same enormous power of corruption, he could not effect his purposes: how the members were elected did not signify: how many years they continued was of no importance; it was impossible to find any set of men capable of surrendering the rights and interests of the country to the arbitrary will of a tyrant. They were connected with their fellow-subjects, they had a common interest with them; there was nothing to make it their interest to sacrifice the liberty of the people. (Hear, hear.) We knew how the contest between Charles and his Parliament ended. A few individuals having gained the ascendancy, thought that the Parliament which had resisted the intrigues and the violence of Charles, and had preserved and protected the liberties of the nation, ought to be continued; and an act was passed, something like what was afterwards done on different principles, and for different purposes, for protracting the period of the duration of Parliament. It was then thought proper and salutary, that a Parliament that had acted so meritoriously and so successfully, that had fought the great battle of the nation, and obtained a glorious victory, should continue to be the guardians of national liberty. At length, notwithstanding it had done so much for the people, it became itself an intolerable grievance; and it was then thought gain to the nation that one great man should step forward to protect its liberty, and ensure its security. Yet Oliver Cromwell was a parliamentary reformer, and proposed a plan and system of national representation, the best, perhaps, that was ever devised; certainly the best, in reference to the period when it was produced. Its character, indeed, was so fair and equitable, that even Lord Clarendon had said, and it was contained in his writings, "that it was worthy of a more warrantable authority, and of better times." But when Cromwell found that he must either lose his place, which to him would have been to resign himself to the gallows, or support by the sword what he had acquired by the sword, he naturally preferred the latter alternative. The people, always attached to the Constitutional Government of Kings, hailed the restoration of Charles II. It might have been expected that he, from gratitude to the nation for the zeal and affection with which they received him, would restore and confirm all their laws and privileges: but he was not of that generous character: he was of a cold, unfeeling disposition: he forgot the claims, and trampled upon the rights of the nation. But though the people had neglected the necessary precautions through joy in receiving their banished monarch, his cold and cruel heart only availed itself of this to enslave them. For this purpose he endeavoured to corrupt the Parliament: and this was the first deliberate attempt at that mode of controlling the wishes and the interests of the people. The nation had been guilty of the generous folly of receiving him without the stipulations necessary both for the security of the State, and for the safety of the Crown; and took back, unconditionally, one that otherwise would have lived a wanderer upon the face of the earth. In return, he attempted, and succeeded in his attempt, to corrupt their House of Commons. The Parliament which invited him over was too honourable and independent to suit his purpose; and, therefore, he modelled one to his own mind. His object was to re-establish Popery, and there again was another proof that long Parliaments were most useful when it was wanted to carry measures hostile to the general wishes of the nation. In the reign of Charles II. the Catholics had certainly become the minority. What did he do? He kept the Parliament together for sixteen years; but that Parliament, which was branded with the name of the Pensionary Parliament, would not go the length of enabling him to govern by the sword. He then dismissed it, and during the rest of his reign continued in a struggle with the nation greatly similar to what had occurred during the Government of Charles I. But he did not live to incur the same penalties, nor to experience those misfortunes which afterwards befel his family. James II. acting upon the principles of his brother, was more headlong in his course, and brought affairs sooner to a crisis: he committed many outrages, but none more flagrant, or more offensive, than attempting to corrupt elections, and he was in consequence obliged to abdicate the throne. We had now reached the period of our Revolution: this surely was not too remote to be appealed to; the doctrines it expressly established could not be branded as new and new-fangled, nor could those who defended them be accused of an intention to subvert the Constitution. The hon. baronet, therefore, would here make his stand. In the declaration issued by the Prince of Orange at the Hague, setting forth the objects of his enterprise, and the grounds on which he had been invited to this country, there were many heavy accusations against the King: reference was made to the Judges, who had become the servile instruments of arbitrary power; to the juries (a great and portentous evil) who were illegally selected; but the main grievance, the grievance of grievances, that which formed the front and head of the declaration, was the corrupt state of the House of Commons; the packing of a Parliament; the King, using undue means, by corrupting the electors, as well as the members after they were elected, in order to influence and control the functions of the Legislature. The Revolution was principally, therefore, in order to procure a full, and free, and fair Parliament; this was proved by the admission of James II. himself, who knew what was right, though he did not practise it. When certain of his friends, including many of the nobility and clergy, who did not desert him in his utmost need, waited upon him with a petition, beseeching him to renounce his course, and above all, to summon immediately a free Parliament, he replied, "How can I assemble a Parliament that shall be free in all its circumstances, unless the Prince of Orange goes out of the country, who, by his presence, will influence a hundred votes?" It was evident then, from all the facts which had been adduced, that it was at all times, by the laws of this country, a high crime to corrupt the Parliament, or to use any means to make them subservient to arbitrary purposes. One of the charges of impeachment against Richard II. was, that he had packed a Parliament; and another, that he had kept the Parliament together an unusual length of time. Now what was that unusual period? Only five months; which was then considered a longer duration than the forms of the Constitution allowed. The King, no doubt, possessed the right of proroguing Parliament whenever he saw occasion; but it should never be exercised without sufficient cause. The power was to be used in a moderate manner, and not to be abused, as it had been, by proroguing to any extent which the Sovereign might think fit. Richard II. then was deposed, and James II. was expelled for tampering with elections. While such signal instances were recorded in our history, while the Bill of Rights recognized our claims, could it be contended that we were not entitled to a free election of Parliaments? An election necessarily implied that it should be free. How then could this essential part of the Constitution be reconciled with individuals appointing members of the House of Commons? The hon. baronet could here have wished to have had the petition read at the table, which was presented to the House in 1793, drawn up by a committee of gentlemen who had associated to promote the great object of Parliamentary Reform. That petition (which had been lately republished in a pamphlet he then held in his hand) was so complete in its details, so unanswerable in its arguments, so convincing in its proofs, that he wished it were impressed upon the memory of every one who then heard him; the constitution of that House was so well dissected, that he was astonished so many years as had since passed could have elapsed, without any inquiry having been instituted into the truth of its allegations. In that petition it was stated, "that 84 individuals do, by their own immediate authority, send 157 members to Parliament; and this the petitioners were ready, if the fact was disputed, to prove, and to name the members and the patrons." Could the nominees of such individuals be supposed to be a free representation of the people?

And yet, perhaps, members so returned constituted nearly 3-4ths of those who then heard him. The petition went on to state, "that, in addition to the 157 members above-mentioned, 150 more, making in the whole 307, are returned by the recommendation of 70 powerful individuals, added to the 84 before-mentioned, and making the total number of patrons 154, who return a decided majority of the House." One hundred and fifty-four individuals thus claimed and exercised the right of disposing, by their agents, of the lives, liberties, and property, of the millions of inhabitants who composed the subjects of this kingdom. Did not this seem in itself a usurpation? did it not appear a grievance which called loudly for a remedy? If he were required to submit to any arbitrary power that had interests contrary to that of the people; if oppression were to be permitted from any quarter, he would rather endure it from the Crown than from individuals who could control the Crown—who kept both the King and the people in bondage; who destroyed the Constitution, and united in themselves all the powers and prerogatives which it ought to possess. We could not read the opinions of any eminent author who had spoken of our Constitution without finding that his authority was in favour of a change of this system. Mr. Justice Blackstone, who, in his own time, was regarded as rather a courtly lawyer, and was accused of not being sufficiently alive to corruptions and abuses, but whose book now (so much had our opinions been altered within the last half century) might almost be considered as speaking Jacobinism, had laid down principles which shewed the necessity of a Reform. He had said, that there were three powers in our mixed Legislature—the King, Lords, and Commons; that these three powers ought to be kept distinct; and that the latter especially, as the guardian of the people's rights, ought not to be under the influence of the former; for, added he, if the other two branches were to influence the House of Commons, which emanates from the people, and constitutes their natural protectors, there is an end of the Constitution. So firmly convinced was the learned commentator that the people ought to be represented, and thus had a right to govern themselves by delegates elected by themselves, that he conceived the force of laws and the necessity of obedience resulted from this principle. In one place he admits, "that the spirit of our Constitution is in favour of a more complete representation of the people;" and in another he declares, that "The lawfulness of punishing criminals is founded on this principle, that the law by which they suffer was made by their own consent." Was it to be borne, then, that instead of being governed by laws made by our own consent, instead of seeing a full and free representation, instead of seeing the majority of the people deputed those who were to legislate for them, the nation was to be ruled by a few borough-mongers? Different writers, according to their taste, their education, or their peculiar bias, had pointed out the advantages, and supported the excellence of different species of government. The republican, the aristocratical, and the monarchical forms of administration had all had their panegyrists; but no author that ever he read or heard of, had ever praised an oligarchy. (Hear.) In an aristocracy, the interest of the nobility and the people might frequently be the same; and, at any rate, the form of Government did not imply an opposition between them. This might, therefore, be a good Government under certain circumstances. The same might be said of absolute monarchy. The reigning Prince might sometimes have the wisdom to see that his interest and that of his people were inseparably united; that he could enjoy power and resources only in proportion as he promoted their welfare; and that a higher reward could be reaped in their approbation of his exertions to promote their happiness, than in the gratification of that senseless caprice and inverted ambition that would lead him to destroy their liberties, and to squander their property. Democracies, with more plausibility, had been often the subject of encomium and recommendation.—They had in the history of the world performed wonders. All who heard him would remember with what enthusiasm, when young, they had read of the prodigies of valour and conduct for which the ancient republics had been distinguished; how celebrated they had become for the energy, the intellectual improvement, and scientific progress of their citizens. Indeed, no form of government had called forth more talent, more industry, more resources, and been distinguished by more remarkable deeds than the democratical. For energy, in particular, it transcended the rest, and had received the support and praise of many great men. But an oligarchy could boast of having performed nothing laudable; of having done nothing that could be approved; of having no panegyrist. (Hear, hear.) Some oligarchies, however, were not so objectionable: they were merely aristocracies with a narrower basis, where the interests of the governors were not necessarily opposed to those of the people. The oligarchy of which he was speaking was, however, of a different character; it was an oligarchy of borough-mongers, whose interests were at variance with those of the rest of the nation; who corruptly usurped powers that did not belong to them, and trampled upon the rights of the people at their pleasure; in short, it was the most odious, the most degrading, and the most galling of all oligarchies. That 150 patrons of the representation should exist, that they should exist against all law, that they should exist against the resolutions of the House of Commons itself, which resolutions were passed at the commencement of every session, and might be regarded as the law of Parliament, or at least a declaration to the country that such was the law, appeared monstrous and unaccountable.

The law to which he alluded on this subject was no new law, it was nearly as old as Parliaments. The statute of Westminster I., prohibited any interference of great persons with elections, and expressly enacted that they should be free. It was written in old French, and said, that no great man should disturb the electors when in the exercise of their duties; that, "because elections ought to be free, the King commanded, upon great forfeiture, that no man, by force of arms, nor by malice or menacing, shall disturb any to make free election." This law was the foundation of the resolution passed at the beginning of every session, "that it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons, for any lord of Parliament or any lord-lieutenant of any county, to concern themselves in the election of members of Parliament." What had now become of this law and this resolution? They were allowed to sleep; they were never acted upon; or rather they were perpetually broken, and had become a dead letter. A Reform in the House of Commons, so as to destroy this power of interference, would be of more service than any law prohibiting it. The Bill of Rights had likewise declared, that elections should be free; but more would have been done towards securing that object by enacting, that there should be a more frequent and more universal exercise of the right of suffrage, than by the long declaration of rights on which that bill was founded; one line to this effect would have been more efficient than all other laws and resolutions whatever. At the time of the Revolution, the Parliament, called the Convention Parliament, because it was disposed in some cases to go counter to the wishes of the Government, was not suffered to remain so long assembled as to execute the great work of securing the freedom of the representation. It had declared ex officio informations by the Attorney-general, to be contrary to the laws of England; and although there was a great spirit of freedom in the Government of that time, yet, like all governments, it was averse to an abridgment of its assumed powers. Ex officio informations were then declared to be illegal; and the history of this species of proceeding since, would be sufficient to excite our wonder at the change in our sentiments, and to call for a cautious jealousy over our remaining freedom. That proceeding, then denounced by Parliament, was now declared to be law; and power was put into the hands of the Attorney-general of imprisoning or holding to bail (which was equivalent to the power of imprisonment) any and every man in the kingdom, on his simple ex officio information. Nay, he might do this, on merely declaring that it was his intention to file an information. (Hear, hear.) What now became of the law for protecting the liberty of the subject; what became of that law which Lord Coke called the bulwark of our freedom, our personal security? What signified all that was said about our presumed innocence and perfect impunity till our guilt had been pronounced by a jury of our peers? All this was now mere rhapsody. (Hear, hear.) It had no existence, except in the imagination. We might read of the protection which our Constitution afforded, but with as much reference to reality as if we were perusing a novel. It appeared like a sort of fairy enchantment, something very delightful to behold; but when we approached to touch it, it was so fragile, that out of regard for it, no doubt, the nominees of a set of borough-mongers in that House, on the least pressure of public difficulty, had been in the constant habit of suspending its most wholesome provisions. (Hear, hear, hear.) It was a maxim which he believed could not be disputed, that tyranny was generally greater under the forms of a free constitution, when perverted, than under an open undisguised exercise of despotic power, and that, at any rate, it was more difficult to be got quit of. This was no new doctrine—it was no French principle—it had been declared by Machiavel, and supported by Montesquieu. This latter writer, who was not a beardless boy newly come from school, but a man who had devoted twenty years of his life to the study of governments, had given it as his opinion, that the liberties of England would perish, like those of the ancient republics, when her Parliament became corrupt. But corruption was supposed now to be harmless; it was even defended as a necessary part of the existing system, rather than denounced as tending to the ruin of the Constitution. It had been argued by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning), that Government could not go on without it: but he thought he should bring sufficient authorities to overbalance the opinion of that right hon. gentleman, when he stated, that all our great men were against it, and that there were no less than 150 laws in our statute book denouncing it. It would be pedantry to go into all the great authorities on this subject, but he might be forgiven for stating the opinion of Mr. Locke, that the corruption of the representation was the very worst of all evils, as it poisoned the source of all laws, and cut up our Constitution by the roots. It would be strange indeed, as had been said by Plato, that the same venality which was felt to be so pernicious in every other department of life, should at once lose its injurious effects, and become operatively wholesome, when employed in the service of Government. In the time of Charles the Second, although the Parliament which was suspected, justly, of corruption, had not been free from undue influence, they at least shewed the necessity they conceived themselves under to affect purity, by taking an oath, protesting before God, that, "neither directly, nor indirectly, they, or any of their friends, for their use or with their knowledge, had received any sums of money from the King, or any other person by his Majesty's order, and that they had not given their vote in Parliament for any reward or promise whatsoever." This corrupt Parliament had a different opinion from the right hon. gentleman with regard to the necessity of being free and independent. It seemed indeed extraordinary that corruption could find its advocates: that the very word was not sufficient to deter from any open undisguised defence. Speaking of corruption, he could not help enlarging a little on the meaning of the word, in order to remove some prejudices and misconceptions which want of explanation had allowed to be entertained. It had a different meaning in the mouths of different persons, and as applied on different occasions. When used by a religious man in opposition to religious principles, it was called sin: in the conduct of those who transgressed the rules of honesty or virtue in private life, it had the name of immorality; and when applied to the conduct of public men in Government matters, it was called political. Political corruption in this classification, might be perfectly consistent with private morality. It might be defined that state in which individual interest was arrayed against public good, and private views influenced public conduct. On former occasions, when this question was agitated, it had been said by its opponents, that no reformation of the representation was necessary, but that the electors should reform themselves, and then corruption would cease. One of the most ingenious of those persons (Mr. Windham), and to whom even those who differed from him most had listened with pleasure (although it was felt at the moment that he stood in the singular predicament of defending those very practices which his mind abhorred), was remarkable for viewing the subject in this light. He used to illustrate the existence of corruption in the people, by supposing the case of an elector who had a son in the navy. He calls upon the influence of that Government for whose candidate he had uniformly voted, to have that son made a master and commander. The object is effected. All the brother officers of the son are at a loss to find out in what way he had entitled himself to the distinction, and are naturally chagrined at the undue favouritism. Here, said Mr. Windham, was a job emanating from the people themselves. Now, all this arose from a confused notion of the subject, because the people can never be corrupt, inasmuch as they can never have but a common interest. The mistake was occasioned by confounding political with private corruption, which were perfectly distinct in theory, and were often separated in practice. Taking the definition he had formerly given of corruption—namely, an opposition of private interest to public duty, and the natural bias which the former creates against the latter—a House of Commons might be very virtuous as legislators, whose individual private conduct was most corrupt: and, on the other hand, a Parliament might be corrupt which was entirely composed of saints. When he therefore spoke of the corruption of the members of the Legislature, he meant no implied reflection on their private conduct: he believed that in the common intercourse of life they might be all upright in their principles, and honest in their transactions; but when their interests were opposed to their duty, in a parliamentary sense he could not but call the House corrupt. Nay, he would even go farther, and say, that the more honourable the members were in their private capacity, the more corrupt they might be in their public; as a member, from a private engagement which his honour might compel him scrupulously to observe, might be prevented from voting on a particular occasion according to his views of right, and be induced to surrender his seat, when, by keeping it and voting contrary to his patron, his services might be beneficial to the public. Though no member could be deprived of his seat when he had once obtained it, every one knew that a gentleman would be reckoned dishonourable, nay, he would not be tolerated in society, who should not obey the instruction of his patron, or resign his seat at his desire. It had often been a question without the walls of Parliament, and within, how far a representative was bound to obey the will or to act upon the views of his constituents. All disputes upon this subject would cease by a free election. We often heard of meetings of constituents to remonstrate against the conduct of their representatives; these, likewise, would cease, confidence would be restored between the House and the people, and the people would willingly submit to those laws which should proceed from themselves. But that confidence did not exist, while the representation was in its present state, while the people had not the seats at their disposal, and the Treasury had a market to settle such commodities. (Hear, hear.) He brought no particular charges against Ministers; they must act as they did, or otherwise they could not command their majorities: and without such majorities, the Government itself, which emanated from the borough-mongers, could not be carried on. This was the avowed, acknowledged state of things; and that practice, at which the Speaker had said that our ancestors would have startled with horror, was now openly and unblushingly defended. All parties had confessed its existence; and the noble lord opposite (Castlereagh), who had been concerned in selling seats, was only more unfortunate than others, in having been detected. (A laugh.) He meant no personal attack on the noble lord; nor did he mean to say that he peculiarly ought to be impeached, as he had not been more criminal than others would be with the same opportunities. But the very public avowal of such a violation of the Constitution was of itself a strong argument for putting an end to the present system which was plunging the country into ruin, and under which, whatever success we might gain, whatever other advantages we might enjoy, liberty could not much longer exist.

(Hear, hear.) There was a time when such practices would not have been borne by the House: he well remembered that since he entered Parliament they were not mentioned directly, but always in circumlocutions. In 1785, when Mr. Pitt, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the representation of the people, he said, "that there was a sort of squeamish and maiden coyness about the House in talking on this subject; they were not very ready to talk in that House, on what, at the same time, it was pretty well understood out of doors, they had no objection to negotiate, the purchase and the sale of seats." This maiden coyness, however, had now worn out. (A laugh.) Hence the necessity of Reform was apparent. He need not remind the House of the petitions which had been presented complaining of the grievance of the present system: they had been numerous, and pointed out different remedies. He did not think that the description of any specific plan was necessary: it was enough for him that the grievance was acknowledged, and that a remedy of some kind or other must be applied, which might be left to the wisdom of the House. He would not, therefore, trouble them with entering into any abstruse discussion, or offering any specific opinion. He had shewn, that the great evil was nomineeship to seats, and he hoped that it would be possible to induce the House to enter into inquiry. The gentlemen all over the country, who saw their property fast leaving them, who had been accustomed formerly to defend the liberties of their fellow-citizens, but the majority of whom unhappily now thought only of supporting Government, and of giving it strength, whilst they should be adding to its honesty—who saw this once happy nation the seat of industry, and abounding in capital and credit, changed into a taxed, oppressed, overburdened, and beggared people—would, he thought, now see sufficient reasons for inquiring into the cause of the evil, and applying the proper remedy. (Hear, hear.) It was said that our Constitution was a glorious Constitution. Yes, it was so in the books; it was so in the works of our political writers; it was so in Montesquieu; and in the descriptions which our old lawyers and statesmen had given of it: but, practically speaking, there was not more wretchedness, more tampering with liberty, or more corruption in any part of Europe, than prevailed under our boasted Constitution. He hoped, therefore, that the gentlemen of England would see that it was not their interest to fortify this system, that there could be no check or control over Government without a change in the representation, and that their property would soon leave them, unless there was an immediate change. When the members who might be returned after the Reform should see, that every time they put their hands into the public purse they took something out of their own, that profligate and wasteful expenditure of the public money would of course cease. At present, the gentlemen of England saw that they must surrender their comforts, by the enjoyment of which they promoted that of the people—that they must renounce that hospitality by which they were enabled to gratify their own feelings, and to diffuse happiness around them—that they were driven from the seats of their ancestors, and obliged to hide themselves from the pursuit of their creditors and the tax-gatherers in a foreign land;—could they require any other arguments for Reform?

Must we then, wretched exiles, ever mourn,
Nor e'en with length of rolling years return?
Are we compell'd by cruel fate's decree,
No more our houses and our homes to see?
Or shall we mount again the rural throne,
And rule the country, kingdoms once our own?

If they would take counsel from their wisdom and not from their fears, they would, instead of passing acts to oppress the people, step forward for their protection; and would see that the system of corruption was as destructive of their own interest as it was of that of their constituents. He hoped the people would not cease to demand their rights, and would compel a reformation of the abuses complained of. The want of virtue in the representatives of the people was what the Crown had as much a right to complain of as the people, as both were kept in thralldom by the same oligarchy, and would both be relieved by the same remedy. If the people were always to be met with bills of severity when they presented their petitions; if when they were silent they were supposed indifferent; and when they spoke out, their liberties were to be suspended, and all the bulwarks of their rights removed; how could we venture to boast of the glories of our Constitution? He would not occupy their time with mentioning any more authorities, though great authorities might be quoted: he might cite Lord Chatham, Mr. Pitt, and Mr. Fox, all of whom had supported the measure of Reform. There was one person, however, for whose writings he should always entertain the greatest respect, and who, although he had taken alarm at the beginning of the French revolution, had deeply felt, and eloquently described, the necessity of rendering the House of Commons a true representation of the people, as well as the evils which sprung from it, when it was not. What the opinions of that great writer might have been, had he lived to this day, he did not know: but he would recal to their recollection what he had said on this subject. (The hon. baronet here read the following extracts from the pamphlet in his hand.) "Whatever alterations time and the necessary accommodations of business may have introduced, this character can never be sustained, unless the House of Commons shall be made to bear some stamp of the actual disposition of the people at large. It would (among public misfortunes) be an evil more natural and tolerable, that the House of Commons should be infected with every epidemical phrenzy of the people, as this would indicate some consanguinity, some sympathy of nature with their constituents, than that they should in all cases be wholly untouched by the opinions and feelings of the people out of doors. By this want of sympathy they would cease to be a House of Commons; for it is not the derivation of the power of that House from the people which makes it, in a distinct sense, their representative. For the King is the representative of the people; so are the Lords; and so are the Judges. For they are all trustees of the people, as well as the Commons; because no power is given for the sole sake of the holder: and although Government certainly is an institution of divine authority, yet its forms, and the persons who administer it, all originate from the people. A popular origin cannot, therefore, be the characteristic distinction of a popular representative, which belongs equally to all parts of Government, and in all forms. The virtue, spirit and essence of a House of Commons consists in its being the express image of the feelings of the nation. It was not instituted to be a controul upon the people, as of late it has been taught, by a doctrine of the most pernicious tendency, but as a controul for the people. Other institutions have been formed for the purpose of checking popular excesses; and they are, I apprehend, fully adequate to their object. If not, they ought to be made so. But the House of Commons, as it was never intended for the support of peace and subordination, is miserably appointed for that service; having no stronger weapon than its mace, and no better officer than its Serjeant at Arms, which it can command of its own proper authority. A vigilant and jealous eye over executive and judicial magistracy; an anxious care of public money; an openness, approaching towards facility, to public complaint: these seem to be the true characteristics of a House of Commons. But an addressing House of Commons, and a petitioning nation; a House of Commons full of confidence, when the nation is plunged in despair; in the utmost harmony with Ministers, whom the people regard with the utmost abhorrence; who vote thanks, when the public opinion calls upon them for impeachments; who are eager to grant, when the general voice demands reckoning and account; who, in all disputes between the people and administration, presume against the people; who punish their disorders, but refuse even to inquire into the provocations to them; this is an unnatural, a monstrous state of things in this Constitution." Such were the sentiments of Mr. Burke in the active part of his political life, and he would ask, was not this unnatural state, the very condition of the House he was then addressing? He wished the gentlemen of England would keep one fact in mind—that 150 borough proprietors had the property, the liberty, and the lives of this great nation at their disposal; that by their agents they constituted the executive or domineered over it; that they had become Kings, Lords, and Commons, and excluded every other power from the Constitution (hear, hear); and he asked them if they would allow this state of things to continue? The Roman empire had been set up for sale by the corruption of its legislature; the Athenians were so attentive to the purity of theirs, that it was declared high treason for any one not a citizen to intrude into the legislative assembly. So long as such a House of Commons as that which he had described should continue in the country, neither foreign nor domestic dangers would create alarm. He wished to see no other House of Commons than that which answered to the description by a great man of what a House of Commons ought to be. He called Mr. Burke a great man, because it was an epithet due to his extraordinary abilities, and to those principles which he had so strenuously supported during the greater portion of his life, whatever had been his subsequent departure from them, or whatever had been its cause. Mr. Burke had indeed gone farther, and declared it to be better that the House should partake of every epidemical phrenzy of the people, than that it should shew a perpetual jealousy of their rights. It was not, however, a jealousy of which he now complained; it was an open hostility to popular rights, a want of all common feeling with the country at large, and a cheaply won character of magnanimity, in affecting to despise what was called the clamour of the people. This appeared to him, he confessed, to be hardly decent; but as he did not think it right to take upon himself to point out what particular course it might be most advisable to pursue, he could only entertain hopes, that the House would consent to an inquiry into the facts and allegations contained in the petitions. Most particularly he trusted, that the committee, if appointed, would direct its attention to the alleged nomination of members by peers; a nomination which could not be practised but in defiance of all law, decency, and reason. It was upon these views of the difference between the Constitution as it now existed, and as it was settled at the Revolution, that he invited the House to listen to his proposition. Our present practice had varied from the standard then established in many important points. It had been judged necessary at that period to enact, that every privy-counsellor should subscribe his name to a copy of the advice which he gave his sovereign. Another regulation had for its object the exclusion of persons holding offices under the Crown from seats in Parliament. Every thing, however, which had been interposed as a security against the encroachments of power had been either taken away, or had been suffered to become a dead letter. Nothing could furnish a more decisive proof that the House of Commons had lost its former connection with the people; that they no longer regarded themselves as their stewards or servants, but as a master uniting in himself all the different springs and species of authority. Whatever might be thought of the wisdom or expediency of annual Parliaments at present, it was not true that they were unknown to the history of the Constitution; in the discussions on the Triennial Act, the contrary was maintained by the most eminent public characters of that day. With regard to the Septennial Act, indeed, he wished to say no more, than to allude to the opinion expressed of it by Dr. Johnson, who, he supposed, if living, would now be considered a Jacobin. (A laugh.) Dr. Johnson, when reprobating as unconstitutional the measure by which twelve persons were raised, during the reign of Queen Anne, at one time to the peerage, speaks of it as nothing equal or approaching to the contempt of all human right, and of all human means of asserting it, which was exemplified in passing the septennial act. But the pretence then was, the existence of a Popish faction; another proof of the aversion which had so long prevailed to trust to the sense and wishes of the country. He believed that this pretence was now abandoned, but with very little alteration even in its name. The dread was no longer excited by a Jacobinical, but by a Jacobinical party. Believing, however, as he did, that there was no danger to be apprehended except by the Government continuing to do wrong, and still more to alienate instead of regaining the affections of the people, by restoring to them their undoubted rights, he should conclude by moving, "That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the present state of the representation of the country; and to report their observations to the House."

Mr. Brand seconded the motion, and observed, that the present debate was more likely to serve as an indication of opinions already formed, than as a means of converting many from their former sentiments. It was the present situation of the country that could alone induce him to go farther than to express his general concurrence in all the principles laid down in the able, luminous, and temperate address of the hon. baronet. (Hear.) This could alone furnish him with either a reason or a justification for repeating opinions which he had often before stated to the House, and endeavoured to press upon their conviction. But when he considered the circumstances in which they were placed, the extreme distress and suffering that prevailed, and the unprecedented energy with which the public had petitioned for Reform, he thought he saw a material change in the relation subsisting between the House of Commons and the people. He had long since communicated to the House his belief, that this relation should be enlarged by means of timely, moderate, and conciliatory Reform; or that the consequence must inevitably be, that the House would be driven to measures of military coercion in the defence and maintenance of its authority. Deeply as he regretted the immediate cause of it, he might appeal to those who heard him, whether his prediction had not already been fulfilled. He had wished that the hon. baronet should bring forward this question at an earlier period, for there had not been a single great discussion, nor one comprehensive subject agitated by Parliament, in which its merits were not materially involved. What had long been his persuasion, seemed, by the number of the petitions on their table, to have become the general persuasion of the public mind, that the House of Commons, as at present constituted, did not in any fair sense represent the people. The result of this was, in a time of profound peace, suspensions of their ancient rights, and an enormous military establishment to defend those suspensions—(Hear, hear.) In a statesman-like view, it was impossible for him, in such a state of things, to call for a reduction of that establishment; and he could not help feeling some surprise, that those amongst his honourable friends who were unfavourable to the object of this motion, should be of opinion that the establishment might be reduced with safety. He must say, indeed, that when he referred to the weight and respectability which belonged to many of the petitions in question, the whole subject deserved to be considered in a new point of view. He was aware that the country had been excited—(A loud cry of hear, hear! from the Ministerial side.)—excited, he was about to say, to a consideration and attention to this question, and had found in it one of the great causes of the public distress. He would certainly not contend, that a Reform of the representation would afford an immediate remedy to existing grievances; but he thought it the best security against the future recurrence of their causes. (Hear, hear.) Some of these petitions might contain expressions too energetic and violent to suit the delicacy of individuals; but there were others, to the tone and phraseology of which no objection could be stated. Let the House look at the petition from the county of Cornwall, at once respectable in the names subscribed to it, and the talents displayed in its preparation and support. He agreed with the hon. baronet, that it was better not to recommend any specific measure, or to attempt deciding at once between the Legislature and the petitioners. A case of great grievance had been laid before them, into which it was their duty to inquire. The details brought forward, although far within the limits of the truth, clearly shewed a practice of nominating to seats in that House by Peers and Commoners, as repugnant to every principle of liberty, as it was contrary to the express letter of our ancient Constitution. One single instance of such a practice he should deem a sufficient ground for the appointment of a committee. He knew that this system of nomination was defended, under the pretence of virtual representation, and was said, in its working, to cause a return of almost the same individuals who would be chosen under a different form of election; but even admitting it to be true, that the same individuals would be returned, he was sure they would return to their seats under a very different influence. (Hear, hear.) It would not be under the influence of individual patrons, but of the body of their electors, whose injuries they would be bound to see redressed; and whose rights it would be their interest and duty to support. He believed the right hon. gentleman opposite knew the political bias of every person and party in the House. The due representation of the real property was, to the personal, as four to three, but the system of nomination and influence converted it into the proportion of five to one. This might serve for an argument to shew the practical inutility of that preponderance which would be given to personal property by such a scheme of Reform as that of Universal Suffrage. He desired to allude to this topic but slightly, because it certainly did not now fall under consideration. In the time of Henry VI. when the elective franchise was extended, it belonged only to freeholders and to the King's suitors. All the rest of the community were in a state of villenage, except those who held by burgage tenure. In those boroughs where the right of voting still belonged to all who paid scot and lot, it appeared to him that the suffrage was sufficiently extensive. These, however, were hints which he only threw out casually, and would form the proper subject for inquiry in the committee. To return to the defence set up, that the present system was one of virtual representation—could that be called representation at all which might possibly fall into the hands of a foreigner? When in the hands of a few individuals, instead of the body of the community, by whatever name it was called, it was not what representation ought to be. Sir William Jones had justly remarked, that "as well might a Roman tyrant have urged, that all his vassals were represented in his person: he was augur and high priest, the religious state was, therefore, represented, by him: he was tribune of the people, the popular part of the nation were, therefore, represented; he was consul, dictator, master of the horse, every thing he pleased; the civil and military states were therefore concentrated in him: the next deduction would have been, that the slaves of his empire were free men. There is no end of absurdities deducible from so idle a play upon words." This, he thought, was a sufficient reply to the flimsy pretext of virtual representation, as an argument against just and incontrovertible claims. When it was urged, during the debate on the American war, that America was as well represented as Manchester and Birmingham, Mr. Burke had asked, "When the people of America look up to you with the eyes of filial love and affection, will you turn to them the shameful parts of the Constitution?" He could anticipate nothing but danger from that loss of confidence and esteem on the part of the people which must follow the refusal of their just petitions. The alarm which he believed to be at present groundless, would at length become well founded and imminent. There was a limit to the sufferings, and a limit to the indignities, which a loyal people would submit to bear. The House had heard the petitions of the people read, and were bound to examine their statements, unless some valid reason could be urged for rejecting the inquiry. He knew none except what was derived from the dread inspired by the French revolution—a revolution which had itself sprung from the obstinate resistance to Reform. If the object was to goad the people to violence, in order to prepare the way for a military government, perhaps no better means could be devised. Let it be remembered, that one powerful cause of the last revolution in this country was related by Bishop Burnet to have been the acts and practices resorted to, in order to enable the King to get a Parliament to his mind. The Earl of Bath, to secure to himself the place of groom of the stole, procured the return of 44 members from Cornwall, and complaints were heard from every corner of the kingdom. "Early Reforms," as Mr. Burke had observed, "were amicable arrangements with a friend in power: late reformations were terms imposed upon a conquered enemy." (Hear.) If it was wished that the country should be really tranquil, Reform was the only means of providing for that tranquillity: every other resource would be found vain; and whilst he entreated the House not to answer the filial applications of the people, by suspending their best and hereditary rights, it was his sincere persuasion that they would feel the inadequacy of such measures, adopted against the sense of those who were most disinterested in their advice, and repent of them when it was too late. (Hear, hear.)

Sir J. Nichol said, notwithstanding what had just been stated by the hon. member, and by the hon. baronet who preceded him, he was still inclined to support the Constitution of the Country. He saw no ground for any alteration, and, therefore, it did not appear necessary to him to go into a committee. The House ought first to consider, what were the real evils we suffered, or rather what were the real blessings we enjoyed under the Constitution in its existing forms? The next inquiry should be, whether we could correct the evil without endangering the good? Few, he believed, would deny, that great practical blessings were bestowed by the Constitution as now administered; and that a greater portion of freedom and happiness was to be found in the society established in this kingdom than under any other Government in the world. (Hear, hear.) We ought to pause, then, and reflect on the magnitude of these advantages, before we proceeded to visionary experiments on the frame and character of the Constitution. It was not a simple machine, in which all the springs moved independently; on the contrary, many of them pressed upon and were controlled by others in invisible operation. A sudden change of any of its parts might possibly suspend the motion of the whole, or accelerate it to its destruction. That which alone we were certain of was, that it worked well at present. (Hear, hear.) If there were incongruities between its theory and practice, the same might be said of the trial by jury; and yet what institution could be a greater practical benefit to the country? It was obvious, that no system of elections could secure an uniform coincidence of sentiment between the majority of electors and the majority of representatives. Whilst he cheerfully admitted that all governments were for the benefit of the people, he must deny that the laws were not binding, unless they were sanctioned by them. That which afforded them the greatest happiness, with the least mixture of evil, was in itself a legitimate government; and before he could assent to the proposition before the House, he called upon those who supported it to demonstrate, that it would add any thing to the welfare or security of the country. Our Constitution was essentially that of a limited monarchy, in which it was certainly necessary, that the House of Commons should comprise a representation of all the great interests of the country, and of its wealth, its integrity, its knowledge, and its talents. This object might be, and was in his opinion, as fully accomplished by the representation of narrow places, as by elections of a more popular description. Every class of society, however humble, had its interests considered; and he might ask, in illustration of this, whether the greatest care was not employed in apportioning the burdens of taxation, so as to place its weight as far as was practicable on the higher and middle orders? In the practice of the Constitution, two great parties necessarily arose, one of whom conducted the Government, whilst their measures were diligently watched by the other. The different sorts of representation were distributed pretty equally between them; and it was remarkable, that when the present Earl Grey brought forward his plan of Reform in the year 1793, it was supported by no more than 20 county members, and he did not find that the rest were discharged by their constituents at the next election, because they had voted against it. A variety of theories had been lately advanced on this subject. Some persons were for Universal Suffrage. He believed, however, that no one would be found to make such a proposition in that House—a proposition, which, if adopted, would destroy the balance of the Constitution, by giving too great a preponderance to the democratic part of it, and would lead to all those revolutionary miseries, which, commencing in anarchy, must end in military despotism. The next theory, which was recommended by a much greater number, was representation co-extensive with direct taxation, or, in other words, a vesting of the elective franchise in all householders. To adopt this suggestion would be to alter the representation of three-fourths of that House; a representation formed by the wisdom and practice of ages; sanctioned by various charters and other solemn proceedings, and interwoven with the habits and manners of the people. How this change in the mode of election was to be carried into effect had not been stated. Whether it was proposed to divide the country, like France, into departments or districts, he did not know. If so, it would inevitably follow, that the metropolis, and the counties in its immediate neighbourhood, would soon acquire an undue preponderance in Parliament, and London would become what Paris had been, the despot of the country. Much had been said of the bribery and corruption attendant on elections. Would such a division of the country tend to diminish those evils? Another question that would arise, would be, whether all classes of persons were to be considered eligible to serve as Representatives? If so, whether such a change in the character of Parliament would be beneficial, he left to the good sense of the House and the public to determine. Some of the petitions complained of extreme taxation, and attributed that and the existing pressure of distress to the defective state of the representation. If by excessive taxation was meant unnecessary taxation, he must deny the charge. It was necessary for the payment of the interest of the national debt; for he did not understand that there had yet been in that House an avowal of a disposition to commit so gross a fraud on the public creditor as to extinguish that debt. It was also necessary for the support of our establishments, which Ministers had reduced to the lowest possible scale. He must implore them, however, not to reduce them so low as to endanger the security of the Government. With respect to the existing distress, he admitted that it proceeded in a great measure from the wars in which we had been engaged. The hon. gentleman who spoke last, had contended, that if the representation were more in unison with the popular feeling, the course of public measures would be considerably changed. Now, he would ask, if the representation had been more in unison with what was called the popular feeling, would those wars have been prevented? (Hear, hear, from the Opposition benches.) Did history instruct them that Democratic States, provided they were powerful, were less prone to war than States under any other form of Government? Let them look to the ancient Republics. Let them look to France when she was a Republic. Let them look to America. He wished the House to consider what had been the popular feeling with respect to our wars. He might go back as far as the Revolution in support of his argument, but he would confine himself to later periods. Would any man assert that the war between this country and America was not a war in which the public opinion went with the Government at its commencement, and during a great part of its progress? A party in Parliament had been hostile to it; but it was not until the latter end of the war that the public made common cause with them. In 1780 there was a general election; but he had never heard that any expression of dissatisfaction was raised at that time against those who supported the war. On the contrary, Mr. Burke was turned out of the city of Bristol, which contained 7 or 8,000 voters, because he opposed the American war. (Cries of no, no, from the Opposition.) He admitted that towards the conclusion of that war, when its disasters had greatly increased, an alteration took place in the opinion of the country: and in less than two years from the election to which he had alluded, the Representatives of the people in Parliament, turned out the Administration, and put an end to the war. He would now go to the French war. Would any man assert, that the commencement of that war did not accord with public opinion? Unquestionably a party in that House denied its justice and policy; but without entering into an examination of that question, he would say, without fear of contradiction, that no political party was ever reduced so low in numbers. In the various fluctuations of the war, public opinion remained in its favour; and if any man, looking back at those times, were now to say that he would have preferred making peace with Buonaparte at the price of leaving him at the head of the French Government, to bringing the war to the glorious termination to which it had been brought, even at the price of the pressure with which that effort had been attended, he was convinced that that man would not carry with him the sentiments of the country. If, therefore, the representation had been changed, and had been rendered more democratic, these wars, and their consequences, would not have been averted. Republican Governments were by no means distinguished for economy and prudence. Under the French republic, the expenses amounted to 10,000,000*l.* sterling per month. No man had a higher respect than himself for public opinion: but he trusted that Parliament would never suffer itself to be influenced by popular clamour. He could not agree on this subject with the hon. gentleman who spoke last, and who had quoted Mr. Burke, to shew that there could not be too strict a union between the feelings of the people and those of their representatives. On the contrary, if the representatives of the people were well chosen, there were occasions in which they would shew their wisdom and real attachment to the people, by resisting opinions hastily entertained. Certainly, when the popular opinion was dispassionately formed, that House must, and ought, and always would conform to it. There was no man who knew him, who did not know how much he valued the right of petitioning. It occasioned him, therefore, the utmost grief and pain, when he considered the mode that had been adopted to procure the petitions now upon the table. They had been obtained by holding out delusions to the people, by telling them that the distress which they endured arose from the defective state of the representation. It was not surprising that those who laboured under distress, should lend a willing ear to persons who suggested a remedy for the evil; but it was impossible that opinions so obtained could have much weight with Parliament. Even if the House were to risk the best blessings of the country, and to sacrifice the public welfare, to gratify the caprice and sooth the insolence—not of the people (for they had a right to command), but of those who affected to advocate their cause, they would neither content the wise part of the community, nor silence the clamours of the disaffected. In 1782, in 1783, and 1785, Mr. Pitt brought forward the subject of Parliamentary Reform; and though his plans were moderate, and very different from what was now called a radical Reform, the good sense of the House put a negative upon his proposals. What, then, should we venture to embark upon these troubled waters at this day? Had not the French revolution taught us a most awful lesson? The storm once raised, no man could direct its course. The experiment could not be made without extreme danger, and the result must be most fatal to the welfare and security of the country. Mr. Pitt himself was so fully convinced of this, that he was not ashamed to retract his opinions. Even if the time were more favourable for the agitation of this question, or for acceding to the motion of the hon. baronet, the slightest change in the happy Constitution under which we lived would be productive of great evil; and, therefore, we had better adhere to the existing forms of Government. In 1780 Lord Chatham proposed to invigorate the representation of the people, to infuse a new portion of blood into the Constitution, as he called it, by adding 100 county members. Well, then, this had been done; it had been completely effected by the Irish Union. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) Would any body say that the management of this measure had not fallen into different hands from those which formerly directed it? In 1782, the cause of Parliamentary Reform was supported by many persons of the highest rank. In 1793, a Society was formed, of which, however he might differ from it in opinion, it was but justice to say, that it consisted of persons of great political character and moral respectability. The object which this Society—the Friends of the People—had in view, was nothing more than Parliamentary Reform: and it disavowed and shook off all connexion with other co-existent societies, whose views were supposed to be not quite so constitutional. But who were the persons without those walls, (for he did not mean to intimate any thing personally disrespectful to the hon. baronet, or to any of the hon. gentlemen in that House who supported his views) that now sought to govern the public mind? One of them, —the chief framer of the petitions,—the great conductor, missionary, and apostle of the cause out of doors,—had been the subject of panegyric in that House: but it was well known, that during the existence of the Society of the Friends of the People, a secession of the leading members took place, because that individual was suffered to continue in it. (No, no, from the Opposition benches.) He believed, notwithstanding this denial, that such had been the case; and that afterwards, on that individual's expressly avowing a correspondence with the Jacobins of Paris, he was excluded from the Society: the letter proposing that exclusion having been signed by the chairman, at that time member for Hertfordshire, the deputy chairman, now a noble duke, and the hon. member for Carlisle. But was this the only difference in the character of those who now called for Reform, and those who were its advocates twenty-five years ago?—By no means. There was no longer a Society of Friends of the People, with high names and characters: but there were other societies of all descriptions co-operating with each other, and many of them evidently prepared to go much greater lengths than the attainment of Parliamentary Reform. Among them were the Spenceans, and others with notions equally absurd and criminal. This was an alarming consideration. The House could not disguise from itself, that means had been industriously adopted to undermine the moral and religious feelings of the people; that every artifice had been practised by designing individuals under the sacred names of Liberty and the Constitution, to tempt the lower orders to the commission of acts that must tend to the destruction of both. He put it to the consideration of the moderate reformers, whether the agitation of the question at this time might not be attended with the most serious consequences. Was our Constitution perfect? By no means: no human institutions could be perfect; but if the remedy extended to boundaries which we could not ascertain, we had better confine ourselves within the present limits. Much had been said, both now and on former occasions, as to suspending the Constitution of the country: but he was fully persuaded that that measure was necessary for protecting the liberties of the people. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.) With regard to the influence of the Crown, he denied that it had increased: on the contrary, it had been considerably abridged; and particularly by rendering the judges independent, by passing the Grenville Act, by excluding contractors from the House, and by preventing revenue officers from interfering at elections. There was not at present in that House one half of the number of persons holding offices that had seats about fifty years ago. There was no circumstance which to him seemed of greater weight in the prevention of an undue exercise of the influence of the Crown, than—if he were not disorderly in mentioning it,—the manner in which the debates of the two Houses of Parliament were given to the public. Nothing passed in either House which was not immediately published and circulated throughout the empire, and finally throughout Europe. No individual, or no body of individuals, could feel a just cause for complaint, without having the means of laying it on the table of the House. Did a Minister, or a Magistrate, unduly exercise the power entrusted to him? His conduct became the immediate subject of parliamentary discussion.—Nay, this was carried so far, that respectable persons were frequently deterred from undertaking duties of importance, lest they might be inadvertently betrayed into something which would subject them to the scrutiny of Parliament. With these views of the question, he was decidedly of opinion, that the introduction of any new measure would endanger the safety of the State. The Constitution of England had grown up out of a series of events, either fortuitous or providential, which had secured to us the admiration of all the world: it had enabled us to ride securely through all the storms, the perils, and the dangers of the last twenty-five years; and had at last conducted us, notwithstanding the pressure of temporary distresses, to the highest pitch of glory and prosperity.—Those, then, who should interfere with the Constitution at the present crisis, would involve the country in dangers and difficulties from which it might not be recovered.—(Here a loud coughing commenced, and was continued for some time.) The hon. member sat down, with giving his negative to the motion.

Lord Cochrane said, after the speech of the hon. baronet, the mover, and of the hon. seconder of the motion, it might appear presumption in him to offer any observations in elucidation of that which was very properly considered by the people, the most important question which could possibly engage the consideration of the House. The hon. gent., the Dean of Arches, who had just sat down, had shewn them how nearly one side of the House was balanced by the other; but he had forgotten to state to them, that neither the one party nor the other represented the people; and that the interests of the people were the only interests which were not regarded in it. He had stated that the proceedings of the House went out to the public, and that every man in the country was thus enabled to form an opinion on every measure which came before them; but he omitted to state, that the Constitution of the country no longer existed. (Cries of hear, hear, and order.) He had a right to say, that the Constitution no longer existed, while the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended. The honourable and learned gentleman had declared, that the people could not be more fairly represented if they got all that they wished, namely, a full, fair, and free representation. He had said, the commercial interest was represented; the agricultural interest was represented, and the manufacturing interest was represented; but he had forgotten to state, that an interest existed in that House, which was above all these interests—the interest of placemen, sinecurists, and pensioners. From the earliest ages of the world, men had always been found accessible to corruption. Were they in that House alone pure? (A laugh, and hear.) Were they alone exempted from the operation of that which had in all times influenced mankind, when in their power? Were they alone superior to every thing external? Did not they find that the patron of a borough directed the vote of him whom he returned to that House, and that the member took his side in the House accordingly; or, if he was ever found speaking on this side of the House, that he voted on the other. He had now had a seat in the House upwards of ten years, and he had found that uniformly the practice.—It was to get rid of this abuse that the people called aloud for Reform, and it was the bounden duty of the House to accede to the prayers of the people, and to consent to a Reform. But Reform they must have, whether they would or not; the time would soon come when they could not go on without it. The present state of the country was such, that it was impossible things could exist long under it. It was like a decayed carcase, the maggots ate it up. They were the maggots of the country—(A laugh!)—they were the locusts of the land—they were its destroyers. There was nothing wicked, which did not emanate from that House.—(A laugh!)—In it originated all knavery, wickedness, perjury, and fraud.—(Tumultuous cries of hear, hear! Order!)—They knew well all this, and they all knew that the means by which the great majority of the House were returned, was one great cause of the corruption of the whole country. It had been said, let the people reform themselves; but it was well known, that if sums of money were offered, there would always be found men ready to receive them. It was impossible to imagine that the profuse expenditure of the late war could have taken place, had it not been for that corrupt majority. At least, it would have had a shorter duration, from being carried on in a more effective manner, had it not been the interest of so many to prevent its speedy termination. Had not the glorious peace which we had obtained annihilated the commerce of the country? Were not vessels seen every where with brooms at their mast heads?—Were not the sailors starving? Was not agriculture languishing? Were not our manufacturers in the most distressed state? Some of the greatest landholders in the country were now in the House. He would appeal to them. Did not they know that they could scarcely collect any rents?—that they were merely the stewards of the Government; and that what they received they handed over to the tax-gatherer, to pay the interest of the funds? Did they not see this? And would they allow themselves to be in this manner really robbed of their estates, from an apprehension of Spenceans, and such fools and idiots? When the Committee, on whose Report the liberties of the country were suspended, was ballotted for, a list of names was put into the ballot box, written by the Treasury. Was not this a mockery and fraud on the public? What could be more base than to attempt such a fraud? And yet they had heard that the mock Committee was to be revived for the purpose of again suspending the Constitution? And for what? Because the Ministers were afraid that the expression of the public voice might arrest them in the progress of their delinquency. He was persuaded that no man wished the subversion of the Constitution; for no man would contend that the bribery and corruption practised in that House were the Constitution of the country. This bribery and corruption might be very convenient to corrupt Ministers. Indeed, the system precluded the possibility of having honest Ministers. Mr. Pitt said, that without a Reform in Parliament no Minister could be honest. He was persuaded, that no man in the country could be more honest and moral than the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), but it was not possible for him to be an honest Minister until measures were taken to purge and purify the House. If this were not done, it was vain to hope for a renewal of successful enterprise in this country. Commerce would never revive—the sun of the country was set. It might, indeed, subsist as a petty military German State, with horsemen parading up and down with long whisks and large sabres ringing on their horses' backs, and with fantastically shaped caps of fantastical colours on their heads; but that this country should be a great power again was quite impossible. Before they called on the people of the country to reform themselves, it was necessary that every man should take the mote out of his own eye.—(Hear, hear!) He was glad to hear the Lords of the Admiralty cheering him on this occasion; they had particular reasons for being aware of the force of his observations. The hon. Dean of Arches had instanced Juries as one of the benefits of the Constitution. With respect to the manner in which Juries were chosen under the present system, he was sure that justice was much better administered—and in a more summary manner—with less expense—and no chicanery—by the Dey of Algiers.—(Loud laughing.) He was satisfied; that the present system of bribery and corruption was more detrimental to the country than a despotism, which he hoped the noble lord would have the goodness to favour them to let us have at once a downright open despotism. (Hear, hear.) Nothing had been said by the hon. the Dean of Arches against the motion of his hon. friend. His hon. friend had argued the question generally, and it was complained that nothing specific was brought forward; but had any specific measure been offered, it would have been said it was not the best plan—every one would have started forward with his own plan. The House ought not to refuse to have this important subject investigated in a committee—they always consented to committees when the object was to destroy, at least pro tempore, the Constitution of the country. There could be no hope that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus would ever be taken off, at least while the present financial system was continued. To that system he was convinced we owed all our evils—it would be the total extinction of our commerce, navigation, and manufactures. He was convinced, that so long as the Funding System continued, there would be no employment for the lower orders of the people. It was idle to talk of employing them in making roads and canals, and in digging holes one day to be filled up the next. Unless commerce revived there would be no use in having more canals. And as to making and filling up holes, it might be justified as continuing the people in habits of industry; but if there was no prospect of an improvement in the situation of the country, there could be no use in their continuing in the possession of those habits.

Mr. Curwen said, he had wished to have caught the eye of the Speaker sooner, but had he viewed the situation of the country in the same light as the noble lord who had just sat down, he certainly should not have been so anxious to rise. It was because he believed the country possessed the means of recovering from the present difficulties, that he was anxious to see those abuses removed which retarded its prosperity. With respect to the question now before the House, he was anxious, before he delivered his opinions, to set an hon. gentleman opposite (Sir J. Nichol) right upon one point. He had stated, that a motion was made in the Society of the Friends of the People, for the expulsion of an individual, whom he had called the great apostle of the reformers, in consequence of his having carried on a correspondence with the Jacobins of France. It could not be denied that such a motion was made, but the gentleman in question, (Major Cartwright) was not accused of having held such correspondence. He (Mr. C.) had been long of opinion, that a Reform of that House was highly expedient. The reason of enacting the late unconstitutional measures was obvious enough. They had been compelled to abridge the liberties of the people, because they did not possess their confidence. Had the House ever properly inquired into the expenditure of any war? This they had always avoided; and it was this disposition to leave the public purse at the mercy of the Ministers of the day of which he complained. In the present session examples had been given of that undue confidence. They had voted very improperly a great war expenditure; and while such things were done, was it surprising that they had lost the respect of the country? The wish for Reform was general, and he thought it would be wise, as a measure of policy, to give the people some farther degree of political power, not only to induce them to bear the present burdens, but those future difficulties which awaited them. They must appeal to the people again, for they must have more money, and with what face could they apply to them, after the prodigal manner in which they had heretofore executed their trust? Could it be forgotten that an act had been passed, the preamble of which recognized that seats had been sold in that House? The learned gentleman had asked whether a Reform would send other members to Parliament. He did not know that it would alter the individuals who composed that House: but of this he was certain, that if they should be the same men, they would be governed by different motives. He would ask whether there had ever been a time in which the people of England bore their distress with greater fortitude? There had only been some trifling instances of irregularity or violence. With regard to the unfortunate persons accused of treason, they were so poor and destitute of any thing like influence, that their situation was calculated to excite no feeling but that of pity. The majority of the people were attached to the Constitution: but though the country was sound, it was perfectly sensible to abuses: and a constant resistance to Reform was not the best mode of preserving its affection. The example of France had been, as it frequently was on occasions like the present, referred to; but he wished that those who were so fond of directing the attention of the House to that subject, would consider what had been the cause of the French Revolution. In his opinion, it was solely resistance to a timely and prudent Reform. On these grounds he should support the motion of the hon. baronet, and he thought, that the temperate manner in which he had introduced it, ought to recommend it to the House. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. J. W. Ward said, he could not disguise from himself that this question had now assumed a more serious appearance than it had borne on former discussions in that House; and there was reason to apprehend that it might, by frequent repetition, be ultimately carried, unless it were vigorously resisted by those who, like him, perceived the mischievous consequences which would result from it. He acquitted the gentlemen opposite of any evil intention; but he confessed that, whenever he heard a motion for Reform proposed, it always struck his mind in the same way as if he heard a motion for democracy, revolution, and the total subversion of that Constitution and order of things which had raised this country to a pitch of glory and prosperity unknown in the annals of the world. He allowed that the petitions for Reform were numerously signed, but they came under circumstances which ought to render the House little disposed to grant their prayers. The arguments of those who wished to introduce a change, addressed themselves more readily to the understanding, than those which tended to support the Constitution. When men were told they had a right to any thing, it was easy to gain a hearing from them. It was easy to tell a man that he was not represented; but to explain the nature of virtual representation was a task which would be undertaken in vain, in the presence of an irritated and ignorant populace. The petitions proved the existence of two things which certainly could not be cured by Reform—namely, ignorance, and distress. He not only did not think that the number of the petitions which had been addressed to the House was any proof of a desire for Reform, but that they ought, on that account, to cling more closely to the existing form of the Constitution. Two or three years ago nothing was heard of Parliamentary Reform; and if commerce were to revive speedily, he was confident the House would be little troubled with petitions on that subject. Notwithstanding all that had been said on the subject of Annual Parliaments, he believed that all that could be proved from history was, that there had been annual meetings, not annual elections. But what kind of Parliament and Government did these radical Reformers propose to give us? They said, that the King was to retain all his prerogatives, and the Lords their privileges; nothing was to be altered but the House of Commons. The splendid statue of gold was to have earthen feet, which might be broken at will. Every thing, then, was to be right; there would be no taxes, no tyranny, no orators, no heroes, no Pitts, and no Nelsons. It was pretended that a House of Commons formed by radical Reformers could exist with an hereditary monarchy and nobility. So long, indeed, as the King and Lords went along with the popular voice, they would be endured by their inferior masters, but the first popular bill which might be rejected would be the signal for the downfall of the monarchy. Demagogues would then take credit to themselves for the sort of pious fraud by which they had prepared this change. It ought to be recollected, that the National Convention of France was called together on the very principles of the radical Reformers in this country. He did not think it possible that any English assembly could ever be guilty of such iniquities as that Convention; but it was worthy of remark, that a body of men who had committed the most atrocious acts the world ever witnessed were brought together by Universal Suffrage. With regard to radical Reformers, he had a book in his hand which served to illustrate their views. He had not yet read it (a laugh), but it was written by the celebrated, the justly celebrated Mr. Jeremy Bentham, who was the author of many excellent works. In his introduction, he described the excellence of the British Constitution to consist, not in equality, but in the ascendancy of democracy. He did not mean to speak with any disrespect of Mr. Bentham, and he only quoted this to shew what was the opinion of a very able man, who was himself a radical Reformer. There were, he believed, very few radical Reformers in that House, and very few moderate Reformers out of it. The people out of that House were divided into two classes. A majority in numbers, and a great majority of the property of the country, was for the Constitution as it is. (Hear, hear.) Another very considerable party was for going all lengths in what was called radical Reform, and establishing a democracy under the forms of a monarchy. Not to repair but to pull down was their object; the only real friends of moderate Reform were in that House. To shew the notions of radical Reformers, he might merely quote some of the titles which Mr. Bentham gave to his chapters, such as "Honourable House incorrigible"—"Moderate Reform inadequate." In describing the classes of persons who, Mr. Bentham thought, must be against Reform, he says, "It must be the work of the Tories to make that portion of the public money spent in waste and corruption as large as possible, (Hear, hear, from the Opposition,) and of the Whigs likewise." (Loud laughter.) Mr. Bentham had a language of his own; but, to use a favourite term of the author, "it approximated" to ordinary language, and therefore the House could understand him. He said, that public welfare "under moderate Reform would be minimized, under radical Reform would be maximized." With regard to the influence of the Crown, it was obvious that a large establishment in the course of diminution was less favourable than a small one in the course of increase; but moderate Reform would not diminish the influence of the Crown. Radical Reform, he admitted, would diminish that influence, by cutting it down altogether. If the number of electors were increased, applications for favours to Ministers would not be diminished; for members asked little for themselves, compared with what they asked for their constituents. But after moderate Reform should be granted, the next motion would be for radical Reform. Moderate Reform would only be the sharp point of the wedge which, once insinuated, would serve to split the oak. What was called the borough system he regarded as an essential part of the Constitution; and he would as soon part with the representation for Yorkshire as with that of Old Sarum. In looking at the effects of popularity, it should be recollected that Mr. Fox was obliged to be returned for a northern borough of Scotland, for the ultima Thule. The case of Mr. Windham might be noticed, and that of a living nobleman, for whom he had a high respect (Earl Grey.) Such circumstan-

ers went a great way to mend the existing system. In what was called a reformed Parliament, only two classes would get admittance—those who had great local influence, and those who contrived to please the people. A constant system of canvassing was not best calculated to promote the objects of legislation. Many of those who had risen to usefulness and distinction could not have done so, by merely trying to obtain influence in particular places. No country existed in the world wherein talents of all sorts, and particularly public talents, could rise so early, and by such honourable means, as in England. Some persons drew unfavourable pictures of the representation, but these furnished no real arguments for alterations. They proved no necessity of Reform. The circumstances of our ancestors did not apply to our situation, coupled as it was with our various foreign connections. We were not in the ancient state of natural tranquillity. We had witnessed the long continued and awful convulsions of the political and moral world, which had forced its new principles on the public mind, and which took away almost, in the passing dangers, the memory of past events. Such were the effects of the French revolution, which operated so strongly on the mind of Europe, and put our Constitution upon its trial; but it proved itself alone to be adapted to varying circumstances. England and her Constitution were alone victorious, for she had never drunk the cup of bitterness to the dregs. She had known no day of humiliation or disgrace, one that she could wish to be blotted out of her annals, or one which could impair or tarnish the bright inheritance which had been bequeathed to her from early ages. She had maintained her glory by the valour of her armies, by the courage and skill of her navies, by the conduct of her sovereigns, by the policy of her Ministers, and by the wisdom and patriotism of her Parliaments. (Hear.) He was quite ready to allow that the existing distresses were great. Members of that House might be, in a great degree, exempt from them; yet it did not follow that they should support corruption. There was a great distinction to be made as to the causes of public sufferings, between what were occasioned by the errors or crimes of a Government, and by the inevitable operations of Providence. The petitioners represented taxation as the cause of distress; but that could not be the only cause. At all events, how could the Parliamentary Reform proposed have prevented it? The whole of the argument on that part of the subject was this—that we should have had two things—we should have adopted a different system of policy, and such policy would have been successful. Now there never was a war which was more a war of the people than the last, whether it was right or wrong; and that even to the end of it. There was certainly at one time, from the force of circumstances, a hesitation; but was that affected by a corrupt Parliament? No. We made peace, which appeared afterwards more in the light of a hollow truce; and then we were forced to make war again by our enemy, and once more to unfurl the standard of resistance. (Hear, hear.) The hon. baronet, he believed, had spoken of the war as a war of jobbers. If he (Mr. Ward) were a jobber, he should accept the compliment. It reminded him of a person in Roman story, who was charged with being concerned in the assassination of Julius Cæsar. He said he was not, but he had no objection to its being believed that he was. It was the foresight, and devotion, and magnanimity of the Legislature that had crowned the people of England with honour and glory in the conclusion of the late great and arduous contest. The systems of republican and revolutionary France were ever varying. Fraternization and equality of rights and all sorts of specious notions, were held out; and the history of them was explained amply in the condition of degraded Switzerland, of neutral Prussia, of enslaved and oppressed Holland, and of obedient Spain. (Hear.) It was only by English efforts, and under English auspices, that the nations recovered their independence and honour. Arguments for Reform were drawn from the experience of 25 years, which were some of the most glorious in our annals; but the English people at large would not pass this censure on those proceedings. They would not wish that no triumphs had been gained, or regret that they had not followed the low and mistaken policy of other nations who had suffered under the lash of their jacobin task-masters. They were not to be easily made ashamed of the victories and triumphs which they had so gloriously obtained. If the case were different, he might be disposed to agree to a proposition, under auspices which tended to what he thought at present the subversion and destruction of the Constitution. But would England feel this, after her experience of the wisdom of her councils, and the valour of her warriors? Some might lament that England did not bow to republican or imperial France, and they might regret the fall of a despot. Some persons were avowed enemies to all sorts of innovation, and would therefore object to this motion. Some again were disposed to pull down the whole fabric of the Constitution. He acquitted them, and he hoped they would acquit him, of the charge of being against all innovations. He opposed the Reform, because he found no reasonable chance of remedy proposed. If he lived under a despotic Government, like those of many European States, (he should not particularize any), he should object to arguments against innovation. He might in such countries be told, that he was friendly to dangerous experiments; but if he looked to the reign of Philip II. or any other despot, he should think that such despotism was worse than any other experiment, and more degrading to humanity. (Hear.) The people placed in such situations ought to make every effort to gain valuable objects. The prize to be obtained was great, and could only be won by arduous labours and struggles. Our Constitution, planted by our ancestors, had been cultivated by their exertions and their blood; and our liberties existed, and we retained an organ of legislation, that had never failed in its intended purposes. We were the first in the race of freedom, and could look back with satisfaction, pride, and delight at those things which others might look forward to with apprehension and terror. (Hear.) To maintain that we were not now free was a libel on our ancestors, who paid the price of our liberty with their patriotism, and the shedding of their blood, and who had transmitted that freedom to us, their successors. (Hear.)

Sir S. Romilly said, it was evident from the eloquent and elaborate speech of the hon. gentleman, that he had expected the debate would have taken a different course. (Hear, hear.) As to his remarks upon the war, the speeches of that day were the best answer that could be given to them, and his quotations from the book, which was written by a man of great ability and spotless integrity, were unfairly levelled against the advocates of Reform in that House. For his own part he sincerely lamented, as a friend, that Mr. Bentham should ever have published such a work. His hon. friend had thrown out reflections against the whigs and tories, which no man was more qualified to do, having at one time supported the whigs against the tories, and being now an advocate of the tories against the whigs. (Hear.) He would give his vote for the motion of the hon. Baronet, because it was merely for a Committee to inquire into the present state of the representation, without pledging them to adopt any specific regulations. He would do so upon the grounds that there existed the strongest necessity for inquiry, and he was also satisfied that a Reform ought to be the result of that inquiry. At the same time he should be ashamed not to say, that he was not a friend to Universal Suffrage, Annual Parliaments, or the other visionary benefits supposed by some to be the symbols of a true return to the ancient system and scale of the Constitution. Upon such subjects his mind had been long made up. One of the strongest impressions he had ever received, was from the lips of Mr. Pitt, who having in his early life, with all the ardour of youth, applied himself to a knowledge of the Constitution of England, insisted upon the necessity of Reform. The ability and sincerity with which his arguments were supported, had raised the character of that statesman to the elevated rank which it attained. In this stage of his life there was, indeed, much to admire. The conduct which he afterwards adopted had not confirmed the opinion at that period so generally entertained of him. As he advanced in life, the system of his politics changed; but the change had not altered the impression made by his efforts in the cause of Reform. At least they had not produced any effect upon his (Sir S. Romilly's) mind, who, the older he grew, saw with a keener eye the increasing necessity for a very material change in the representation of the people in that House. His vote was the more cordial, as that necessity was at the present moment stronger than at any former time. Never was the sense of the people so decidedly in favour of the measure, as might be ascertained from the hundreds of petitions presented from all parts, upon a subject in which their interests were so vitally concerned; and though some of them might speak of radical Reform, yet there were many others, such as that of the City of London, which called their attention, not to annual, but to triennial Parliaments. (Hear, hear.) The hon. gentleman had stated, that there never was a man in Parliament who was a friend to Universal Suffrage. What danger then did he apprehend from the appointment of a Committee? What possible injury could result from throwing a few rotten boroughs into the popular scale? (Hear.) Even if the Committee should go no further than to remove two or three of those eyesores to the Constitution, an object would be gained, and the people would see that their united prayers were no longer disregarded; that they were considered as having some concern in the Government under which they lived; and that when the whole nation spoke, the House shewed some sensibility at the call. (Hear.) By lopping off some of the rotten boroughs, the greatest advantages would be felt. How often did it happen, that a question was maintained with exact equality on both sides of the House, until three or four rotten boroughs sent their members to decide it against the interests of the people? But the hon. gentleman had advised them to beware of the French revolution. Could any one, who contemplated for a moment the principles of the Constitution—her sometimes gradual and sometimes violent departure from her natural strength, could any one, with the history of the country and of the nations of the Continent before his eyes, for an instant, conceive any thing so monstrous as that the application of such a remedy as Reform to her degenerate condition, would produce revolution? (Hear.) The fact was, the hon. gentleman's caution would be best applied to himself. It should be his care to beware of the French revolution. (Hear, hear.) It should be remembered, that that event had not been accelerated by granting Reform; on the contrary, it was by refusing all Reform, that the evils of the revolution arrived at such a head as to burst upon that nation with accumulated terrors. (Hear.) And yet the hon. gent., who was perfectly aware of this fact, had recommended the House to pursue a similar course; and asserted that a timely acquiescence with the desires of the people was more dangerous than obstinate resistance to their demands. He had spoken of the blessed

ings we at present enjoyed, as a proof that we ought not to attempt to effect any change. But what were those blessings? a ruined trade, a starving population, insupportable taxes. (Hear, hear.) But even these blessings were not deemed sufficient. It was found necessary to add that of suspending the Constitution, in order to complete the picture of the national prosperity. (Hear, hear.) So that the loss of the trial by jury was to be considered the great end of the efforts of the friends of the Constitution. The hon. gentleman admitted, that the petitions for Reform were numerously signed, but had drawn a distinction between that mode of seeking redress and the public voice. In cases of this kind, how admirably the hon. gentleman applied objections to his own advantage! Whenever it was his interest to speak of petitions, as calculated to influence any question, he never failed to use those arguments which were unanswerable; but when petitions were in opposition to his favourite feelings, the voice of the people was the word with which he attacked this constitutional right. He could, for instance, make the cry of "No Popery!" answer his purposes. (Hear, hear.) But the House had been told that, notwithstanding the voice of the people was in favour of Reform, the inquiry ought not to be granted. Should it not be recollected that the people had petitioned the Regent to assemble Parliament, from a persuasion that their grievances were capable of being redressed by the Legislature alone? And under such circumstances was the House to be deaf to their entreaties, which proceeded, not as had been stated, from the influence of interested persons, but from the general distress of the country? The people, aware of the sentiments of many eminent men, particularly of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox, naturally looked to reform as a remedy. As to Mr. Pitt, it was a calumny to assert that he retracted the opinions of his early life, and atoned for the errors into which he had been hurried by the ardour of youth, by a recantation of his politics. The public well understood the nature of a change dictated by interest. They knew what a person meant by abandoning the line of conduct, adopted at an early age, upon fixing himself in a place. They were not to be deluded by the story of the operation of years, in rendering opinions that were notoriously founded upon sound constitutional principles alterable upon the ground of a matured understanding. (Hear, hear.) But the hon. gentleman had also slandered the Constitution, which was not of such a tender nature as to mortify upon receiving a scratch, or to fall to pieces upon the destruction of a few rotten boroughs—injuries which it was represented as incapable of sustaining. The Constitution was much more robust; it had stood many shocks. What could be a greater change in the Constitution than the Irish Union, which, indeed, might be called a violent convulsion?—

What did it suffer from the inroad of the Septennial Act? To Annual Parliaments, he could by no means, and under no circumstances, agree; but the Septennial Act was fraught with such pernicious evils, that the substitution of any other measure would be preferable. The repeal of that Act would, indeed, cause a change in the present system that would soon produce most enviable advantages to the nation, and a proposal for that change would, he trusted, be soon brought forward by the hon. Baronet, or some other who was qualified to make a deep impression upon the House and the Country. Was it not true that members always acted differently (those he meant who acted palpably for their own interest to the exclusion of every thing else) at the commencement of a Parliament from what they did as it approached its termination? Would the odious Property Tax have been repealed in a first or second session?—(Hear, hear, and cries of "Yes.")—The petitions of the people would not be mentioned as the cause of the repeal. If they produced that effect, why did they not succeed upon the Corn Laws, or upon the expedition to Walcheren? But it was also said, that the people were always considered in the formation of the taxes. They certainly were in one way, but was it with a view to their interests? If it was answered in the affirmative, what could the hon. gentleman say to the Salt Duties? Did he believe, that if the people were fairly represented in that house, those duties would still be continued? (Hear, hear.) He (Sir S. R.) had no fanciful notions about Reform, nor any eager desire for popularity: he wished to see something effected for the public advantage. He would mention one point, in which he differed very materially from the hon. Baronet (Sir F. Burdett), namely, that the borough-monger system was calculated to destroy the influence of the Crown. So far from operating in that manner, the Crown looked to it as a corrupt support, by which its patronage might be extended. It was true, many boroughs were purchased by honourable men, who were anxious to return persons of talent and integrity, but they were generally made use of for the most corrupt purposes, and their annihilation should form the groundwork of a Reform in the representation of the people. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lamb said, he wished to offer a few words upon a question which had not been of frequent occurrence, and which he trusted would not soon be again brought under the notice of Parliament. An hon. gentleman (Mr. Brand) had referred to the authority of Mr. Burke in support of the motion. Certainly, at one time of his life, that great man had entertained those opinions; but it was equally certain, that at the close of the American war he had distinctly declared, that the House of Commons fairly represented the people, and was fully competent to the discharge of all its duties. Although it might be allowed that some imperfections had crept into the Constitution, it did not follow that a Committee ought to be appointed to remedy them; and was it no argument against Reform, that of the wise and learned men who had at different times advocated the cause, none had yet agreed upon any distinct and feasible plan? If he felt in favour of communicating the right of voting to copyholders, or of remedying the abuses with regard to out-voters, he could not consent to a Committee generally, merely for the consideration of those questions, without misleading and deluding the people, and taking credit for a popularity which he did not deserve. Much had been said regarding the petitions with which the table had been crowded; but who could imagine that they contained the sense of the people, when the manner in which they were obtained was considered; namely, by pilgrimages made by zealous devotees to the shrine of popular applause. He did not forget the measures which the House had unwillingly, but unavoidably, adopted; but no man of understanding would argue that they were proofs of the necessity of Reform, from which no benefit, but great evils, might proceed. Those who thought as he did, that things were best as they are, required, before they consented to a change, that the course which they were asked to pursue should be clearly defined. In attempting to do this, the hon. baronet (Sir F. Biddell) had referred to history: he had noticed the time of the Anglo-Saxons, of the Normans, and of the English Parliaments which began with Henry III. and continued till the reign of Henry VIII.; he had complained, that the late wars had sprung from ambition and the desire of aggrandizement; but he had forgotten those of Edward III. and Henry V. to whose times he had drawn the attention of the House, and had neglected, among his precedents, the civil dissensions of Richard II.—The hon. member then entered into an inquiry, how far, in early times, Parliaments had been subject to the influence of the nobles, quoting passages from various public documents, from the reign of Queen Mary to that of George I. and insisting that there was sufficient evidence to shew, that even in the good old times, at least as many undue practices, with regard to the election of members, prevailed as at the present moment. He called the attention of the House to the petition presented by Earl Grey in 1793, inserted in the Appendix to a pamphlet recently published by Mr. Evans, controverting particularly its arguments against the complicated rights of voters, and the influence used by noblemen in county elections. He insisted that the power obtained over freeholders, by a faithful discharge of public duties, and a strict attention to private interests, was beneficial to the people themselves, and led to the nomination of the most able, upright, and virtuous men. He then enumerated various distinguished persons who, having come into Parliament for small boroughs, had attained high and deserved popularity, and had afterwards represented numerous bodies of constituents; among these was the hon. baronet himself, who, having first sat for Boroughbridge, had displayed such talent and fidelity as to lead to his contest for Middlesex, and his seat for Westminster.

Mr. Tierney said, he had often heard this question discussed, and he had early stated his own sentiments upon it; from that time to the present, he had never altered his opinion as to the expediency of a Reform. He had come down that night intending to give a silent vote in favour of a motion which pledged the House to no plan, and only required that the subject should be investigated and the principle recognized. Having when young supported the cause, he was now happy, at an advanced period of life, to be found in the rank where he had first enlisted. No man could look back five and twenty years without perceiving that his feelings and opinions had undergone some alteration. He must have been a wise man, indeed, who could say with truth, that he foresaw all the events that had within that period occurred, and had been prepared for the consequences. Five and twenty years had elapsed since the date of the petition, to which reference had been made; but without having recently read more of it than parts he had seen extracted, he could venture to say, that he still concurred in it in the main—he might, perhaps, even go so far as to declare, that he abided by it in the whole. Without vanity he might say, that he thought highly of that petition, because, in point of fact, it was not his production, as had been supposed; it was the work of a Committee, of which, it was true, he had been one of the most active members; it was a compound of the talents and knowledge of a number of individuals; and in this respect, though in no other, it bore a strong resemblance to the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ward), which, from the style of its eloquence, and the nature of its arguments, betrayed its origin to be in a sort of Committee, formed by the leading members of the Ministerial Bench. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) In 1793, as at the present moment, the same State phrases were used, of “let well alone,” and “things are just as they should be;” and it was thought that the best mode of beginning a Reform was to point out the irregularities (to call them by no harder name) that had crept into the representation, to shew that the people were not fairly represented; for how could they be fairly represented, when it was undeniable that the majority of the House was returned by an insignificant minority of the people of England? He could say positively from recollection, that greater pains could not have been taken to state the facts correctly in the petition, although an hon. gentleman (Mr. Lamb) had objected to some parts of it. First, he had asserted, that the variety of rights of voting was a great benefit; but the petition did not complain that different interests, landed or mercantile, were represented; but that the numerous distinctions and modifications in the right of voting had been the occasion of great confusion and litigation. Another direct attack upon the petition was, that it complained that noblemen used their influence at elections; and the hon. gentleman had asked, if it would not be monstrous to abolish that honourable influence which was obtained by the good conduct and good offices of a nobleman towards the electors of his neighbourhood? Upon this point the petition might answer for itself, for it contained this sentence—"Your petitioners entreat your hon. House to believe, that in complaining of this species of influence, it is not their intention or desire to decry or condemn that just and natural attachment which they who are enabled by their fortune, and inclined by their disposition, to apply great means to honourable and benevolent ends, will always ensure to themselves." It was clear, therefore, that this last complaint was unfounded, and the hon. member needed not thus to have gone out of his way gratuitously to cast imputations. Those who resisted the motion, and particularly the hon. member over the way (Mr. Ward), had maintained that all things were in so happy a state, that it was impossible to improve them; not a tittle could be altered for the better—time had made no inroads that required repair; the Constitution was at present, and always would continue to be, an imperishable model of perfection for the world to wonder at; and that the representation of Old Sarum was just as good as that of the county of York. (Hear, hear.) This was certainly all very pleasant, and came most appropriately from an hon. gentleman who, having been kicked out of the county of Worcester, had slipped into a close borough, and there taken shelter from his pursuers. (Continued cheers and laughter.) Whether that part of his speech had been dictated by the Ministerial Committee to which he had before alluded, was not so clear: it did not appear very consistent with the conduct of a right hon. gentleman, (Mr. Canning) who no doubt was a member of it, and who, having long sat for a close borough, had abandoned it at last, and successfully stood a candidate for the populous town of Liverpool. At least one of the Ministers, therefore, could be no very strong friend to the corrupted system. (Hear, hear.) Would he not, on the contrary, avow, that he now felt he stood higher in the rank of representatives than when he occupied a seat for a paltry borough of a few servile electors? The hon. member who spoke last had produced an Act of William and Mary, the object of which was to prevent the Warden of the Cinque-Ports from nominating seven members as he had done; yet he was a warm advocate for things as they are; and had he lived in the days when that measure was brought forward, would he not have denounced it as an innovation—as an infringement upon the rights of one of the most ancient offices known to the country, and an encroachment upon the revered and hallowed Constitution, as by law established? (Hear, hear.) Yet was it not notorious, that the very abuse which that act was intended to remedy, at this moment existed in a degree as flagrant as ever; and was it not the duty of the House to pass a new act to enforce that which had been so grossly evaded? If the Committee were appointed, he (Mr. Tierney) would undertake to prove that the Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports still procured the return of seven representatives. In the course of the debate, the House had heard of nothing but rights; the rights of members of parliament; the rights of close boroughs; and the rights of those who were in the possession of the good things of this world, to keep them as long as they could. In short, every sort of rights had been talked about, but the most important of all—the right to amend. (Continued cheers.) His hon. friend objected, that certain places would be shut up by which men of talent could be introduced into the House. This might be true, but a known evil ought not to continue merely that good might come out of it. There was another class of rotten boroughs of a different description, and to the alteration of which no reasonable objection could be made. He alluded to those boroughs, the voters of which consisted of from 70 or 80 persons, up to 170 or 200. They sent to the Treasury what they called blank bugesses, and were chiefly in the hands of mercenary attorneys, who merely sought to make money by their traffic in them. When a member was to be brought into Parliament, they never inquired whether he was a man of talent and ability, likely to be an ornament to that House, and a benefit to the public: all they asked was, who was his banker? They did not care about his being a young and promising man; on the contrary, they would rather have him decrepid and old, because then there was a chance of his dying soon, and an opportunity of bargaining for another. (Hear, and a laugh.) Would any one presume to say that much good might not be effected by a change in that part of the system? What he wanted was, something that might remove the strong objections which existed against the present mode of returning members to that House. He had no hesitation in saying, that he had altered his opinion, in one respect, with regard to the question of Parliamentary Reform. He did not now think, as he once thought, that it would be desirable to recommend any sudden and sweeping alteration. The experiment, he was convinced, would be too dangerous, especially at the present moment. (Hear.) But great and salutary ameliorations might be made from time to time, if the House would only agree to go into a Committee for the purpose of inquiring into the matter. Even his hon. friend (Mr. Lamb) ought to agree to the motion for a Committee, because he had a proposition to make, which deserved attention. His hon. friend had said, that he should have no objection to extend the right of voting to copyholders as well as to freeholders. Let him bring forward that proposition in a Committee, and it should have his (Mr. Tierney's) support, if he happened to have the honour of being a member of it. In the same manner many other hon. members might suggest alterations, which, if equally moderate, it would be judicious to adopt. With respect to what were called close boroughs and towns, it would be very possible so to enlarge the right of voting, as to make that a real election, which was now only nominal, with the additional advantage, that candidates would not have to expend 20 or 30,000*l.* in order to obtain a seat. He had himself, on many occasions, brought under the consideration of the House, the heavy charges incurred in obtaining out-voters. Would there be any difficulty in so qualifying the exercise of that privilege as to make it less onerous to the candidates? There was another point of great importance, the short duration of Parliaments. He did not mean to go into any elaborate inquiry about what was the practice of our remote ancestors, nor to ascertain how those things were managed by the Picts, the Danes, or the Anglo-Saxons. (A laugh.) He owned he was deficient in research for such matters, and should not argue, therefore, whether it would be an innovation or a restoration. All he wanted was, honestly and conscientiously to endeavour to adapt the change of representation to the times in which we lived. If he saw the monied interest acquiring too great an ascendancy; if he saw the country gentleman, whose family had resided perhaps for years in a particular borough or town, outbid by some opulent adventurer, who had grown wealthy by a lucky speculation in the Stocks, or an opportune contract with Government, he was justified in wishing that a check should be put to that ascendancy. And where was the danger that could truly be apprehended from shortening the duration of Parliaments? Had any one, in fact, attempted to answer the assertion of his hon. and learned friend, an assertion, the truth of which every day's experience confirmed, that the members of that House were sure to conduct themselves with some respect towards their constituents, when they knew that the day of reckoning with them was near at hand? Would any one venture to say, if it were morally certain the present Parliament was to be dissolved in the course of the present year, more would not vote that night in favour of Parliamentary Reform, than would probably be found to vote for it? The influence, then, which a shorter duration of Parliament would have over the conduct of members would be very beneficial, because it would make them anxious to preserve and merit the esteem and respect of their constituents. It could not be denied that they had fallen greatly in the respect of the country. Aye, but said his hon. friend, only reflect upon the glorious issue of the war, and the splendid consequences of that policy which has been pursued for the last five and twenty years. All that is to be attributed to the House of Commons, which, by granting the means for carrying on the war, was, in fact, the real cause of its wonderful and triumphant termination; and yet you would quarrel with such a House of Commons, and wish to have it altered! Why, to be sure, that was a very ingenious and fascinating way of putting the argument. But suppose Buonaparte, during his career of glory, which was no very short one, had taken the other side of it—Suppose he had said to the French nation, I will give to you the name and outward form of a representative system; you shall have the shadow, but not the substance; you shall enjoy the symbol, but not the reality; and suppose he had then added, when at the height of his dominion and authority, there—you see what mighty effects you have produced; it is to you I owe all my glories; it is to you I am indebted for this conquest and subjugation of Europe, though you know you could not say nor do any thing but what I bade you.—(Hear, hear!)—That was precisely the logic of the hon. gentleman, who endeavoured to shew that our successes in the late contest were attributable to the free and independent functions of a House of Commons, which had always been, and notoriously continued to be, under the direction of Ministers. The fact was, however, and he was ready to prove it, that they might have carried on the war, if they had been in due awe of the people, at one-half of the expense.—(Hear, hear!)—Night after night he had sat there, endeavouring to impress that truth upon them, when they were voting away millions, without accurately and jealously inquiring whether it was necessary so to lavish them. Now, however, the country began to feel the effects of such improvidence, and was it wonderful that the people looked towards them as the authors of their sufferings and distresses? It was not the King, it was not the other House of Parliament that could justly be reproached. They were the guardians of the public purse, and if they had refused to open its strings, such calamitous consequences could not have ensued. In one part of England, the inhabitants had nothing to eat; in another, they had no work; go to a third, and there were no rents to receive. Did not those things clearly prove that there was something “Rotten in the State of Denmark?” And if so, ought not the part which was rotten to be probed, and a remedy applied? He wished for no vague and dangerous innovations. He was a determined enemy, as determined an enemy as any in that House, to Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage. But did it follow, because those theories were not adopted, nothing could be done to satisfy the people, by improving the Representation? Did it follow, if they went into a Committee, that they must do harm, and could not do any good? Would it be no satisfaction to a distressed and suffering country, to see the Legislature at least anxious and willing to take its grievances into consideration? Would it be no consolation, if they saw the House of Commons seriously and earnestly disposed to investigate the causes of their complaints, and willing to apply whatever remedy they were susceptible of receiving? He entreated the House not to be alarmed by any bugbears about a Reform which would endanger the Constitution. He would venture to say, they would not find any Committee of twenty-one members, who would agree to report upon the expediency and necessity of Annual Parliaments or Universal Suffrage.—(Hear, hear!)—But they would find many twenty-ones ready and willing to propose some alterations in the present system.—The right hon. gent. then alluded to the early opinions of Mr. Pitt, (under whom, he said, he first studied the principles of Parliamentary Reform,) and to his subsequent conduct. But he contended, that what that Minister had done at the Union between Ireland and England was, in one respect, well worthy of their consideration. He then had, what few reformers ever had, an opportunity of acting largely and wisely upon his own notions. There was a Parliament to be destroyed, and a Parliament to be created. The old Parliament, too, of Ireland, was reproached with many of those unceremonious epithets about corruption, selling of seats, &c. which were applied to the Parliament of Great Britain, but which he would not be so uncivil as to repeat. What did Mr. Pitt do? He provided, that out of the hundred representatives to be returned by Ireland, sixty-four should be county members. Was that no guide for them? Was that no polar star by which they might steer their course? Could they not do something of the same kind? Could they not destroy the close boroughs and towns, at least, and throw the votes open to the population of such places, which would be one great step towards attaining an efficient representation? All he contended for was, such a state of the representation, taken as a whole, as would prevent the county members, the county gentlemen of England, from being a minority in the House, which they were at present. His hon. friend (Mr. Ward) had begged gentlemen on his side to forgive some observations that dropped from him. He could assure his hon. friend that he was of a very placable disposition. His hon. friend once sat on that side of the House, and said many hard things against the other; if his new friends would as easily forgive him for his past offences to them, as he (Mr. T.) pardoned him whatever he had said that night, it would be all very well.—(Hear, hear!)—He had thus expressed his opinion upon the subject then before the House. When he rose, he promised them that he would not long occupy their attention, and he would conclude with adverting to only one more point. It had been the fate of Parliamentary Reform to suffer deeply from the madness and insolence of some of the advocates who had lately espoused its cause. They foolishly and presumptuously imagined that they could carry that great question exclusively of all persons of rank and influence in the country. He hoped their eyes were now opened to the mischief they had done, and that they would not in future attempt to generate a distrust of the conduct of those who were alone able effectually to serve them.—(Hear, hear, hear!)

Lord Milton rose, amidst cries of question, and said, that he had heard nothing which had shaken his opinions on this subject. No sufficient case had been made against the existing system; and he should not vote for any alteration. The question being again loudly called for, the gallery was cleared for a division.

While strangers were excluded, Mr. Brougham (who had not been in his place during the debate) rose, under evident marks of illness, and shortly addressed the House, to express his approbation of the motion, and his regret that he had been prevented from developing his opinion more in detail, by an indisposition, in consequence of which he had applied to have the question put off for a day, an arrangement which had been prevented by an accident. He observed, that he had felt extremely desirous of mentioning the grounds on which he supported the motion, because he stood pledged to declare his sentiments on the subject explicitly. He added, that he should be glad to see the question again brought forward in any shape which should give him the opportunity he desired: in the meantime he could only state, which he did most conscientiously, his unalterable adherence to his former opinions upon this very important question.

Mr. Plunkett said, that he felt much regret in having to differ on this occasion from those friends with whom he always acted. He could not, however, vote to go into a Committee, because he felt that already the people were virtually, truly, and fully represented; and after stating that it would only delude the people were they to be told that their distress was owing to the present mode of representation in Parliament, he concluded by saying, that notwithstanding his unwillingness to go into a Committee, he reserved to himself the right of voting in favour of such minor points as had been mentioned by Mr. Lamb, the lessening of expenses at elections, &c. whenever such subjects should be separately discussed.

The House then divided, and the numbers were—

Wednesday, May 21.

No public business of any importance occurred. Several bills were forwarded in their different stages without any discussion.

Lord Melville had leave to attend the Commons, to be examined before the Committee on Public Income and Expenditure, if he should think fit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, May 21.

POOR LAWS.] The message from the Lords, which was brought up yesterday, requesting the attendance of Mr. Hall, in order to his being examined before the Committee on the Poor

Laws, was further considered; and Mr. Hall being present, and having consented to attend their lordships, the House gave him leave to attend, if he should think fit.—On another message from the Lords, similar leave was given to Sir J. B. Riddell.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Brougham gave notice of his intention to move, on the 10th of June, for leave to bring in a bill for the repeal of the Septennial Act. (Loud cries of hear, on the Opposition benches.)

IRISH INSURRECTION ACT.] Mr. Peel moved for leave to bring in a bill "to continue an Act made in the 54th year of his present Majesty's reign, intituled, An Act to provide for the preserving and restoring of peace in such parts of Ireland as may at any time be disturbed by seditious persons, or by persons entering into unlawful combinations or conspiracies." This Act, he observed, was familiar to the House, and though passed as a general measure, was only intended for limited operation. It was unnecessary to discuss its general character: all that he felt it necessary to state was, that there were some districts in that country where the enforcement of the measure was demanded, by that protection which the State owed to the lives and property of the subject. He asked for the continuance of this confessedly rigorous act, for one year only, and was convinced that no objection could arise to the claim, from the manner in which it had been formerly exercised.—Leave being granted, the bill was brought in and read a first time.

INFORMERS.] Sir J. Mackintosh moved, "that there be laid before this House, Copies of all communications between his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, or either of the two Under Secretaries for that department, or any person acting under or employed by him or them, and one John Elliston Poole, touching the conduct of the said Poole in Informations against three persons named Parkinson, Fletcher, and Deacon, who were charged with certain offences before Edward Powis, Clerk, a Justice of Peace of the county of Stafford, on or about the 5th day of April last."—The hon. and learned gentleman said, that it was not his intention, in the few observations he should make, to advert to the conduct of Mr. Powis. That subject was about to be submitted to judicial consideration, and therefore he should abstain from any comment upon it. He begged to state, that he himself knew nothing of the parties, and that his motives in originating the motion arose from a communication he had received from a gentleman of high honour and undoubted veracity. It appeared, that early in the month of April last, Poole had been actively engaged in procuring information against the three persons before named; and that his zeal had carried him beyond the bounds of law or prudence. When his conduct had excited public notice, when the legality of his proceedings became generally questioned, and he found that he had exposed himself to untoward consequences, he took alarm, and entered into correspondence with the Home Department. Either he himself, or some person acting for him, had procured a letter from that department, which he considered as a security for his past conduct, and exhibited as an assurance of protection against any penalties. No doubt, a most mischievous impression must have gone abroad in that neighbourhood, on hearing that the King's Minister, instead of aiding in the enforcement of the law, had declared his intention of protecting a man who had violated it. The House would feel, that at a time when it was called upon to renew the granting of extraordinary powers to the Ministers of the Crown, it became its duty in a tenfold degree to increase its constitutional vigilance over the prosecution of State offences. The occurrences to which he had alluded were manifestly attributable to the Circular to the Magistracy, which he had no doubt was issued with the purest intentions. But it was the natural tendency of all such extraordinary interferences on the part of authority to exasperate the passions of the favoured, and therefore the triumphant party; they taught the people to believe, that an action changed its character as it changed its side; and that immoralities became meritorious by being enlisted on a right side, and performed in a right cause. (Hear, hear.) Not only were the common people liable to this error, but men of education, and even magistrates. He would not then enter into the Circular, but he would say, that whether it contained legal doctrine or not, it had given powers which were before unknown, or not enforced; and had goaded on to the exercise of rigour those who would otherwise have been beneficially inactive. He hoped that the circumstances connected with this subject would be fully explained, and added, that a satisfactory statement would afford him great pleasure.

Mr. H. Addington said, that in the beginning of April last, a letter had been received from a person of the name of Poole, (who was employed under the Commissioners of Hawkers and Pedlars,) at the Secretary of State's office for the Home department. A common answer of acknowledgment, according to a set form in the office, was returned under the signature of Mr. Becket. Two other letters passed, and on the 21st of April another was received, which remained unanswered. With respect to the contents of the answers, he should have no objection to have them read at Charing-cross. But the hon. and learned gentleman must know, that as a prosecution was pending, an improper and unseasonable publication of the letters might prejudice the parties one way or other. No letter had been written by the noble Secretary of State, or under his direction, either to Poole, or to Mr. Powis. The lord lieutenant of the county of Stafford (Earl Talbot) had called for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of his noble relation on certain queries transmitted by Mr. Powis; but his noble relation answered, that it was not his province to put constructions on Acts of Parliament (hear, hear). Nor indeed, in reference to other applications from magistrates, did the noble viscount feel it to be his duty to give any opinion on publications which they might consider seditious or blasphemous. They were told, that in all such cases they must act on their own responsibility. The present motion implied charges against Government which should have been made out by a strong prima facie case; but the hon. and learned gentleman had not made out such a case, and, therefore, he should object to the motion.

Sir S. Romilly could not see in what manner the production of the correspondence could affect the prosecution in the Court of King's Bench; he should therefore support the motion.

Sir J. Mackintosh said, the right honourable gentleman had admitted that a correspondence existed, and he, in moving for its production, had not intended to make it matter of charge against any one, but merely to institute an inquiry into it. It was impossible to see in what manner it could influence any law proceedings. The House might deal with his motion as they pleased, but he could not consent to withdraw it.

Sir W. Burroughs wished to know whether Poole had been told that he would be protected by Government?

Mr. B. Bathurst said, this question was irregular, and no answer could be given to it. The correspondence could not be produced, because the Magistrate, by acting on the authority of the informer, had made himself equally responsible, and therefore the case of both was the same.

The House then divided.

For the motion 19—Against it 47—Majority 34.

CATHOLICS.] Mr. Blake moved, that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, "with a view to explain and amend the law in Ireland, so as to remove certain disabilities, and to restore the right of admission to their Freedom of Corporations in Ireland, to such Roman Catholics and others as would, if they had been seven years Protestants, have an inchoate right to such admission."—The hon. member said, his object was merely to give effect to the intentions of the Irish Legislature, which had been frustrated from the ambiguous manner in which the act of 1793 was worded.

Lord Castlereagh suggested that it would be better, if the hon. member were to bring forward some specific proposition, in the shape of a bill, rather than to move for a previous Committee.

The Speaker observed, that it was competent for the hon. member to move for a Committee, if he had a distinct object to propound. If not, it would be useless to go into one.

Mr. Blake said, he was not then prepared to submit any specific proposition, and should therefore beg leave to withdraw the motion.

POOR EMPLOYMENT BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the House should go into a Committee on this bill.

Lord Milton expressed his doubts as to the probable efficacy of the measure in affording any substantial relief, particularly in populous places like Manchester and Sheffield, where the distress was greatest, and the habits of the unemployed least adapted to the labour incident to the execution of public works. That part of the bill which contemplated the re-payment of the money borrowed on the security of parish funds within the term of three years, he regarded as perfectly nugatory.

Mr. L. Wellesley felt considerable objections in common, he believed, with all other landed proprietors, to the general principle of the Executive Government advancing the public money on private security. If not an unconstitutional it was at least a dangerous practice. He was at the same time satisfied that the measure under consideration would be perfectly useless. There was sufficient capital already in the country for carrying on every profitable and useful public undertaking. The only permanent benefit that could, in his opinion, be conferred upon the labouring poor must arise from an attentive examination of the effects of the poor laws upon their condition, and the adoption of some gradual system that might operate to restore their original principle, and rescue the lower orders from their present degradation of moral feeling.

Mr. W. Smith said, there were two objects that ought to be kept in view: the one, such means of extending immediate relief; the other, the adoption of a better system of legislation on this subject for the future. However doubtful he might be with regard to the extent of benefit which was likely to result from the operation of this measure, he believed it had been dictated by a humane intention to ameliorate the situation of the poorer classes. In distinguishing between the different modes of applying the money which it was proposed to advance, it appeared to him matter of regret that the break-water at Plymouth should have been in a great degree abandoned, and only 30,000*l.* instead of 60,000*l.* voted towards its completion. The wretched situation of the Cornish miners, whose habits of labour were congenial to such an employment, would have induced him to vote for doubling the original estimate rather than for reducing it.

Sir W. Burroughs observed, that although, under the peculiar circumstances of the times, he should not oppose the measure, he would give no credit to his Majesty's Ministers for bringing it forward. If expedient, why had it been so long delayed? He hoped it would tend to alleviate public distress; but he thought there was some ground for suspecting it to be connected with objects of favour and patronage, especially if it was to take place at the critical moment of a dissolution of Parliament. This indeed might be a reason for its having been studiously delayed.

Mr. Thompson was of opinion, that the money might prove of great advantage to persons engaged in public works, but who had not the means of completing them. He believed the motives of Ministers in this transaction to be pure, and their intention merely that of affording general relief.

Mr. Rose expressed his astonishment at the insinuation, that this measure was proposed for the sake of obtaining undue influence; and referred to the names of the Commissioners as a complete answer to that suspicion. No expectations were entertained that any extensive benefit would be derived from the measure; but it might do good, and could not be at all prejudicial.

Mr. Lyttleton contended, that it proceeded upon false grounds, and was not calculated to have a permanent good effect. In his opinion, its principles were unsound and hollow, and he should raise his voice against going into a Committee.

The House then went into a Committee.

Lord Milton moved the omission of that part of the bill which gave the commissioners power to advance loans to parishes.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer defended the clause: observing, that the commissioners would not feel themselves called upon to advance any sum, except in particular cases of extreme pressure.

Mr. B. Bathurst was persuaded, that if the amendment were carried, the advantages expected to be derived from the bill would in a great measure be lost.

Mr. L. Wellesley opposed the clause.

Mr. Western objected to the measure altogether, as in his opinion it tended to unsettle the minds of people, and raise expectations of relief, when none in that way could be obtained.

Sir M. W. Ridley was convinced, that if the bill passed, in many parishes in which its provisions would be taken advantage of, the occupiers would leave the farms with the view of making the burden fall on their successors; and that the loss would ultimately devolve on the landlord.

Lord Milton asked whether the surveyors of highways were permitted to borrow for the purpose of employing the poor in repairing the roads?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that parishes might apply part of the money in that way.

After a few words from Mr. N. Calvert and Mr. Lyttleton, who spoke for the amendment, the House divided on the question of retaining the clause.

Ayes 23—Noes 15—Majority 8.

The remaining clauses were then gone through, and it was ordered that the report should be received to-morrow.

MUTINY BILL.] Lord Palmerston brought up a Bill "for preventing mutiny and desertion, and for the better payment of the Army and their Quarters," which was read a first time.

The Exchequer Offices' Regulation Bill, the Exchequer Courts' Bill, the Offices' (Ireland)

Abolition Bill, and the Board of Trade Bill were reported, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.—The third reading of the Justice in Eyre Bill was deferred.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, May 22.

TITHES.] Earl Bathurst laid on the table “an Act relative to the right of Tithes within the province of Upper Canada, passed by the Legislature of that Province on the 15th March 1816.” By the 31st of the King, it was directed that when any change was made in the state of the established church in Canada, the circumstance should be communicated to the British Parliament. It had been provided, that when grants of land were made, a 7th should be reserved for the clergyman of the parish; and a doubt had arisen whether this was in lieu of, or in addition to, tithes. By this act it was declared, that the reserved 7th was in lieu of tithes. The bishop of the diocese had been consulted, and was satisfied.

The Lottery Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Thursday, May 22.

BRITISH MUSEUM.] Mr. Rose presented a petition from the Trustees of the British Museum, praying pecuniary aid, which petition being recommended by the Crown, was referred to a Committee.—An Account was then ordered, and afterwards presented, “Of the charge of the expenses of the British Museum in 1817, and of the sum necessary to discharge the same;” also “of the number of persons admitted to a view of the British Museum for the last seven years.” The number of persons admitted were (from May, 1810, to May, 1811), 29,152—(1812), 27,479—(1813), 81,309—(1814), 25,090—(1815), 33,074—(1816), 36,581—(1817), 40,500.

BANKRUPT LAWS.] Mr. J. Smith presented the following petition of Merchants, Bankers, and Traders in London, complaining of the Bankrupt Laws:—“That, from long experience, the petitioners have found that the Bankrupt Laws, as they are at present executed, are very much evaded and abused, and that the justice intended to be thereby administered to the just and bona fide creditors of the bankrupts is in many cases defeated; from the number of commissions of bankrupt issued to the same list of commissioners in London, and from several lists of commissioners sitting at the same time, and crowded together in one room totally inadequate to their accommodation and that of the numerous creditors attending them, the various subjects calling for the attention of the commissioners are very inadequately discussed and considered, and in many instances, for want of proper investigation, debts are proved which are either fraudulent or totally unfounded, or are otherwise objectionable; the same want of accommodation has a tendency either to prevent, or to render ineffectual, a proper investigation into the concerns of the bankrupt upon his last examination, and in many cases the assignees and their solicitor are friendly to the bankrupt, and are desirous of preventing any inquiry into his conduct or into the causes of his bankruptcy, or the deficiency in, or the appropriation made by him of his effects, and where individual creditors are desirous of investigating the conduct of the bankrupt, they are prevented from doing it with effect, as his books, accounts, and other papers, are in the hands of his friendly assignees, and if a production thereof is compelled, and an investigation entered into, the creditors who undertake it must be at the expense of employing solicitors and counsel to conduct the inquiry, and the bankrupt is frequently assisted and protected by solicitors and counsel at the expense of his estate, and every practicable opposition given to the inquiries made into his conduct, and the expense and difficulty attending such investigations most generally deter creditors from undertaking or pursuing them with effect; that a great many commissions of bankrupt are issued against persons in very inferior situations in trade, and in many instances against persons who have only colourably been concerned in trade, with a view to obtain a discharge from their debts by a certificate, and in these, and many other cases, commissions of bankrupt are issued against persons who have very little, if any property, where the bankrupt's certificate is the principal object, and, when that is obtained, no further proceedings take place under the commission, as the bankrupt's effects are frequently insufficient to pay the expense of the commission; in many cases the bankrupt is permitted to remain in possession not only of his house and furniture, but also of all his stock in trade, or other visible property, and after obtaining his certificate carries on business as before, relieved from his debts, and employing, by way of capital, the property which ought to have been distributed amongst his creditors, and if his conduct is inquired into, which seldom happens, a pretended purchase of the property from the assignees at a nominal price is set up in answer to such inquiry, and the expense of investigating the transaction, and obtaining redress, deters the creditors from calling it in question; that there are many other cases in which the Bankrupt Laws, as at present administered, are found incompetent to do justice to fair and honest creditors, whilst those who collude with the bankrupt, and prove fraudulent or unfounded debts, participate in the distribution of his property, if any, and promote his discharge by signing his certificate; that, in order to provide adequate remedies for all the injustice and inconveniences experienced, a complete revision and correction of the Bankrupt Laws will be requisite; and the petitioners humbly submit, that the mode of administering those laws should be inquired into and improved, and such a system adopted as will enable those who administer them to do complete justice to the fair creditor, by detecting and rejecting fraudulent and illegal claims, by a full investigation into the conduct of the Bankrupt, and ascertaining the cause and extent of his insolvency, and how far his conduct has been culpable or negligent, by inquiring into the conduct of assignees in the collection, disposal, and management of the bankrupt's estate, and by promoting a fair, equal, and speedy distribution thereof amongst his creditors, without waste, mismanagement, or unnecessary expense; the petitioners therefore most humbly pray, that the House will be pleased to take their representation and complaint into consideration, the petitioners being ready and willing to establish the truth of the foregoing allegations, either by a Bill, or before a Committee of the House, and that the House will be pleased to administer such relief as the nature of the case may appear to require." The honorable member then stated, that it was his intention on another day to move for a Committee to revise the Bankrupt Laws.

Mr. A. Smith said, he was desirous of expressing his opinions with respect to the objects of the petition. In the statement referring to the proposed amendment of the Bankrupt Laws in London, undoubtedly deserved consideration. But the only object of the petition is, relative to the general character and consequences of the Laws, which is much more important. He was glad that this subject had been brought before the House from such a respectable quarter, and he trusted it would excite the degree of attention which it so justly demanded. The system of the Bankrupt Laws was radically defective, and he was persuaded that nothing would serve to correct the abuses complained of but a general reformation. It was notorious that the grossest frauds were practised under the existing laws—that fictitious debts very often superseded bona fide claims—that indeed many persons entirely subsisted in this town by the fraudulent management of bankrupt concerns—and were guilty of perjury and subornation of perjury. The system which gave birth to such crimes surely called for the consideration of the Legislature: and he was firmly convinced, from a most impartial examination of the subject, that those crimes arose principally out of the heavy penalties of the law; for this was one of the many cases in which excessive severity of punishment defeated the object of the law. By the 5th of George II. any bankrupt who did not appear to his commission, or who withheld any property of the value of 20*l.* was pronounced guilty of a capital crime. Yet how few were the convictions under this Act, and yet how many might be supposed guilty of the latter offence. But the fact was, men were unwilling to prosecute while the punishment was so dreadful, at least for withholding the property. It was, indeed, contrary to every principle of common justice and common sense, that a trader should be punished as a capital felon for withholding 20*l.* from his creditors, while such an act on the part of a gentleman would scarcely be deemed any offence at all. No one, therefore, of any consideration or feeling, could repose in peace if he had prosecuted a bankrupt to conviction and death for an act of this nature; and hence there had been so few prosecutions for a breach of this law, while there had been no executions under it. But he was satisfied, that if the punishment were less severe, the number of those who committed such frauds would be considerably diminished. There were, however, other alterations which this system required. It ought to be made a substantive crime for any fictitious creditor to sign a bankrupt's certificate. Such a person might, no doubt, be prosecuted for a conspiracy, a mode of proceeding sometimes adopted, but it was always attended with great difficulty and expense. It was therefore desirable to make such an act a crime in itself. What further changes might be necessary, according to his view of this important question, he should take occasion to suggest to his honorable friend, or to the Committee for which he proposed to move, to which he should be happy to afford any information and assistance in his power. At the same time he must say, that he was afraid nothing conclusive could be done within the present Session on a subject involving such a variety of interests, and requiring so much deliberate investigation.—Advocating the bill before the House respecting the Bankrupt Law, he expressed his disapprobation of that measure, which he did not think likely to effect any good, while it was calculated to produce considerable oppression. The idea of authorizing a minute examination of the whole life of a bankrupt, and of proposing, that any exceptionable act on his part were detected, his certificate should not be granted, was inconsistent with every principle of sound policy, justice, and humanity. The main object of that bill was quite impracticable, and he hoped the honorable member who framed it would not press its adoption. Still he was that such a measure would not be agreed to by the other House. He had himself brought in a bill upon the subject in a former Session in which there was a clause to invest the Lord Chancellor with the power of signing a bankrupt's certificate. But for this clause another was substituted in the Lords, of which he by no means approved, namely, that of authorizing three-fifths of the creditors to sign a certificate, and this was deemed an important concession, because four-fifths were previously required. That arrangement, however, did not at all answer the end he had in view, which was, to protect the honest debtor from the oppression of calous or inconsiderate creditors. (Hear, Hear.)

Mr. Lockhart expressed the highest respect for the authority of the learned gentleman who had just sat down, with whose opinions upon this subject, especially as to the propriety of reducing the severity of the punishment under the existing law, he fully concurred. The object of the bill which he had introduced to the notice of the House, and of which the learned gentleman had disapproved, was solely to distinguish between honest and fraudulent bankrupts, and to guard against fictitious claimants. As to the latter, he was sorry to understand, and he stated it without prejudice, that in London, at least, they consisted principally of the Hebrew nation, who, as he was assured, dealt largely in false oaths. For example, a case had lately come to his knowledge, in which a Jew had sworn himself the creditor of a bankrupt to the amount of 5,000*l.* but, upon examination before the commissioners, it appeared that not one shilling was due to him. But as he was informed, and he had no doubt of the fact, those Jews, however they might be influenced by the penalty which the law annexed to perjury, had really no religious reverence for any oath not taken before one of their own Rabbies, while such was their impression with regard to the latter, that a Jew happening to die some time ago, shortly after he had violated an oath taken before a Rabbi, his nation universally attributed his fate to that violation. The Rabbies should therefore be called upon to enlighten and instruct their disciples upon the subject of oaths taken in the administration of our law. The call, no doubt, would be attended to, and he hoped the exhortation would be effective in preventing such crimes. Reverting to his bill, the hon. gentleman said, that in consideration of the proposed Committee, and of some advice which he had received from the Chamber of Commerce in Dublin, he should not proceed farther with it at present.

Mr. Abercrombie supported the views of his learned friend (Sir S. Romilly,) adding, that commissioners of bankruptcy should be authorized to adjourn the final examination of any bankrupt, until he should be prepared to make a satisfactory disclosure of his effects. Such a provision, he was induced to think, would operate materially to check fraudulent bankruptcies.

Sir J. Newport said, that some amendment in the Bankrupt Law was peculiarly desirable in Ireland, where the creditors usually compromised for a proportion of their claims, rather than risk the expense and perplexity of a commission.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

NON-ATTENDANCE OF A MEMBER.] Mr. Brougham presented a petition of burgesses of Barnstaple, respecting the non-attendance of one of their members (Sir Eyre Coote) in Parliament; also, of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the said borough, stating that they were satisfied with the conduct of the said member.—Ordered to lie on the table.

TITHES.] An Act relative to Tithes within the province of Upper Canada (see the Lords) was presented, and ordered to lie on the table.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR.] Mr. Brougham moved the revival of the Committee which sat last session "to inquire into the Education of the Lower Orders in the Metropolis." He wished very shortly to state the object of the motion, as its publicity would the better enable him to attain it. A great deal of evidence had been taken before the former Committee, and a considerable portion of it was necessarily ex parte. It appeared to him, therefore, that it was susceptible of correction, and it was in order to afford an opportunity of obtaining it by another investigation, that he now moved the revival of the Committee.—The motion was agreed to, and Mr. Abel Smith was added to the former members.

The Annual Report of the Commissioners of Education in Ireland (presented 15th May) was ordered to be printed.

WINDOW TAX AND CARRIAGE TAX (IRELAND).] Mr. Shaw, of Dublin, moved, "that a Committee be appointed to take into consideration certain petitions from the city of Dublin, and other parts of Ireland, against the Window Tax and Carriage Tax.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved an amendment, that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Public Income and Expenditure.

After some discussion, it was agreed that the amendment and motion should be withdrawn, in consequence of an intimation by the right honourable gentleman, that he intended to visit Ireland after the recess. A plan had lately been before him for remodelling the whole system of the collection of the Assessed Taxes in Ireland, but he had suspended his decision until he could avail himself of an investigation on the spot. (Hear, hear!)

IRISH CONVICTS.] Mr. Bennet advertising to a Commission of Inquiry which had been recently instituted at Cork, in consequence of frauds committed upon the convicts, stated the circumstances of the case as they were communicated to him.—Representation having been made to Admiral Hallowell, who commanded at Cork, that about one half of the sum allowed by Government for the maintenance of each convict while at Cork, had been for years appropriated to the private profit of the Sheriffs and Gaolers, that gallant officer transmitted his information to the Government, by whom a Commission of Inquiry was appointed. Now, he wished to know, whether there was any objection to lay before the House the Report of the Commission, with regard to the double fraud upon the Government and the unfortunate convicts?

Mr. Peel said, he had no objection to communicate any information which the hon. gentleman desired upon this subject.

Mr. Bennet then moved for a copy "of the Report of Commissioners appointed by the Crown to investigate certain alleged abuses in the Convict Department in Cork, together with the evidence taken before them."—Ordered accordingly.

LINEN TRADE.] Lord Yarmouth presented a petition from the manufacturers of, and dealers in linen at Ballymena, in Ireland, against a proposition which they understood was about to be submitted to the House for the repeal of the transit duties, the petitioners conceiving that the adoption of such a measure would be fatal to the staple manufacture of their country.

Mr. Brougham expressed his conviction, that if the House should accede to a motion, which an honourable friend of his (Mr. Finlay) was about to submit, those who put their names to this petition would find their alarm for the Irish linen trade to be totally groundless. It was stated, that if the transit duties were repealed, German linens would, instead of those of Ireland, be exported to the West Indies and the Spanish Main; but it seemed to be quite unknown to those well-informed petitioners, that not one ell of Irish linen found its way to the Spanish Main at present, whereas if the transit duties were repealed, Irish linens were among the assortment of other articles likely to be exported to any part of the commercial world.

Mr. D. Brogan deprecated any attempt to interfere with the linen trade of Ireland, upon which all orders of people in that country so materially depended, especially in its present condition; and it would, he thought, be rather difficult to prove, that if the German linens were relieved from the transit duties, the linens of Ireland could not suffer any reduction of demand from such a competition. He would ask, why any experiment should be made upon the staple trade of Ireland, while the woollen and cotton trade, while the hardware and potteries of this part of the empire, retained all the advantage of protecting duties? But no one, he ventured to say, would attempt to make any proposition that should affect the interest of those manufacturers, for this plain reason, that he would not be listened to. He hoped that Parliament would evince a similar solicitude for the protection of the trade of Ireland, whatever exertions might be made by the factors of foreign merchants to extend the commerce of Greenock, or any other northern port, with the merchants of Hamburg.

Mr. Brougham assured the House, that the hon. member was under a great mistake, if he supposed that the merchants of Greenock or of any other commercial port could produce any sinister influence upon his conduct.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Finlay moved for a copy of the "Memorial of the Merchants engaged in the Import and Export Trade of the City of London to the right hon. the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury, respecting the Transit Duty on Foreign Linen, presented the 7th May 1817."

—Also for a copy of the "Memorial from the Governor and Court of the Russia Company to the Board of Trade, respecting the Transit Duty on Foreign Linen, presented in May 1817."

The hon. member said, that foreign linens imported into this country for the purpose of re-exportation, now paid a transit duty of 5½ per cent. It was strange that a duty of this kind, so injurious to commerce, and so unproductive to the revenue, should be attached to any foreign commodity imported into this country, not for home consumption, but for exportation to foreign markets. The cotton manufacturers, in order to procure a monopoly of the home-market, had exerted themselves to have heavy duties imposed on the entrance of India cotton goods. They meant those duties to apply only to cottons for home consumption, and never were so irrational as to propose that they should be extended to those which were destined to a foreign market. Even the linen manufacturers, though they were now anxious to continue this system, could not have demanded it in the present circumstances of the world. It was introduced for the encouragement of our manufactures, at a time when we had the commerce of the world in our hands, when not a flag could appear on the sea without our permission, and when, consequently, we could render our regulations effectual. Had these circumstances continued, he should have wished the duty to continue along with them; because then it would protect our own commodities, promote our trade, and benefit our revenue; but while the state of the commercial world was altered, while we were deprived of the monopoly we enjoyed, and while the ports of America were open to vessels coming from quarters where the linen was manufactured, by continuing the present high transit duty, we did not tax foreigners, but prevented the introduction of the commodity into this country altogether. Foreigners would not receive a taxed article from us while they could receive it free of taxes from others. Nor could the duty operate as a bounty to Irish linen. This could only happen when we could prevent foreigners from being supplied with any other linen without duty. The removal of the duty would have the effect, therefore, of improving our general commerce, and particularly of encouraging the linen trade. He knew that prejudices existed against this measure; but he recommended to Government, in so clear a matter, to step in and rescue the people from the consequences of their own misconceptions. This was only a branch of a system of impolitic regulations, which required revision and change; and he was sure there was every disposition to institute inquiry, and to adopt improvement, in the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Board of Trade, who displayed so much ability on every subject that came under his official review, and so much attention to recommendations or suggestions that deserved notice. He (Mr. Finlay) would not press any proposition at present, but leave the subject in the hands of Government.

Mr. Knox said, he had no objection to the motion, but was not disposed to subscribe to the views of the hon. mover. The question was within a very narrow compass. South America and the West Indies constituted two of the greatest markets for our linen manufactures. A prejudice existed there against Irish linens, as strong as it was groundless. It prevented the introduction of our own manufactures without some deception, by which they might pass for foreign. The mark of German linen was on this account frequently affixed to Irish, and the deception succeeded. Our merchants, perceiving the prejudice in these markets against Irish linen, were averse to export it, and would cease to do so if they were allowed to supply their customers with the foreign commodity, duty free. The duty, however, operated against the export of foreign linen, and was so far a bounty on Irish. He allowed that, ultimately, Irish linen might contend with foreign, when this prejudice was removed; but in the mean time the manufacturer might be ruined. We thus might give some advantage to our trade at the expense of our manufactures, and encourage foreign industry instead of promoting our own. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Finlay) had allowed that we derived great advantage from the imposition of transit duties during the war; and he would add, that by these duties the Irish linen manufactures had succeeded beyond example. They had been useful also after the peace, and Government should pause, before they altered a system by which we had exported in 1812, 35,000,000 yards; in 1813, 37,000,000; in 1814, 40,000,000. It was no wonder that the manufacturers had a predilection for a system by which export was so much promoted.

Mr. F. Robinson said, he was as sensible as any man of the impolicy of continuing those duties. He had represented the matter to the Linen Board of Ireland, and found that a proposition for abolishing them was unfavourably received. The whole argument in favour of their continuance was fallacious. It proceeded on the supposition that by taxing foreign linen, upon its introduction to this country for exportation, we could prevent it from reaching the foreign market without a tax; and that if the foreign consumer did not receive the commodity through us, he could not receive it more directly from the manufacturer. In 1810, when these heavy duties were imposed, this reasoning was conclusive, because we had the command of the sea, and the monopoly of commerce in our hands; but now, when every flag was free, and when the foreign consumer could receive the article he wanted from the country in which it was manufactured, it was vain to expect that he would apply to us, except upon terms as advantageous as those offered him by others. But it was said, that linen would be imported into this country for the purpose of making up assortments of cargoes with other articles which we could supply, and that thus, though a whole cargo would not be imported for re-exportation, a certain quantity would necessarily pass through England. This likewise was an unfounded supposition. Quantities of linen might arrive here from Germany on their way to America, but the duty prevented them from being unshipped; and, accordingly, many vessels with this article had sailed, after receiving the other commodities required, without breaking bulk. The duties had become, in consequence, quite nugatory. They produced at one time 67,000*l.* (it had been mentioned so high as 200,000*l.*); the year before last they amounted to 27,000*l.*; and last year only to 4,000*l.* This sufficiently proved that the linen which was exported did not come here on its way, which it would have done, had the duty not existed. He had heard that cargoes of German linen were shipped at Hamburg directly for America. An hon. gentleman had mentioned, that a sort of innocent deception was practised (a laugh) to make foreigners buy our linen for German, by giving the former the mark of the latter; and he was of opinion, that that trick would succeed better by allowing a quantity to be introduced here duty free, for the purpose of mixing them together. If the tax was inoperative for the purpose of revenue, or to the effect of protecting Irish linen, why continue it to the injury of trade? He knew that strong prejudices existed in Ireland on this subject, but he hoped they would be removed.

Mr. Peel desired, in this stage of the debate, to intimate his intention of moving for another production from the Board of linen trade of Ireland. He laid claim, on the part of that country, to all that favour which could belong to, or be deserved by, local interests. If ever local interests were binding upon a Legislature, the engagements of the English Parliament to the Irish were obligatory and imperative. Manufacturers might safely be left to the calculation of their own profits, but it was an object of national policy to decide between their contending claims. That this was a fair subject for political consideration was manifest, from the total and separate amount of the different exports from Ireland during the last year. The total amount of these exports was 6,400,000*l.*, of which, the one half was of linen manufactures; whilst that of her raw commodities did not exceed 1,500,000*l.* The House also was bound to recollect the origin of the linen trade in Ireland in the year 1696, and by what means that country was induced to sacrifice to it her woollen manufacture. This was done in conformity with the earnest wishes and solemn engagements of the English Government. The Lords had in that year petitioned his Majesty (William III.) to declare to Ireland, that the increase of her woollen goods had excited great jealousy, and the House of Commons had done the same, to which the King replied, that "he should do all that lay in his power to discourage the woollen, and encourage the linen trade." On that promise it became the House to act with fairness, justice, and candour both to themselves and Ireland. That the success of this manufacture was still progressive would appear from a statement of the accounts for the last five years, which amounted successively to 2,310,000*l.*, 2,519,000*l.*, 2,864,000*l.*, 2,882,000*l.*, and, notwithstanding the last year of extraordinary difficulty and embarrassment, to upwards of 3,000,000*l.* He had good reason to believe that the manufacture was still extending itself; and was the more convinced from the present circumstances of the flax trade, that this was a most unfortunate period for commencing any experiments upon it.

Mr. Marryat supported the motion, on considerations derived from an intimate knowledge of the transit trade in this article, and on the general ground that much of what was called Irish linen was in fact of foreign manufacture. He had no doubt that it was for the interest both of Great Britain and Ireland that these distinctions should be done away.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald referred to the policy of foreign powers, and particularly to that of the Prussian Government, in defence of the prevailing system.

Mr. Curwen declared his sincere opinion, that a greater injustice had never been practised by one country to another than by England towards Ireland, by the extinction of her woollen trade. He observed, that he had been for the last few days attending to a measure which would certainly be of much benefit to Ireland. He alluded to some improvements which were proposed to be made in the working of flax, by which the linens of Ireland would be rendered as durable and as excellent in every point of view as those of any other country.

Mr. D. Broome said, the duty had increased the export by the protection it afforded. He could not be supposed to speak from interested motives, but merely from a regard to his country. If we took off the duty, the trade would be ruined.

Sir W. Douglas assented to the motion.

Sir J. Newport decidedly concurred with the Chief Secretary of Ireland, and felt it unnecessary to add any thing to what he had stated. He hoped that the subject would be brought on early in next Session, that thus the people of Ireland, interested in the linen trade, might see the House were disposed to do them justice, and to defend their interests. This he was the more anxious should be the case, because while Great Britain returned 558 members, Ireland had only 100, and it was therefore proper to shew her that her interests were not forgotten, but, on the contrary, would be carefully attended to.

Mr. Finlay replied.—He contended that his only motive was the good of the country: as an individual, he had no interest whatever in the motion.—The papers were ordered.

Mr. Peel then moved for a copy of "A letter from the Lisen Board of Ireland, with respect to the transit duty on foreign linens, addressed to the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, in the year 1814."—Ordered.

EXTENTS IN AID.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose, to ask leave to bring in a bill to regulate the issue of Extents in Aid. The right hon. gentleman observed, that the uses to which this remedy had been for some time applied, were quite foreign to their original intention, and were such as could no longer meet with the countenance either of Parliament or of the Courts of Justice. The old statute of Hen. VIII. under which the present system had gradually grown up, required some alteration. The principle of the bill which he intended to submit was, that no extent should be issued for a sum greater than that for which the debtor was accountable to the Crown, and that the sum obtained by virtue of that extent should be applicable to the Crown debt, and to no other purpose. If the House gave him leave to bring in the bill, he should move that it be printed, and taken into consideration on any day that might suit their convenience.

Mr. Abercromby said, the House and the public were much obliged to the right hon. gentleman for bringing this subject under the consideration of Parliament. In any observations which he was about to make, he begged not to be understood as desirous of opposing the motion; but he was rather inclined to think, that this matter might have been more satisfactorily adjusted by reverting to the ancient law. Until the last twenty years there had been no instance of any extent, except in cases of bond debts to the Crown. The only other alteration necessary might, in his opinion, have been produced by additional regulations on the part of the Barons of the Exchequer, in order to enforce a more strict definition of the nature of the application, before any extent were allowed to be issued. This he thought might be effected without any interference on the part of the Legislature.

The Attorney-General was persuaded, that if his hon. and learned friend who had just spoken, were to consider the subject a little more, he would be of opinion that it would not be practicable for the Barons of the Exchequer, by any rule of Court, to remove the existing grievances. One of the great evils which the bill intended to remedy, was, that a debt to the Crown, through the medium of an extent in aid, frequently, and sometimes necessarily, procured to the debtor to the Crown, at the expense of the other creditors of his debtor, a considerable benefit, of which the Crown did not partake. For instance, if a debtor owed the Crown 500*l.* and had a debt owing to him on bond of 5000*l.* he obtained an extent in aid, by which he seized the whole of that latter sum from his creditor, to the injury of any other creditors which that individual might have. Now one object of the bill was, to prevent the debtor of the Crown from doing this, and to confine the operation of the extent in aid to the precise sum in which he was indebted to the Crown. It was also to be proposed, that the money obtained by extents should not pass into the pocket of the debtor, but should be paid at once to the Crown itself. These regulations would materially diminish the inducement to sue out extents in aid. His hon. and learned friend was not correct in stating, that until late years extents in aid did not issue, except on bond debts. From the earliest times they had issued on simple contract debts.

Mr. Lockhart observed, that the outline of the measure, as described by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was by no means sufficient to remove the evil complained of. The practice of suing out extents in aid was grounded on a fiction; but according to the measure which the right hon. gent. intended to introduce, that fiction would be made a reality. He thought it a question which deserved serious consideration, whether the kind of extents proposed to be maintained should be allowed to exist. The evil arising from issuing for a larger sum than was due to the Crown, he understood, was to be removed; but he hoped the right hon. gentleman would not stop there, and that the accumulation of excessive costs would be prevented. He knew an instance of an extent having been issued for 80*l.* the costs on which amounted to 100*l.* The great trouble and embarrassment to which the parties were exposed was another most grievous evil.

Mr. Sergeant Onslow was aware that the circumstances of the country had rendered great vigilance necessary in the recovery of debts due to the Crown; but still the abuses which existed with respect to extents in aid ought to be done away. The proposed bill, he hoped, would tend to accomplish that object. As to the question of costs, that was certainly one which deserved to be promptly examined, either in that House, or in the Court of Exchequer. He could not sit down without expressing that tribute which he thought due to the conduct of his honourable and learned friend, (the Attorney-General) who, as the House well knew, had abandoned an extensive and profitable practice in his profession, in order that he might give the public service the full benefit of his attention, as he had done in the present case, and every other to which his mind was required to be directed. His friends had advised him not to relinquish his practice; but his hon. and learned friend had thought no sacrifice too great, if it enabled him to perform his public duties with greater dignity and efficiency. Such instances of zeal in the public service were rare.

Mr. Thompson hoped that extents in aid would be confined to debtors in chief. It would be a great evil if every surety were allowed to issue them. Something ought to be done to prevent the enormous amount of expenses. He knew a county in which the sheriffs had in one year received 10,000*l.* as costs.

After a few words from Mr. Gurney, and another hon. member, leave was given to bring in the bill.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] The House resolved itself into a Committee on this bill, when an amendment was proposed by Mr. C. W. Wynn, to leave out the Chaplain-General of his Majesty's forces by sea and land, from the clause containing the exemptions from non-residence.

The amendment was supported by Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Gordon, and opposed by Mr. B. Bathurst, Mr. M. Sutton, and Sir W. Scott.

Mr. Wynn, after some conversation, withdrew his amendment, but proposed another, to omit from the list of exemptions, the Chaplain of the dock-yards. On which the House divided—

The Master of the Charter-House, the Principal of the East India College, and several others, were then excepted from the necessity of obtaining a bishop's licence for non-residence.

Upon the clause for exempting the Dignitaries of any Cathedral from residence for four months in the year,

Mr. Gordon expressed a wish to know, how this exemption was to be construed with respect to a clergyman who held dignified situations in different cathedrals. For instance, a case had come to his knowledge, in which a clergyman held such situations in no less than six different cathedrals, while he had also two benefices. With such pluralities how was it possible, he asked, to provide for that residence which was the professed object of the bill?

After some conversation on this point, in which Messrs. M. Sutton, Wilberforce, Bathurst, Sir J. Nicholl and Dr. Phillimore participated, the clause was agreed to, and the Chairman was directed to report progress, and ask leave to sit again. The bill was ordered to be recommitted on Monday, the 2d of June.

POOR EMPLOYMENT BILL.] Mr. Brogden brought up the report of the bill for the employment of the poor, which was agreed to; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

SAVINGS BANKS.] The Irish Savings Banks Bill was read a second time.

MUTINY BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

OFFICE REGULATION BILL.] Mr. Brogden brought in a bill "To regulate certain offices, and abolish others, in his Majesty's Mints in England and Scotland, respectively," which was read a first time.

The Justices in Eyre Abolition Bill, the Offices (Ireland) Abolition Bill, the Exchequer Offices (England and Ireland) Regulation Bill, the Board of Trade Bill, and the Exchequer Courts Bill, were severally read a third time, and passed.

Friday, May 23.

The Royal assent was given by commission to the Lottery Bill, the Window tax Exemption Bill, the New Street Bill, the Metropolis Gas Light Bill, and several other public and private bills. Commissioners, Lords Eldon, Shaftesbury, and Melville.

OFFICE ABOLITION BILLS.] The Justices in Eyre Abolition Bill, the Offices (Ireland) Abolition Bill, the Exchequer Offices (England and Ireland) Regulation Bill, the Board of Trade Bill, and the Exchequer Courts Bill, were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

The Earl of Lauderdale asked, first, whether it was not intended that these bills should be printed; secondly, what was the proposed course of proceeding with respect to them.—He thought some explanation was necessary, considering the decisions of the House on former bills of the same nature. How was it that these measures were considered as proper at the present moment, when bills which appeared to him to have been founded on the same principle, had been deemed improper by their lordships at a former period? These bills, it was well known, were founded on a report of a Committee of the other House; and very possibly, upon examining that report, some weighty reasons might be discovered for passing them: but it was at least proper that the report in question should be laid on the table. Considering what their lordships formerly had done, he thought it would be proper to institute some inquiry of their own on the subject; for he must say, that this House stood in a delicate situation with respect to the opinion which the public might entertain of it, if, after rejecting bills of the same nature on former occasions, it should pass these bills without any explanation, which would shew a substantial distinction.

The Earl of Liverpool did not intend now to enter into any discussion on the subject of the bills, as that would come more properly at another opportunity. As to the course of proceeding, after the bills should have been printed, and another bill now in progress in the other House, which formed a material part of the system, should have come up, he intended to move that the whole of them should be read a second time. He would take that opportunity of giving an explanation, which he trusted would shew that there was a substantial distinction between them and the bills to which the noble earl had alluded. With respect to the report of the Committee of the other House, he believed his noble friend (Earl of Shaftesbury) was about to move for it.

The Earl of Shaftesbury moved, that a message be sent to the Commons, requesting them to communicate to the Lords, the grounds upon which they had passed these bills.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that motion would only bring up the last report; but there had been several other reports on the same subject which it might be proper to have before them.

The Earl of Liverpool admitted that this motion would only bring up the last report, which was that upon which these bills were founded; but if the noble earl thought it right to call for the other reports, it was in his power to move for them.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was afterwards sent up from the Commons.

LIBEL LAW.] Lord Erskine, pursuant to notice, moved an address to the Prince Regent, praying that he would command to be laid on the table of the House, an account of all the recognizances for libel taken before justices of the peace, returned to the Quarter Sessions and King's Bench, with the indictments and informations prosecuted in those cases, since the year 1640.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.] The Earl of Liverpool moved, that the House should adjourn till this day sen'night, and stated that he should probably on that day bring down a communication from the Prince Regent respecting the state of the country, in which case he should on the same day move for the revival of the Committee which sat in the early part of the session.

Earl Grey said, he did not mean to oppose the adjournment, but he heard with regret, he might say with a feeling almost amounting to despair, what the noble earl had stated with regard to the intended communication from the Prince Regent, and the revival of the Committee. Considering that since the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, the utmost tranquillity had prevailed amongst the people, notwithstanding the distress that still existed, and which he was very sorry to say appeared to be rather increasing than diminishing; that notwithstanding all the privations to which they were unhappily subjected, they had evinced an unexampled patience under their sufferings; considering also that the persons arrested under the powers given by the Suspension Bill, had proved to be persons in the lower ranks of life, with little or no influence, with no means at their command, to render them dangerous to the Government, without any character or station that could render them at all formidable; he had hoped that the people of England might now be trusted with the blessings of their Constitution, and that it would not be thought necessary again to suspend the exercise of their privileges. It was, therefore, with poignant regret that he had now heard from the noble earl, an intimation of the intention which he had announced, the more so, as it was known that if the noble earl proposed the revival of the Committee, it would be received, and that if he afterwards proposed the renewal of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus, it would be agreed to. Contrary also to the constant practice of the House, the noble earl had given notice, that on the same day on which he brought down the intended message, he should move the revival of the Committee. Could not one day be given for the consideration of the message before the revival of the Committee was proposed? Could not the proposition for the revival of the Committee be postponed, merely till the next sitting of the House, to give a short interval for the consideration of the message? He did not now mean to enter into a discussion upon the subject, but he could not help observing that the renewal of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus, instead of alleviating, would only greatly aggravate the evil. Let the people have the full enjoyment of the privileges of the Constitution, and they would know how to feel and appreciate their independence. Those privileges had hitherto borne them triumphantly through every difficulty, and would again raise them above the distresses of their present situation, by giving them that feeling of freedom which was the best safeguard of the Constitution. These privileges were indeed the best support of the Government, when fully enjoyed by the country, leading it, as they always had done, to the path of honour and glory. He should now merely express a hope that the Committee would very cautiously sift and weigh the evidence which came before them, in order that their Report might not, as in the former instance, be impeached on the ground of an erroneous statement, the fallacy of which was offered to be proved at the Bar.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he did not wish to prolong the discussion; but the course of proceeding having been adverted to, he must beg to observe, that although the usual practice was, when a message was brought down, to appoint a day for its consideration, yet it should be recollected, that in the present instance he had departed from the usual custom, in giving notice of the probability of a communication from the Prince Regent; and therefore, in point of fact, there had been a week's notice of the intended discussion. Without entering now into the question, he could not, however, allow the Report of the Committee to be falsified, without declaring, that in all the material points, it was completely borne out by facts, and the more strongly by information that had subsequently come to light.

Earl Grey said, he had not falsified the Report of the Committee. What he had stated was, and he repeated it, that the Report was impeached with regard to material facts, and this not only in the petition respecting the London Union Society, the allegations of which were offered to be proved at the Bar, but which was refused; but also in the Resolutions of the Grand Jury at Norwich, which distinctly negatived the existence of seditious societies in that city, as asserted in the Report. The noble earl had talked of a week's notice, but how was it a notice?—Merely that a message would be brought down, but of the contents of that message no notice whatever was given. This, therefore, came exactly to the same point he had before urged, that no time was to be allowed for the consideration of the message itself.

The motion for adjournment was then agreed to.

Friday, May 23.

CATHOLICS.] A petition of Protestant freeholders of the county of Cavan, in favor of the claims of the Roman Catholics, was presented, and ordered to lie on the table.

MANUFACTURE OF FLAX.] The Manufacture of Flax Committee presented their Report, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

BANKRUPT LAWS.] Mr. Sheriff Brydges presented a petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, complaining of the Bankrupt Laws, and of the manner in which they are at present administered: ordered to lie on the table.

ATTORNEYS.] A petition was presented of several Attornies and Solicitors, complaining of persons not of the profession, drawing conveyances. Laid on the table.

TITHES.] A petition of the Chancellor, Masters and Scholars of Oxford, against the Tithes Leasing Bill, was presented, and laid on the table.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.] Mr. Rose moved the third reading of this bill.

Mr. Western proposed an amendment, to leave out the clause respecting parochial relief. After some discussion, the question was put, "That the clause stand part of the bill."—The House divided:—

Ayes, 60 | Noes, 27 | Majority, 33.

The bill was then passed.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.] The Call of the House was deferred from Monday the 2d of June, till Monday the 9th of June.

COTTON TWIST.] Lord Stanley presented a petition of Master Cotton Spinners, &c. of Great and Little Bolton, in Lancashire, against the exportation of Cotton Twist. His lordship said, he had understood that an hon. baronet, a friend of his, intended to bring the subject before the House, and he had dissuaded him on account of the lateness of the season; but the subject required the most mature consideration, which he trusted it would obtain, not from any individual, but from that House, and especially from his Majesty's Ministers. The petition was signed by ten thousand persons, being more than one half of the people employed in the manufacture of cotton yarn in Great and Little Bolton. It was said that a weaver's wages did not exceed 4s. in the week. He could not state how this was, but he believed all the allegations of the petition to be founded in fact. The meeting was most numerously attended, and quite unanimous. They prayed to have their petition referred to the Committee on the Poor Laws, and had requested him to support that prayer. He believed the Committee had already enough business on hand, and perhaps more than they could accomplish. He should therefore move that the petition be brought up, and he hoped a bill would be brought in on the subject next session.

Mr. Curwen said, he was instructed to give every opposition to the object which the noble lord seemed to have in view.

Mr. Finlay did not think that the export trade should be restricted, but he would cheerfully assent to an inquiry into the subject.

Mr. Phillips considered, that if the House were to grant the prayer of the petitioners, it would only aggravate the distress from which they prayed to be relieved. His noble friend was mistaken in supposing that the exportation of cotton yarn had injured the manufacturer.

Lord Stanley explained. He gave no opinion on the subject referred to by his hon. friend (Mr. Phillips); he merely stated the views of the petitioners.

Mr. Blackburn presented a similar petition from Manchester.—Ordered to lie on the table.

POOR RATES.] Upon the question of the second reading of the Bill for rendering the proprietors of Lead Mines liable to the payment of Poor Rates, Sir C. Monck rose to oppose it, on the ground that the occupiers of the mines, and not the proprietors, should be liable.

Lord Lascelles said, the rent of lead mines was at present paid in three ways—in a certain proportion of the ore, in a quantity of merchantable lead, or in money. By a decision in the Court of King's Bench it was declared, that the proprietor was only liable to rate for the lead ore. The consequence was, that no more ore was accepted for rent by the proprietors. If they were not made liable, therefore, to pay for the profits they received in money, or otherwise, no rates could be paid, as the adventurers must be exempted from the hazards they incurred, and the losses to which they were liable in so uncertain a speculation as a mining concern. If they were not to be taxed for their clear profits, they might open mines and bring a great number of persons to a particular spot, who would afterwards become a burden on the neighbourhood.

Sir J. Graham objected, generally, to the making of landlords liable to pay rate, as frequently they did not reside in parishes where their property was situated, and had no control over the assessments. If the occupier were allowed to tax the proprietor, the right of property of the latter would in many cases become nothing else than a liability to bear burdens. With regard to the noble lord's argument for making the proprietors of mines liable, namely, that if they were not so, the farmers would be burdened by the people they would introduce to work the mines, he did not think it well founded. The farmers would be benefited by the increased price which an additional population would confer on their produce, more than they could be injured by the poor, who in consequence would be thrown upon their support. He objected to the bill, and proposed that it be read a second time this day six months.

Lord Milton, Mr. Curwen, and Mr. Morritt supported the bill.

Sir M. W. Ridley did not object to make lead mines liable to the payment of Poor Rates, but wished that the principle of the bill, which rendered proprietors liable, should be altered.

Lord Lascelles said, that if the tenant was to pay the rate, all previous leases must be cancelled. He had said elsewhere, and he would now repeat it in the House, that he would rather relinquish the measure altogether than change the principle on which he had introduced it.

After a few words from Mr. D. Gilbert in support of the bill, the House divided on the question of the second reading.

Ayes 29 | Noes 22 | Majority 7.

The bill was then read a second time.

IRISH INSURRECTION BILL.] Mr. Peel moved the second reading of this bill.

Sir S. Romilly objected to its farther progress under the present circumstances of the country. He could not think that the House did its duty to the people of Ireland, in passing a measure of such extraordinary rigour and severity, without some inquiry into the actual condition of that country, and some authentic information to guide the exercise of its authority. He did not think it enough to say that the law should be such that the executive or magistracy, in their discretion, might determine on its application; whilst it contradicted every principle of our free Constitution. By this bill, it would be in the power of the magistrates to declare any particular district to be disturbed, and arrest any individual who should be found out of his dwelling-house one hour before sun-rise, or one hour after sun-set. Every person so acting was pronounced by this bill to be a disorderly person, and subjected to the punishment of transportation without a trial by jury, and by the judgment merely of the magistrates in sessions.

(Hear, hear.) It moreover empowered the magistrate personally to enter any house in the middle of the night, and to discover by that means whether an individual ought to be considered as a disorderly or suspicious character, by being present or absent from his habitation. (Hear.) He did not assert that the unhappy state of that country might not require those harsh measures of legislation—measures which were unknown in this part of the kingdom, except as history communicated what was imposed under the iron yoke of William the Conqueror: but he was convinced that the House, as the representative of Irish as well as other interests, would not discharge its duty faithfully in granting such powers, without perfect information of the circumstances to which they were intended to apply. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Peel) on another occasion had said, that he should be sorry to exchange the substantial happiness enjoyed by Ireland at present, for the visionary benefits of what was called Catholic emancipation. Here then the House witnessed a token of that substantial happiness. (Hear, hear.) Much had been said as to the moderation which had been shewn in the enforcement of this bill on former occasions. He believed, however, that no fewer than 60 or 70 persons had been transported to the colonies under the last act. But he would ask, were they to be satisfied with the declaration of Government itself, that it had not made a tyrannical use of unmeasured and arbitrary authority? Was a British House of Commons to be told that despotic powers had been leniently applied? If this principle were once admitted, why did they not surrender at once to the discretion of the King's Government every security established by the Constitution? If severe and rigorous measures could alone preserve tranquillity and peace in Ireland, it would have become the right hon. gentleman at this period to submit some new proceeding, on clear and distinct grounds, instead of simply reviving the former act. He (Sir S. R.) knew it to be the continuation of a measure first brought forward in the year 1807, and after the time at which he quitted the office that he had had the honour to hold. He had voted against it at that period, and would have done so had he continued to be a member of the Government. He then protested in the Committee against that odious and detestable clause which authorized the entrance of officers at midnight into the chambers even of women. He had moved that this power should at least be confined to the person of the magistrate. The right hon. gentleman who proposed this bill had not thought it proper or necessary to enter into any explanation or detail concerning it; but to his mind it appeared, that if we could not place our brethren of Ireland precisely in the same state of freedom and enjoyment with ourselves, we ought at least to put them forward in the course, and give them some intermediate gradation between oppression and liberty. He felt himself as much the representative of that country as of any other part of the empire, and he felt that he had a right to call for more exact and copious information before he proceeded to legislate to this extent. He required, as he felt it to be the duty of the House to require, some certain knowledge whether the necessity, if such necessity existed, for these proceedings originated in the ignorance, in the distress, or in the unfortunate dissensions of that country. Nor was it possible for him to allude to this subject without expressing his surprise at the continuance of an administration which was divided in opinion upon this momentous and interesting subject; and at the extraordinary spectacle of the Cabinet Ministers being left in a minority upon a question which they themselves contended was one of vital importance to the peace of Ireland and the security of the empire. (Hear, hear.) Was it to be doubted, that whilst such a system continued, the occasion, or the necessity as it was called, for these unconstitutional proceedings would also continue? The state of Ireland, he feared, would remain unaltered in these circumstances, and he apprehended that it would still be the work of political wisdom, after having united the two countries, to unite Ireland within herself. (Hear.) He should not now go into the discussion of the claims of the Catholics, but was convinced, that they involved a principal, though a remote cause of the unhappy circumstances which led to the present proposition.—With these views, it was his intention to move that the bill be read a second time this day six months, unless the right hon. gentleman should consent to some previous inquiry.

Mr. Peel observed, that the hon. and learned gentleman had proceeded in his objections to this measure on the supposition that the state of Ireland was very different from what it actually was. It was not merely a question whether Ireland should be subjected to this or to that restraining or prohibitory statute, but whether there existed any other means of preserving public peace and private security. The object of the bill was nothing more than to give protection to the lives and property of unoffending people. He had not entered into any detailed statement of the facts upon which the continuance of this measure had been deemed necessary, because he was not aware, till he had heard the hon. and learned gentleman, that any objections would be advanced. He should certainly have felt it to be his duty to make that statement, had he been apprised of the existence of such objections, or of the incorrect description which had been given of the bill by the hon. and learned gentleman. It was not fair or proper in the learned and hon. gentleman to represent those parts in which the provisions appeared most rigorous and severe, whilst he concealed all the mitigatory clauses, and the narrow limits within which its application had been restrained. The lord-lieutenant was required to appoint a King's sergeant, or person fully qualified, to attend every trial of offence under this act, and it was no proof that the hon. gentleman had examined the whole of this measure when he described it as investing the ordinary magistrates with this jurisdiction. If the King's sergeant differed in opinion with the justices, the case was to be referred to the Executive Government. It was not enough to consider the remedy, the House ought to direct its attention to the nature and urgency of the evil. The hon. gentleman had not adverted, in the course of his observations, to the state of the county of Louth, or to the dreadful atrocity which had been recently perpetrated in that district. He desired him to consider these circumstances, and then declare whether the trial by jury was a process applicable to them? and whether the ends of justice could be attained at present, amidst the discord and prejudices that prevailed, by the regular course of legal administration? It was not possible to suppose that any other object was contemplated than the protection of person and property in that country. The trial by jury, whilst such atrocious outrages were committed, would operate, not as a blessing, but as a curse. The provisions of this act had never been enforced except at the unanimous application of the magistracy uniting for that purpose, whatever differences upon political subjects might exist among them. With regard to its future continuance, he must observe, that national circumstances were perpetually changing, but that the actual circumstances of that country called imperiously for some temporary law like the present. The reluctance of Government to apply it had been manifested in the resistance which was made to his own application for that purpose, founded as it was upon local knowledge and personal observation. Sorry as he was that the bill had met the disapprobation of the hon. gentleman, he felt great satisfaction in the reflection that it was deemed necessary by all who were best acquainted with the real condition of that country.

Sir J. Newport observed, that it was with great reluctance he felt himself bound to give his assent to the measure. It was a painful necessity to which he must submit, but he ascribed it entirely to that lamentable system of policy, of which, in his opinion, it was the necessary result, and which was, he feared, calculated to produce still worse effects. Whilst, however, he thought the procrastination of a full inquiry into the state of Ireland—an inquiry for which he had himself moved on a former occasion, was a mighty evil, he must conscientiously declare that the former act had been administered with singular moderation. Still he had some doubt whether he was justified in assenting to the continuance of this measure without some general previous investigation. He thought it should have been suggested by the right hon. gentleman himself; but in the difficulty of the case, and the urgency of existing circumstances, he could not conscientiously oppose the bill.

Mr. F. Fitzgerald was satisfied that he might appeal to all who were acquainted with the state of Ireland for a decision respecting the necessity of the measure. The mode and purposes of applying it constituted the material question; and the fact was, that it never had been put in force, except upon the unanimous opinions and representations of the magistrates. He hoped that credit would be given to him for a sincere adherence to the principle of making farther concessions to the Catholics, but he could not allow that question to be identified with the outrages and enormities that had been recently committed; neither could he consent to a general inquiry at a moment when the preservation of the peace of Ireland was immediately at stake. He would ask whether there was any other man in the House, except the hon. gentleman, who would say that the object of this measure was to govern Ireland by terror, and merely by a large military force? The hon. gentleman formerly voted on this question in a minority of nine; in what minority he would vote that night he (Mr. F.) could not say: but certain he was, that if the hon. gentleman lived in the county of Louth, he would feel it his duty to support this bill, instead of urging any objections to it.

Sir H. Parnell said, he should support the amendment of his honourable friend. Strong proceedings might be sometimes necessary for the preservation of the public tranquillity; but he would never give his consent to this bill, without being fully informed of the state of Ireland. The House should have all the facts before them. He thought the ordinary powers of the law sufficient to secure the public peace; and observed, that this was the first time when outrages not of a political nature had been urged for the adoption of this extraordinary measure.

Mr. L. Foster lamented the necessity of investing Government with these powers; but the tranquillity of Ireland could not be preserved without them. In that country, the people framed a code of their own, and proscribed certain offences, which put down that inestimable privilege and safeguard of the subject, the trial by jury. Witnesses were murdered for giving evidence, and prosecutors either destroyed or plundered. In every district, however, where the Insurrection Act, that best ally of the Constitution, had been put in force, peace and order had been restored. It had invariably operated in terrorem, and restrained the excesses of all classes. In acceding to this measure, the House were not trusting to the ipse dixit of his right hon. friend: They had had all the papers before them which were originally transmitted to Government. He positively denied that the disturbances which had so unhappily broken out, and which in some parts of the country still existed, had any foundation in religious disputes. In the three counties in which it had been put into operation, both the aggressors and victims were Roman Catholics. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Jocelyn assured the House, that for the last three or four years there had been a system of intimidation in some parts of Ireland, which prevented the due execution of justice. He was perfectly convinced that Government had made every exertion to put down the disturbances by the ordinary law of the land, before they applied for any extraordinary powers. The outrages in that part of the country in which he resided, had been of the most alarming kind, but they were not at all occasioned by religious animosities, as the Roman Catholics had been equally the sufferers and the aggressors. The law was intended to protect both Catholics and Protestants, and he must enter his protest against the declarations of hon. members, who, whenever disturbances in Ireland were mentioned, ascribed them to the evil of not granting what was called emancipation. (Hear, hear.) Every day's experience taught him, that the calamities of that country were to be attributed to a very different cause. They arose, principally, from the absence of those gentlemen who ought to reside on their estates, and who, whilst they diffused happiness around them, should set a good example to the inferior orders of the community. (Hear.) This was the source of all the evils of that unhappy country; and unless the gentlemen of Ireland would return to their native land, and live among their tenants, neither the commutation of tithes nor any other measure would be of any avail. This, and this only, could afford security to the peace and welfare of Ireland.

Sir J. Newport explained. He had not attributed the disturbed state of Ireland generally to that animosity which prevailed between Catholics and Protestants; but he felt convinced, that the disabilities under which the former laboured, had produced great discontent in many parts of the country.

General Mathew acknowledged that Ireland had suffered much from the absence of her great landholders and worthy gentlemen; but who had occasioned their absence? It was brought about by the act of union; and how that act had been effected was so well known, that it was unnecessary for him to repeat it. With respect to the county of Tipperary, he denied that the Insurrection Act had at all operated to effect the apprehension of the murderers of Mr. Baker. The fact was, that the whole of Ireland was to be put under the proposed system, because the county of Louth, one of the smallest counties, the Rutlandshire of Ireland, required it. He contended that the Government of Ireland acted most partially. They regarded one side with jealousy and the other with favour. Nothing beneficial in Ireland could be effected, until an equal distribution of justice should be established. He would never vote any Seditious or Insurrection Bill, to deprive the fine and generous people of Ireland of their rights and liberties. They were enslaved, ruined every way: their finances impoverished, their agricultural culture destroyed, themselves almost driven to the alternative of open rebellion or submission to the yoke of tyranny.

Mr. D. Browne was convinced that the Roman Catholic question had nothing to do with these disturbances. He thought this measure necessary for preserving the public tranquillity.

Mr. W. Quinn said, that if the House refused the continuance of these powers, they would act against the local information of those who were best able to ascertain the real situation of Ireland.

Sir F. Flood said, this was not a bill of war (a laugh), but a bill to secure the peace of the country. It was one of the many beneficial measures that had been matured for Ireland by the right hon. the Chief Secretary, to whom that country was materially indebted for his exertions; and he hoped the strangers in the gallery would notice that. (Order, order.) He had the pleasure to announce, that he had received letters from Ireland, stating that the Catholics were perfectly satisfied with the recent decision of Parliament, that they relied on their wisdom for ultimate success, and that they were very grateful to the respectable English, Scotch, and Welch (a laugh) who supported their cause. Certainly their hopes had some foundation, for the majority against them had sunk from 51 to 24; and they looked with confidence to some future decision of Parliament, by which all the subjects of the Empire should be united in one common interest. He was happy to say that the present bill was not founded on any immediate necessity whatever, (a laugh) but he should certainly give his vote for it.

Sir W. Burroughs could see no just ground for continuing this confessedly rigorous law. Ministers had induced the House to vote 25,000 troops for Ireland, for the sole purpose of keeping the peace of that country, for preserving, as had been stated, merely the internal civil peace, and not with the view of keeping down treason or sedition. The hon. secretary for Ireland, indeed, acknowledged that there was nothing to fear from treason, and yet he proposed the renewal of this bill, which was originally introduced to guard against treason and sedition. It was first introduced by Lord Chancellor Clare, a person not the most remarkable for the mildness of his temper. He must repeat, that he saw no ground for the introduction of this bill; and he hoped the House would consider an inquiry necessary, before they agreed to pass it. One of his great objections to it was, that it created new offences. If a man was from home an hour after sunset, he was liable to be punished as a felon. ["Not if he can account for his absence," was remarked from the Treasury bench.] It was true, he would be allowed to account for his absence, but to whom was the account to be given? Not to a jury of his countrymen; but to an arbitrary authority, by which he might be transported for seven years. He believed there never was an instance in any country of a more severe proceeding. If the state of Ireland was really such as to require a law to prevent men from going abroad after sunset, what was the difficulty of bringing the persons accused of that offence to trial before a jury? He would not throw any imputation on the magistrates of the counties in which this bill was to be enforced, but he must remark, that the representations of persons in their situation ought to be maturely considered; for men who had once possessed great powers were generally unwilling to surrender their extraordinary authority. The circumstances under which the Irish martial law bill had been passed, and the manner in which it had been given up by that great minister, Mr. Pitt, proved how carefully the House ought to guard against the disposition to enact measures of this sort. He hoped the right hon. gentleman opposite would, upon consideration, abandon this bill, and bring in one containing less severe penal clauses, and providing for a more constitutional mode of trial. It had been said, that the power given by the bill had never been abused, and never would be; but it ought to be recollected to what extent this argument might be carried. Why not introduce a similar bill for this country? Why not apply the same rule to the counties in England in which the Luddites prevailed? It was pretended, that witnesses could not be protected in Ireland, if this bill did not pass. Now how was this bill to protect witnesses? Did the Government mean to do without witnesses altogether? They had 25,000 men, and all the magistracy and police of the country at their disposal: if that force was not sufficient to protect witnesses, this bill never would.

Mr. D. Brogue regretted that he felt himself bound, from what he knew to be the state of the country, to give his vote in support of the bill.

Mr. Macnaghten also stated, that it was with much reluctance he voted for the measure.

Mr. Peel, referring to the observations of the gallant general (Mathew), stated for the information of those who, unacquainted with the county which that hon. member represented, might be influenced by such observations, that seventy-six magistrates of the county of Tipperary had addressed a letter to the Lord Lieutenant, expressive of their thanks for the benefit derived from the enforcement of the law, and from the efficiency of the police acting under it, as well as of their resolution to persevere in their exertions to execute the law, notwithstanding the murder of Mr. Baker.

General Mathew repeated, that when he was in Tipperary, he found this law and the police acting under it had created universal disgust, especially from the expense to which it gave rise; adding, that the murderers of Mr. Baker were not apprehended through the Government police or magistrates, but through the activity of Lord Glengall.

Colonel Bagwell observed, that if the hon. general had been in the country during last summer, he would have been of a different opinion respecting the utility of the police; but he had been residing at the Papal see, and therefore could not be sufficiently acquainted with the feelings and sentiments of the people of Ireland, to state their opinion on this bill. The hon. general must have known that the persons who seized the atrocious murderers of Mr. Baker were the police, as the magistrates had not only voted thanks to them for their activity, but a reward of 500*l.* was given to one individual.

General Mathew persevered in his former statement; adding, that the 500*l.* alluded to by the last speaker was given to one of the greatest vagabonds that ever existed, notoriously a common informer, whose trade was to entrap others into guilt in order to profit by their detection.

Colonel Bagwell assured his hon. friend that he was mistaken; the reward was not given to the person whom he supposed had received it.

The bill was then read a second time.

POOR EMPLOYMENT BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed, after a few words from Mr. Western, who observed, that if this was all that was intended for the relief of the public distress, the suffering people would feel themselves grievously disappointed, while the land-owners would be affected in a very material degree through the system of securities which the bill enacted. For, should the calamity among the manufacturers continue, which was but too probable, in Birmingham, for instance, the owners of the land and houses, which were to form the security to Government for the repayment of the Exchequer Bills, must ultimately suffer.

EXTENTS IN AID.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in a bill "to regulate the issuing of Extents in Aid," which was read a first time.

SHERIFFS AND RECOGNIZANCES (IRELAND) BILLS.] These bills were severally read a second time and ordered to be committed.

MINT OFFICE REGULATION BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

BENEFICES.] An address was ordered to be presented to the Prince Regent, for "Abstracts of the number of Benefices on which there is no Clerical Residence on account of the want or unsuitability of the parsonage house; distinguishing those of the annual value of from 10*l.* to 20*l.* from 20*l.* to 30*l.*, from 30*l.* to 40*l.*, and so on to the annual value of 150*l.*, and also distinguishing those of the annual value of 150*l.* and upwards;" also, "of the number of Benefices of the annual value of 150*l.* or upwards respectively, which are held by spiritual persons holding at the same time other benefices of the annual value of 150*l.* or upwards respectively, or holding dignities; distinguishing those held with such other benefices from those held with dignities."

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the House should adjourn (for the Whitsun Holidays) till Friday next, which was agreed to.

Friday, May 30.

The Earl of Liverpool, adverting to the notice he had given as to the probability of his bringing down a communication this day from the Prince Regent, stated, that circumstances had intervened to prevent the communication from being made, and he should therefore merely move that the House do adjourn till Monday. For the convenience, however, of noble lords, he now gave notice, that on Tuesday he should probably have to bring down a message from the Prince Regent upon the subject he had before alluded to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, May 30.

RESIGNATION OF MR. SPEAKER.] About 4 o'clock the House was unusually crowded, there being above 300 members present. Mr. Dyson, the Deputy Clerk, stated, that he had received a letter from Mr. Speaker, which, with the leave of the House, he would read. (Cries of hear, hear.) Mr. Dyson then read the following:—

"Palace-yard, May 30, 1817.

"Sir—It is with the sincerest concern and regret that I feel myself obliged to request, that you will inform the House of Commons at their meeting this day, of my inability, from continued illness, to attend any longer upon their service.

"After holding the high office to which I have been raised by their favour in five successive Parliaments, it is impossible that I should resign so honourable and distinguished a situation, without feeling the deepest gratitude for the constant kindness with which they have been pleased to accept and assist my humble endeavours to discharge its various and arduous duties.

"It was my earnest wish and hope to have continued longer in the service of the House, if such were their pleasure. But the interruption of public business which has been already occasioned by my state of health, and the apprehension of the same cause recurring, which might again expose the House to the like inconvenience, have made me deem it necessary that I should retire at this time, and have left me now no further duty to perform than to return my heartfelt acknowledgments to the House for all the favours they have bestowed upon me, and to express my fervent wishes for the perpetual maintenance and preservation of its Rights, its Privileges, and its Independence.—

I am, Sir,

CHAS. ABBOT."

Deputy Clerk, House of Commons."

Lord Castlereagh then rose and said, that after the communication which the House had just heard, combined with the recollection of the uniform conduct of their Speaker, there could not be, he apprehended, any difference of opinion as to his great merits, or as to the propriety of accepting his resignation. (Hear, hear, hear.) From the able, dignified, and conciliatory manner in which he had discharged the arduous duties of his office, at once reflecting the highest credit upon his character, and affording the utmost satisfaction to the House, all who heard him must regret the resignation of that highly respected and universally esteemed individual. (Loud cries of hear, hear, from all parts of the House.) The loss, indeed, of such an officer, it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, adequately to supply. (Hear, hear, hear.) From the situation in which the House was now placed, he should propose an adjournment until Monday, when probably he should be authorized to make a communication to them, which would mark the estimation in which the Speaker was held by the illustrious Personage at the head of the Government, and which would enable them to proceed at once to the election of another Speaker.

The motion of adjournment was agreed to.

Monday, June 2:

Several bills both public and private, were forwarded in their different stages, after which the House adjourned.

Monday, June 2.

NEW SPEAKER ELECTED.] At 4 o'clock, Lord Castlereagh appeared in his place, and addressed the House as follows:—

"I have it in command from his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to acquaint the House, that their late Speaker, having communicated to his Royal Highness his inability, from indisposition, longer to fill the Chair, and informed him of his resignation, his Royal Highness, desirous that public business should suffer as short an interruption as possible, has been pleased to take the earliest opportunity of communicating this event, and of conveying his pleasure that the House do immediately proceed to the election of a new Speaker."

Sir J. Nicholl rose and said, he hoped the House would do him the justice to believe, that he felt the sincerest regret at the event which had just been mentioned, and a proportional reluctance to offer himself to their notice. His reluctance arose not only from a knowledge of the high estimation in which the talents, the character, and conduct of their late Speaker were held, and his inability to do justice to his merits, but from a fear that he might not be able to bring forward in a sufficiently prominent point of view, the merits of one qualified to succeed him. He felt no reluctance, however, in proposing the right hon. gentleman whom he meant to recommend to their choice: for, divesting himself of the feelings to which he had referred, he would assure them, that if one better qualified had presented himself to his mind, he should have thought it his duty to name him. If they were then at the commencement of a new Parliament, in which many members took their seats for the first time, it might have been requisite to state the qualities and conduct necessary for filling the chair, in order to direct their attention to a proper person: but in addressing the House in this its fifth Session, in which every member had witnessed its proceedings for a longer or a shorter period, it would be superfluous to enlarge upon them. To an assembly so composed he might execute his duty in a single sentence, by merely recalling to their recollection the numerous and distinguished qualities that were concentrated in their late excellent Speaker, and which shone with such lustre from the chair. (Hear.) To lament the resignation of that distinguished individual was not then his business; to pass a sufficient panegyric on his merits was not within his power; and to attempt the task in a place where they were so universally known, and so warmly acknowledged, would be a useless waste of time and labour. If his successor had a difficult task to discharge, in aspiring to emulate his merits, and to acquire his distinction, he would likewise have the benefit of being directed by the light of his example. For a long time past the business of Parliament had assumed a character that rendered it expedient to select a person of professional education to fill the chair: and if, in mentioning the name of the right hon. Manners Sutton, he was not departing from the usual course, he felt that he was stating what would be in his favour. The right hon. gentleman was brought up to the Bar, and practised at it for some time with great distinction. It was thought by some, though he did not entirely concur in the observation, that the habits of a lawyer, if strongly fixed, were not the most favourable recommendations for fulfilling the duties of Parliament, or executing the offices of the State. If such a prejudice existed, it could not operate to the disadvantage of his right hon. friend, as he had not continued so long in the profession as to allow the character of his mind to be exclusively formed upon its habits. He had since filled an office more nearly allied to that of the chair, and tending in a high degree to prepare him for it—an office that required great assiduity and labour, profound research, extensive knowledge of business, and promptitude of judgment. As Judge-Advocate-General the right hon. gentleman was known to have been distinguished for firmness and strength of mind, for the endow that graced his conduct, and the impartiality that marked his decisions. He had also sat for some time in the House, and although he had not taken a prominent part in questions of order, or offered his opinion frequently about modes of procedure, yet the laws and the privileges of the House had not been inattentively observed by him, nor had he failed to make them an object of study. (Hear, hear.) It was unnecessary to detain the House with describing the other qualifications of his right hon. friend, though he might enlarge upon them without being misled by the partialities of friendship, or transgressing the bounds of truth. He would only say, that if dignity of birth, elevation of rank, urbanity of manners, integrity of conduct, quickness of apprehension, promptitude of judgment, firmness of character, and impartiality of decision, joined with mildness of temper and conciliatory dispositions, were qualities that fitted a gentleman for filling the chair, and prepared him for presiding over the debates and executing the orders of the House, with honour to himself and satisfaction to Parliament, these were all combined in his right hon. friend. (Hear, hear, hear.) Having said this much, he could have wished to stop here, and satisfy himself with the motion which he meant to conclude; but he could not disguise from himself, nor conceal from the House, that a rumour had gone abroad, or rather that there was a general understanding, that another hon. gentleman, and one for whose character and qualifications he entertained the highest respect, was to be put in nomination against his right hon. friend. (Hear, hear, hear.) The House would do him the justice to allow that he had studiously avoided any allusion to this circumstance, and had abstained from any observations which might lead to a comparison. (Hear, hear.) The House, he had no doubt, from the talents and the respectability of its members, contained several gentlemen capable of discharging the arduous duties and maintaining the dignified elevation of Speaker; and the great difficulty was, to make the most proper choice among many who were worthy of it—inter bonos optimum decernere. He should conclude by recommending such a person to them; and therefore moved, That the right hon. Manners Sutton do take the chair of this House. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Littleton seconded the motion. He should not have obtruded himself on the attention of the House, had he not been deeply impressed with the propriety of the nomination, and the eminent qualifications of his right hon. friend to discharge the duties of the chair. The only reluctance he felt to enforce the claim of his right hon. friend, arose from an understanding that a considerable part of the House had fixed their choice on an hon. member whose character he highly respected, and whose qualifications he was as willing as them to allow. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition benches.) Whoever should be called to the chair would have an arduous duty to fulfil, in succeeding so distinguished a predecessor, whose loss was so universally regretted. Their late Speaker had retired too soon for the wishes of the House, whose honour and dignity he never failed to consult and support; but he had not retired too soon for his own reputation, which he could not have exalted by a longer service; and it was to be hoped, that he had not remained too long for his health, which was exposed to danger by his great exertions and his assiduous attention to business; or for the future display of his talents in the civil service of his country, to which he might be called. (Hear, hear.) It was a common and a useful practice, while electing a new Speaker, to mention the services and to describe the merits of his predecessor, that the reward of praise might operate as a motive to exertion, or a guide to choice. The House should recollect, in estimating the merits of their late Speaker, how long, and in what circumstances he filled the chair. The conduct of parties had never been more violent, nor their opposition more decided; and yet in all their heats, his decisions were so candid and just as to give general satisfaction, and to exempt him from even the suspicion of bias or partiality. (Hear, hear, hear.) During the period when he presided, there were in the House men of the most transcendent talents, as well as the most violent party spirit; and yet his knowledge was never doubted, nor his judgment questioned, while he vindicated by his abilities and integrity, the wisdom of the successive elections by which he had been honoured. It would be fortunate for his successors if they should retire with the unanimous applause and regret which were now testified towards him. The same period had been distinguished by great naval and military exertions, and by the eminent success of our arms under our immortal commanders. It was in that House, and in the thanks which the Speaker was appointed to convey to those officers, that the most splendid and precious reward of their services was found, and he need not put to those officers whether this reward had not been much enhanced by the manner in which the eloquence of the Speaker had conferred it; whether they did not see new brilliancy in their own exploits when described by him, and connected with great results, and whether they were not animated by his voice to new exertions in the cause of Europe and humanity. (Hear.) Such were the merits of the late Speaker, who was to be held up as an example to his right hon. friend (Mr. Sutton,) whose qualifications to succeed him had been so justly stated, and whose praises had been so well enlarged upon by the right hon. gentleman (Sir J. Nicholl.) The House regretted the retirement of the former, and were sensible of his merits; to the latter he would say—

Conciliating, as he did, the good-will of all parties; retaining, privately, the respect and regard of those from whom he publicly felt himself bound to differ; he was well fitted to enjoy the confidence of all. The House would witness his firmness and impartiality, as well as his knowledge and integrity, if its choice should place him in the situation of presiding over its debates. He therefore felt great pleasure in seconding the motion of his right hon. friend, that the right hon. Manners Sutton be called to the chair. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Dickinson said, he should occupy the attention of the House but a very short time, while he recommended another hon. gentleman to the office of Speaker. He would propose for their choice Mr. Charles Watkin Williams Wynn, a gentleman whose talents and qualifications peculiarly fitted him for the chair, and whose merits no one could deny. (Hear, hear.) He would pass over all that had been said in favour of another right hon. member: he would follow the example so properly set him by the hon. gentleman opposite, and would not enter into the comparative merits of the two members. He proposed Mr. Wynn, not for any demerit in Mr. Manners Sutton, but from the peculiar merits of his hon. friend. (Hear, hear.) In what had been said in praise of the former he cordially joined; but if that eulogium was deserved by him, in what respect was his hon. friend inferior or less deserving? (Hear, hear, from all parts of the House.) Nay, he would even go farther, and say, that, in some respects, his claim was superior, as being founded in the experience of talents displayed in the debates of the House, and a perfect acquaintance with its forms and history. In the knowledge of the orders of Parliament, and in questions of division, that were particularly important from the state of parties, his hon. friend had displayed peculiar aptitude for the chair. It was not many days ago that he set the House right on a question of this kind, when even the late Speaker, eminently qualified as he was for all parts of his duty, had acted on his suggestion, and bowed to his authority. It was this intimate acquaintance with the forms and precedents of Parliament, and promptitude in applying them to regulate its proceedings, that constituted the best qualification for the chair; and for those qualities his hon. friend was eminently distinguished. This praise did not depend upon report—it did not spring from the partiality of friends—the House had been a witness of the fact. His hon. friend might say, like a great ancient to another assembly, and in another competition—

"Esse reor; vidistis enim—"

We lived in times of great difficulty—in times when the dangers of the country were probably greater than at any former period; we lived likewise in times when parties ran high—when they were numerous and subdivided. The safety of the country depended on the wisdom and deliberations of the House, and the dignity and impartiality with which its proceedings were conducted. What, then, could be of greater importance than to place in the chair a man whose superior knowledge might be relied on in cases of difficulty, and to whose ascendancy in this respect all parties would bow? (Hear, hear.) It was not unworthy of attention, too, in times when popular elections were so much talked of, that his hon. friend was so acceptable out of doors as to be sent into the House by a large and respectable county without opposition. In addition to this, he would recommend him from long and intimate habits of friendship. It might be asked, what this had to do with his qualifications for the chair? He would answer that it had much to do with them. The qualifications for such a high and distinguished situation must be laid in private worth, integrity, and honour, as well as public talents and Parliamentary service; and he was enabled, from the intimacy to which he had alluded, to say of his hon. friend, that, in every sense of the term, and in the broadest acceptance in which it could be used, he was a high-bred English gentleman. (Hear, hear, from all parts of the House.) Both private and public character were necessary for a Speaker: without personal dignity, some of the duties imposed upon him could not be performed. How could he assert the privileges of the Commons in his intercourse with the other House? How could he demand freedom of speech from the Crown, and lay claim to respect in all cases where the House required the maintenance of its dignity, without personal respectability? Knowing that his hon. friend possessed this, and every other qualification for the chair, he should conclude by proposing Mr. C. W. W. Wynn to be their Speaker; and he was confident that, if that hon. gentleman should meet with their choice, he would retire from the high office with that unanimous praise which had been so justly bestowed upon his predecessor. (Hear, hear.)

Sir M. W. Ridley seconded the motion. He would not enter into any consideration of the merits of Mr. Manners Sutton, but would press the peculiar fitness of his hon. and learned friend, Mr. C. W. W. Wynn, to fill the chair. In times like the present, it was necessary to place in the presidency of the House a person whose knowledge of Parliamentary forms was universally acknowledged, and whose firmness, impartiality, and temper, would confer dignity on its proceedings and preserve regularity in its discussions. (Hear, hear.) He called upon all the members of the House to discharge from their minds, as he had himself done, all political prejudices and party feelings. He supported his hon. friend from no political bias whatever. He had lately differed with him on a very important question—the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; but claiming for himself a conscientious regard to the dictates of his own mind, and the decisions of his own judgment, he could not refuse the same privilege to others; and, therefore, believing that his hon. friend had shewn as much integrity in the vote which he had given as that to which he himself had come, he did not allow this difference of opinion for a moment to interrupt their mutual confidence, or to reduce the respect which he entertained for his character. Neither did he now support his hon. friend from a regard to the intimacy that subsisted between them, though he could say, from a long acquaintance with him, begun at school, and extending through their subsequent life in various situations, that he found him as estimable in private intercourse, and as much beloved by his private friends, as he was serviceable to the public, and honourable in his public capacity; but this union of private and public virtue, joined to his great knowledge of Parliamentary history and proceedings, peculiarly fitted him for the chair: and he was convinced that the House would, by electing him, suffer as little as possible from the lamented loss of its late Speaker, which he regretted as much as any one could do. He concluded by seconding the motion, that Mr. C. W. W. Wynn be called to the chair. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. M. Sutton next rose, and with some emotion in his voice and manner, addressed the House to the following effect:—It would be absurd in him to pretend to lay claim by any peculiar merit to a situation which he felt to be the proudest and most dignified that any member of that House could aspire to. He was well aware of the difficulties of that high office; he was well aware of the many qualifications necessary for an efficient discharge of its duties; and he was perfectly conscious of his own inferiority to the honourable gentleman proposed by the other side. He was also well aware of the difficulty of succeeding to the noble lord who had lately filled that chair, which personal indisposition had compelled him to leave too soon for the service of that House. When he contemplated these things, he felt himself utterly inadequate to the dignity to which his friends proposed to raise him. At the same time he hoped he might say, that it had been to him, as it must be to every man in that House, the first object of his ambition. His attention and studies had been directed to that point; and if he should be honoured with the choice of the House, his whole faculties should be devoted to their service, and he would make every exertion in his power to perform the duties of the office in a manner suitable to its high importance. If, however, another individual should be chosen, he was not so blinded by self-love or ambition, as to doubt that the selection would be more proper; and he should, in that case, with perfect acquiescence submit to the decision of the House. (Cheering.)

Mr. G. W. W. Wynn said, he had been highly gratified at the handsome though too partial manner in which his hon. friends had expressed themselves respecting him. Indeed, he felt it to be impossible for him to describe how much the partiality of their friendship had over-rated his abilities, and how unworthy he was of that high situation to which their kindness wished to raise him. He entirely concurred in all that had been said as to the high importance to the House and country, that the chair should be well filled; and he felt that the weight of responsibility had been extremely increased by the manner in which its duties had been discharged by the last Speaker. He should always think with pleasure on what had passed that day. The kind eulogiums of his hon. friends, and the manner in which those eulogiums had been received by other parts of the House, would create such recollections as he should cherish and dwell upon with satisfaction during the rest of his life. They would be to him more than an adequate reward for any services which he might have rendered. He felt that there was only one qualification which he possessed that could at all entitle him to the vacant dignity, and that was his ardent zeal for the privileges of the House—privileges which our forefathers had handed down to us, and which the House should be anxious to maintain, not so much for themselves as for their constituents, and for the general good of the Commons of England. (Hear, hear.) He had always considered, that not that House only, but every branch of the Legislature, the happiness of the people, and the dignity of the Crown, might frequently be involved in the character and conduct of the person who filled that chair. (Hear.) For this reason he had always, as far as was in his power, watched over the rights and privileges of the Commons; and whether he were raised to that chair or should continue in his present situation (the only situation which he could anticipate that he should fill), he should always exercise the same watchfulness, and afford such assistance as he was able to the maintenance of their dignity. (Hear, hear.) He had long seen the talents and industry of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. M. Sutton), and was aware of the exemplary propriety with which he had discharged the duties of the important office which he had for a long time held; and he had no doubt that the same qualities would enable him to fulfil the duties of Speaker with equal reputation. (Hear, hear.) He had known him some years ago, and had witnessed the amenity of his temper, the suavity of his manners, and the integrity of his principles: and he was convinced that he would, in the high station to which he was about to be raised, conduct himself equally to his own credit and to the dignity of the House. (Much cheering.)

Sir G. Duggall rose, amidst loud cries of withdraw, withdraw, and made a few observations in favour of the nomination of Mr. Wynn. He said, that he was induced to support his hon. friend because he had had early and long opportunities of seeing the fidelity and attention with which he had fitted himself, by his studies and conduct, for the situation of Speaker. There were reasons also connected with his private character which, if known, would operate greatly on the House. He could not forbear mentioning one instance of private munificence: it was the case of a distressed schoolfellow, whom his hon. friend had liberally supported out of his purse.

Mr. Sergeant Onslow rose, amidst repeated cries of question. He said, he must be allowed to trespass so far as to affirm, that the attention which the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Wynn) had on all occasions shewn to the business of the House, and the zeal with which he had always maintained its dignity, peculiarly fitted him for the high office of Speaker.

Mr. Wilberforce then rose, but the cry of question was so loud, general, and incessant, that for a few seconds he could not be heard. The House, however, at length being silent, he said, that the office of Speaker required the greatest talents. The various occasions on which questions of property came before him, in a great measure depending on his judgment and integrity, made it essential that his character should be of that eminent class, that the individuals interested, and the country at large, should rest satisfied with his decisions: and the estimation in which he would be held would depend on the just principles which would be known to guide his private conduct. He felt the question now before the House to be one of some difficulty. It was impossible for any man not to acknowledge the great ability and private worth of the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. M. Sutton); and, indeed, his conduct that day was sufficient to give a high notion of the character both of his understanding and his heart. At the same time it was impossible not to have observed the zeal and knowledge displayed by the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Wynn) on all questions of order and privilege. It was impossible for any man in that House not to allow that his ability and learning, and the peculiar success with which on many occasions both had been applied, justly qualified him for that high situation to which his friends proposed to raise him. The office of Speaker was one that, from its peculiar line of service, required peculiar studies: much reading, much knowledge of the law, and of parliamentary customs, were necessary. There was something very laborious and even distasteful to many minds in this species of application, and it was therefore requisite that some compensation should be given to one who had evidently paid so much attention to these subjects. (Hear, hear.) It was important also, that the hon. and learned gentleman had shewn, that he could, on questions of great moment, break through the trammels of party, as he had done on a late interesting occasion, when he had boldly and manfully avowed, that even the liberties of the people might sometimes be better secured by temporary restraint. Such impartiality peculiarly fitted him for a situation for which independence of mind was one of the most essential qualifications. Under these impressions, while he felt the highest esteem for the character of his right hon. friend (Mr. M. Sutton), he must, though with some pain, give his assent to the nomination of the hon. and learned gentleman. (Cries of hear.)

The House then divided, when there appeared

For Mr. Manners Sutton . . . 312

Mr. W. W. Wynn . . . 152

Majority . . . —160

When the House resumed its sitting, Mr. Manners Sutton was conducted to the chair by the mover and seconder. He seemed greatly affected, and shewed that he was so overcome by the honour conferred upon him that he could not express his gratitude in the way which he desired, and which became him. He could merely say, that he returned his most heartfelt thanks for this distinguished mark of their approbation, and could assure them of his anxious wish to discharge the duties of the high office to which he had been raised by their favour, to their entire satisfaction. He was aware of the inadequacy of his own abilities for this purpose, and could hope for success through no other means than the exercise of their accustomed indulgence. He once more, with much emotion, begged pardon for his inability to utter half what he felt.

Lord Castlereagh then rose, and after congratulating the right hon. gentleman on his election, moved an adjournment, which was immediately carried.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, June 3.

THE NEW SPEAKER APPROVED.] At half-past three o'clock the Commons came up, with the Right Hon. Charles Manners Sutton, their Speaker, to be presented for the Royal approbation.

The new Speaker advanced close to the bar, and the Royal approbation was notified as follows:—

The Lord Chancellor.—It not being convenient for his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to be personally present on this occasion, his Royal Highness has caused a commission, under the Great Seal, to be made out; and has thereby commanded us, and the other noble lords therein mentioned, (Earls Shaftesbury, Liverpool, Bathurst, and Marquis of Cholmondeley), to declare and notify his Royal Highness's approbation of the choice by his faithful Commons of the Right Hon. Charles Manners Sutton to be their Speaker.

(The commission was then read.)

The Right Hon. G. M. Sutton.—In obedience to the commands of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, his Majesty's faithful Commons have proceeded to make choice of a Speaker; and it is now my duty to inform your lordships that their choice has fallen upon me. When I contemplate the many and arduous duties which are necessarily attached to this high and distinguished situation, it is impossible for me not to feel my own inadequacy to the proper discharge of them. If, however, it should please his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to approve the choice of his faithful Commons, it may give cause of gratitude: but the Commons can have no difficulty in selecting from their body a person much better qualified than I am to discharge the important duties of their Speaker.

The Lord Chancellor then said, "Mr. Manners Sutton, We have received the commands of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, to declare and state, that he is so entirely satisfied of your perfect qualifications, and full sufficiency for the proper discharge of the arduous and important duties of the high and distinguished situation to which you have been elected, that he has caused his Royal Commission, under the Great Seal, which you have just heard read, to authorize us to declare the same; by virtue of which, and in obedience to the commands of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, we now communicate to you his Royal Highness's approbation of the choice of his Majesty's faithful Commons in electing you to be their Speaker."

The Speaker answered—"My Lords, I submit with all due deference and humility to his Royal Highness's most gracious pleasure; and I beg leave to express my own deep sense of gratitude for this high and distinguished mark of his Royal Highness's approbation. If, my lords, in the discharge of the various and important duties of the high and arduous situation to which I have been appointed; or if, in my endeavours towards the maintenance of the ancient and undoubted rights and privileges of the Commons House of Parliament, I should be involuntarily led into the commission of any error, I have humbly to request, that such may be attributed to me alone, and not to his Majesty's faithful and loyal Commons."

The Commons, with their Speaker, then retired.

THE LATE SPEAKER CREATED A BARON.]
—The Earl of Liverpool presented a mes-

"G. P. R.

"His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, thinks it proper to inform the House of Lords, that having taken into his consideration the eminent and distinguished services of the Right Hon. Charles Abbot, during the long and eventful period in which he has filled the situation of Speaker of the House of Commons, has conferred upon him the dignity of a Baron of the United Kingdom, by the title of Baron Colchester, of Colchester, in the county of Essex; and the Prince Regent recommends to the House of Lords to enable him to make such provision for Charles Lord Colchester, and for the heir male of his body who may next succeed to the title, as shall under all the circumstances be judged just and reasonable."

On the motion of the Earl of Liverpool, the message was ordered to be taken into consideration on Thursday.

"G. P. R.

"His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, has given orders to lay before the House of Lords Papers containing information respecting the continuance of Practices, Meetings, and Combinations, in different parts of the kingdom, to which, at the commencement of the present session of Parliament, his Royal Highness called the attention of the House, and which are still carried on in such a manner and to such an extent as are calculated to disturb the public tranquillity, and to endanger the security of the established Constitution of these realms.—His Royal Highness recommends to the House of Lords to take these papers into their immediate and serious consideration."

The noble lord then rose and proposed an Address to the Prince Regent, thanking him for his gracious message, and assuring him that the House would not fail to take the information contained in the papers which he had ordered to be laid on their table into its immediate and serious consideration.—When this information should be examined, it would be for the House to consider whether any, or what, farther proceedings ought to be adopted. He would propose to their lordships to follow the same course, or at least a course similar in its object, to that which had been pursued when a communication of the same nature was made at the beginning of the session; that was, to refer the papers to a Committee of Secrecy. So far the course was the same as that before adopted: but he now submitted that, instead of choosing a Committee by ballot, the papers should be referred to the same noble lords who had constituted the former Committee. He would therefore propose the same individuals, with the exception of a noble duke (Bedford), who, from ill health, had not attended the former Committee, and who had requested that his name might not be inserted on the present occasion. When the papers had been examined, and the report of the Committee should be before their lordships, they would then have to consider and decide whether any thing farther should be done, or what measures ought to be adopted for the protection of the public tranquillity, and the interests and safety of the State. He concluded by moving the address.

Earl Grey asked, where there was any instance in which the House had voted an address instantly on receiving a message from the Crown?

Lord Sidmouth replied, that there were numerous instances of that nature, when the address did not pledge the House to any ulterior measure.

Earl Grey observed, that, with this understanding, that he was not pledged to any measure to be founded upon the message, he should not oppose the address.—It was then agreed to and ordered accordingly.

Lord Sidmouth then rose for the purpose of moving, that the papers accompanying the message be referred to a Committee of Secrecy. He said, that he was not sufficiently acquainted with forms to be able to state, whether any precedent existed for submitting papers to a Committee on the same day that the message was brought down; but he appealed to noble lords, whether the House ought to be restrained from establishing such a precedent under the peculiar circumstances of the present question. The only object of allowing an interval between the message and the reference was, to protect the House from being taken by surprise; but how could that object apply to this subject, of which ten days' notice had been given by his noble friend; who stated, that he should propose the revival of the Committee, and the submitting of the important documents to it, on the same day that he brought down the message? The House had been, therefore, in possession of the intention of Government for some time; and it should be recollected, that the proposition now to be made was not to declare or pledge any opinion as to ulterior measures, but merely, in the words of the address, to take the subject into serious and immediate consideration. Until some other and preferable mode of proceeding were stated, and established, he should move that the documents this day laid before the House by command of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, be referred to a Committee of Secrecy.

Earl Grey said, that the words "immediate consideration," used in the address, ought not to be understood as pledging him or any other member to more than such an immediate consideration as was consistent with the known forms of Parliament. The noble Secretary had confessed that there were no precedents in his favor, at least he had stated none; and had any existed, it would have been his duty to have referred to their authority. This disregard of precedent seemed at least a little extraordinary. The noble Secretary had asked what was to preclude the House from establishing a precedent? Certainly nothing, provided it were convenient or necessary; but he was confident he should meet the sentiment of the noble Secretary when he said, that in a most important measure, which was ultimately to affect the rights and liberties of the whole people of England, it was impossible to proceed with too much caution and deliberation. If one question more than another required a strict observance of all forms, it was that now under the view of the House; the answer, therefore, did not lie upon him to prove the inconvenience of this needless dispatch, but the noble Secretary was bound to shew that there was some urgent and uncontrollable necessity, requiring the abandonment of the ordinary practice. It was true that the noble earl (Liverpool) had intimated his intention of bringing down a message upon this subject; that notice he (Earl Grey) had heard with deep regret, and it would not be lessened if he found that Ministers were disposed to hasten through the Legislature a measure requiring the gravest and most mature consideration. He had hoped, but vainly, that it would not again be resorted to; and as far as his knowledge extended of the real state of the country, he would boldly assert that no necessity for it existed. The message, indeed, and the address, pledged the House to nothing; but they gave the country but too much reason to apprehend, that a measure would be once more resorted to which was not the true remedy for its difficulties, and its distresses. He agreed, however, that it would not be proper to anticipate the debate upon the question; he was willing to wait for the decision of the Committee, hoping, as he had said on its first appointment, that it would proceed seriously and anxiously to make the most minute inquiries into the real state of the country; and hoping, too, that with the warning it had already received, it would not be satisfied upon any point, without the best evidence that the nature of the case admitted of the truth of the allegations. He trusted, that the members would attend more strictly than heretofore to the characters and conduct of those who supplied information; that they would not forget that they came forward in support of the measures of Government, and to propagate rumours, hazardous not merely to individuals, but to the State. If it should be found, on this new inquiry, that any part of the intelligence which influenced the former report had been given under any peculiar or disqualifying bias, he hoped it would now be rejected, and that the motives and situations of all the witnesses would not be left out of the account. The noble Secretary had appeared at a loss what to say in favour of the re-appointment of the Committee; he seemed at a loss for a reason; but he (Earl Grey) would read to the House a paper: then, which nothing more dangerous or inflammatory, nothing more calculated to produce disorder and commotion, had been read before the previous Committee: it was the copy of a letter, circulated in the city of Norwich during the late election, and in favour of the candidate (Mr. Wedeburne) who professed principles corresponding with those of His Majesty's Government. It began thus:—

 "A. Q. Englishmen, what has caused the high price of bread?"—A. The corn bill.

"A. Q. Who aided that unjust and cruel measure which grinds the poor industrious man to the earth, and sends misery and starvation upon his helpless family?"—A. The man (meaning Mr. Cobden) who takes the freeholders of Norfolk by the nose, and leads them where he pleases.

"A. Q. Who oppressed the industrious little farmer, that virtuous and independent member of the community, and incorporated his land with his own for the purpose of swelling his already bulky estate?"—A. The proud and unfeeling despot of Norfolk, who is a tool of others.

"A. Q. Who is it that, by the enormously extensive use of machinery, not only in agriculture but in manufactures, has reduced thousands to a state of pauperism, madness, and despair, which has led to the commission of crimes at which humanity shudders?"—A. He who takes upon himself the name and style of patriot.

"A. Q. Shall this system have no end, or shall the feelings of mankind be still farther outraged and trampled upon?"—A. No! Rise and do your duty."

His lordship appealed to the House, whether any of the papers submitted to the last Committee had been framed in a more wicked and diabolical spirit? Did it not touch upon all the topics of discontent, did it not address itself to the lowest and worst passions by which the species was degraded? (Hear, hear.) Did it not call upon the deluded people to make those attempts which had in fact been made? No man could be so short-sighted as to imagine that it would stop here—that popular indignation against an individual, not only of a most honourable mind, but one of the greatest improvers of the system of agriculture and of the situation of the poor, would be all that would be felt. The corn bill, a measure of Government, was attacked; the employment of machinery was used as a handle for popular discontent; and the influence of such an offensive document could not be confined either to the county of Norfolk or to the period of the election. It had unquestionably the most dangerous tendency; and its effect had already been he did not know, but of this he was sure, that he had seen the document more imperiously demanding the interference of the Attorney-General. He would not name individuals; but he was informed that it could be proved, beyond doubt, that this notorious publication had proceeded from a person with whom the noble Secretary had recently held a correspondence; who was at the head of a society called the Knights of Brunswick—one of those political associations to which Ministers had no objection, and which professed about the same principles in England that were promulgated by the Orange societies in Ireland, a spice of which was contained in the hand-bill he had just read. (Hear, hear.)—principles, he would say, wholly incompatible with those established at that Revolution which had seated the present family on the throne of these kingdoms. His lordship hoped that the Committee, if re-appointed, would not fail to investigate all these matters; and that the imprudent and inflammatory productions of the supporters of the present system would not be forgotten, while every endeavour was used to detect the errors of those who had been active on the opposite side of the question. He made this remark, because at the present moment Government was holding out lures and incitements to informers of all descriptions, to bring forward budgets of falsehoods agreeable to their employers; because, at the present moment, the manners of the people of England were undergoing a complete change; because the confidence that formerly existed between man and man was destroyed; because all were taught to look upon their neighbours with suspicion and distrust; and because Ministers seemed using their utmost exertions to assimilate as much as possible the state of England to the unhappy condition of Ireland. (Hear, hear.) What necessity had been shewn for this irregular rapidity? The Habeas Corpus Suspension Act did not expire until next month, and the other side of the House had not been extremely active in introducing the subject. Why had so long a notice been given of the intended message, that not one day more could be spared before the Committee was to be appointed? Why could not this question have been deferred until the pending trials were concluded? These were questions to which no satisfactory answer could be given; and until they were answered, it would become the House to pause before it deserted its ancient and wholesome precedents. He was glad to find that the noble Secretary did not mean to re-appoint the Committee by ballot; he (Earl Grey) detested any thing like hypocrisy; and to pretend to name a Committee by ballot, as if the choice were free from the influence of the Crown, was a fraud and an insult upon the people of England. A ballot was, in truth, the most convenient mode by which Ministers could select the friends they wished to be nominated. It was understood that a noble duke, who had attended the deliberations of the former Committee, intended to decline the duty in future; and therefore, at the proper time, he should propose a noble peer to fill his place. He concluded by moving the previous question.

* Here the noble earl alluded to the case of James Watson, the elder, Thomas Preston, Richard Hooper, and Arthur Thistlewood, who had been indicted by the King's Attorney-General, (Sir S. Stephen,) for High Treason. The indictment contained four counts, charging them with divers overt acts, originating at the meetings in Spa-fields, on the 1st of Nov. and 2d of Dec. The trial of Watson, (who was first put on his defence) commenced in the King's Bench, on Monday, the 9th of June, before Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough, and the other Judges of that court. It lasted till Monday, the 16th of June, when the Jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty. On the following morning, the trial of the other prisoners was abandoned.

The Earl of Liverpool was desirous of saying a few words upon each of the topics adverted to by the noble lord. In the first place, his noble friend, the Secretary of State, had not asserted that no precedent existed for the step he proposed, but that he was not at that moment prepared to produce one exactly analogous. It could not be alleged that the House was now taken by surprise, because even notice of the message (a course not usually adopted) had been given; and though an interval was commonly allowed, yet at this period of the Session it was expedient that as little delay as possible should occur. At the time the Royal message was mentioned, it had been also stated, that the re-appointment of the Committee would be moved on the same day. Strictly speaking, the practice of giving notice of motions was of modern date; and though a most salutary regulation, in order that the House might not be taken by surprise, it might be dispensed with, more especially when, as in the present instance, a previous understanding had taken place. The House had not been called upon to consider the message on Friday last, the day at first fixed, in consequence of an event which had not been foreseen, (alluding to the resignation of the Speaker,) and thus the notice had been extended from a week to ten days; so that, in truth, there was still less reason to complain of extraordinary and undue celerity. The very appearance of the House, the fulness of the benches, was an evidence that more than formal business was expected. The postponement of this motion for even a day or two, at this late period of the Session, might be attended with great, he would not say insurmountable, inconvenience, and the date of the expiration of the act had been altered from the 25th July, or the 1st August, to the 1st July, upon the suggestion that if it were necessary to renew it, the subject would be brought forward at a period when comparatively few noble lords could attend in their places. In order to avoid this circumstance, a noble baron on the opposite side had even proposed an earlier date for the expiration of the measure. The noble earl, in the course of what he addressed to the House, had allowed to escape the true reason why he was anxious for delay, viz. that the pending trials might be concluded before the discussion; but what argument had he adduced to shew, that any benefit would be derived from the result? It seemed to him (Lord L.) no ground whatever for further and most inconvenient, if not dangerous, postponement. He agreed with the noble earl, that the present was not the fit time for discussing the general question; but this he would say, without fear of contradiction, that nothing but a strong sense of what was necessary for the safety of the country had induced Ministers to adopt a course so unpopular. Whatever odium might attach to them in consequence, they were ready to sustain; they had acted under a conviction of their duty, and from that duty they would not shrink. (Hear, hear.) The noble earl had entered into a discussion of the proceedings of the former Committees appointed by the two Houses of Parliament, selected from both sides, with a fair intention of procuring those whose discordant sentiments might lead to a true estimate of the state of the nation. Whatever attacks had been, or might be made upon their reports, certain it was that they were the deliberate and unanimous opinions of the whole body; and this unanimity was not the less observable, because when they came to the details of the measures, certain members of the Committee had expressed their disapprobation. All agreed in recommending the suspension of the Habeas Corpus; and he had therefore the opinion of the counsel on the other side for saying, that at that time the measure was necessary for the security of the country. With regard to the hand-bill produced by the noble lord, which had been circulated during a contested election, he could assure the House that he had never heard of it until this night; and he firmly believed that the noble lords beside him were in equal ignorance. That it was intended to be particularly agreeable to Ministers was not at all clear, for a plain reason—because the measure principally reprobated (the corn bill) was introduced and supported by them, and the individual particularly alluded to only gave a silent vote upon the question. His lordship had yet to learn that the purpose of it was to inflame the public mind generally, though its object might be to draw odium upon a single member of Parliament. He, however, was not the only sufferer; many of their lordships had suffered on similar occasions during sharply contested elections; and but one important lesson was taught by such publications, namely, the danger of using weapons of that kind. He trusted that the lesson would be read with profit by many of those who felt disappointment at the issue of the Norfolk election, and that they would in future abstain from appealing to and inflaming the basest passions of the lower orders. From whatever party such productions emanated, they would equally meet with his reprobation.

Earl Grosvenor heartily joined in the regret expressed by his noble friend (Earl Grey) that the Royal message, threatening such dreadful consequences, had been sent down to Parliament. Under such circumstances, all due savings ought to be most rigidly observed; and he called upon the noble lord on the woolsack, in general so stiff an advocate for precedents, to support the amendment of the previous question. A departure from the ordinary and established practice might be attended with the greatest inconvenience and the most dangerous consequences, as on some future occasion the proceedings of to-night might be quoted as an authority, when the Ministers wished to carry in haste some arbitrary and unconstitutional measure. The noble earl had intimated, that precedents did perhaps exist; if so, why were they not produced? Why had the noble secretary neglected his duty, in the face of his country, in not ascertaining whether his hasty and indecorous proceeding was or was not warranted? Under the present circumstances, such a neglect of established forms could not but be viewed with an eye of suspicion, more especially when the proceeding of the House on this very night was so contradictory: for the consideration of one message from the Throne, referring only to an individual, (the late Speaker), had been deferred; while, upon another, connected with the liberties of the whole people of the empire, the House was required, not merely to vote an address, but instantly to appoint a Committee, and to refer to it documents of the last importance. (Hear, hear.)

Earl Spencer acquitted the noble Secretary of all intention to take the House by surprise: the notice of the message put an end to that point. The question now was only this—whether on a subject of such magnitude, the reference of the papers to the Committee should be postponed for two days; and recollecting the measures to which the report of the former Committee had led, he would say, that if many precedents had been adduced in favour of precipitation, he should have deprecated any obedience to them: no number of precedents could satisfy him that the House should renew, without the utmost caution and repugnance, a measure giving powers unknown to the Constitution, to individuals who might abuse them. True it was, that the House had not been taken by surprise; but although previous notice of the message had been given, that would not appear upon the journals: so that in after-times the proceeding of this night might be quoted as an authority, not merely for voting an address, but for immediately, and without inquiry, referring papers sent down with it to a Committee of Secrecy. Might not such a precedent be employed on some distant occasion for the most dangerous purposes? (Hear, hear.) The case might have been different had the noble Secretary stated any peculiar urgency: had he told the House that an insurrection had broken out, or even that it was apprehended, it might have been proper to proceed with all possible dispatch. On the contrary, Ministers had themselves delayed for 10 days, and then they called upon the House to make up for the time they had lost, by the abandonment of its acknowledged rules. If the message had merely referred to an individual, his lordship should have objected to such needless precipitation; but when it respected the rights and freedom of the whole nation, he could not but resist it to the utmost of his power. With regard to the composition of the late Committee, it was, in his opinion, unobjectionable. For all the noble lords who were members of it he had great regard, but for some he entertained a more particular respect. Their lordships would not be at a loss to understand that he alluded to those noble lords with whom he was accustomed to act. He confessed, at the same time, that he could not see sufficient ground, so far as his own knowledge went, for the measures which had resulted from the appointment of that Committee; but at the time the report was made, he considered himself bound to respect the authority from which it proceeded. Circumstances, however, soon occurred, which excited greater doubts in his mind than he had before entertained on the subject, as they threw, he thought, discredit on some of the statements of the report. All this was calculated to render him more unwilling to give his assent to any new measures of the same kind. He hoped, therefore, that in the inquiry which was to be gone into, care would be taken that the facts stated should be well ascertained, and that their lordships would not be satisfied with the mere declaration of an opinion without strict investigation. The measure now proposed was of much greater importance than that which they had already adopted. They were now asked to take away the most important privilege of the Constitution, not merely for a limited time, and during the sitting of Parliament, but for an unlimited time, and whilst Parliament was not sitting. If there was a real necessity for the measure, let it be clearly shewn; otherwise their lordships should not agree to any restraint on the liberty of the subject. As to the present question, he objected to the precedent which the mode of proceeding proposed by the noble viscount would establish.

The Marquis of Buckingham thought the present question had nothing to do with the inquiries which were to be the objects of the consideration of the Committee, and that it ought to rest entirely on its own merits. Their lordships had not now to make up their minds as to the necessity of any measures, but to decide whether there should be a Committee or not. Sufficient notice had, in his opinion, been given; and what their lordships had now to consider was, whether a prima facie case had been made out for any Committee at all. Now he must contend, that such a case had been fully made out by the report of the former Committee: that afforded a sufficient ground for continuing precautionary proceedings. The first duty of Parliament, when such a communication as that which had been delivered was brought down from the Throne, was to take care that not a moment should be lost in entering on an inquiry. If no necessity existed for the measure now in force—if the state of the country was no longer what it had been proved to be, their lordships ought not to let a moment elapse before the laws which had been passed, were repealed; but when the Ministers of the Crown stated that a necessity for the continuance of those measures existed, it was the duty of the House to enter into an immediate inquiry on the subject.

Lord Holland was not a little astonished at what had fallen from his noble friend. The noble viscount had expressed his regret at having to bring down messages like that which had been just submitted to the House, though he contended for the necessity of the measures he proposed. That he should be anxious to forward his object without delay was what he could easily conceive; but he could not understand why other noble lords should shew an extraordinary impatience for the continuance of measures which went to subvert that system of liberty which had been established and maintained by our ancestors. It was true, the noble lord had given ten days' notice that he would bring down the message: he stated his intention of reconstructing all the machinery of Committees and Reports, and had clearly foretold what was to be the result of his operations; but all this had nothing to do with the present motion, which was a mere dry question of precedent. The noble lord, however, disdained to be bound by considerations of so dull a nature as mere matters of form. He (Lord H.) did not think so lightly of the subject. He could not carry his mind to that flight of Pindaric irregularity which the noble viscount appeared to have attained. Other noble lords, not so totally careless about precedents, had called for proof of their being none. It was singular enough that the onus probandi should be expected from those who said there were no precedents, rather than from those who asserted that they did exist. But his noble friend had said, that a primâ facie case was made out for the continuance of the measures proposed by Ministers. This reminded him of the transition from war to peace, (though that transition had now lasted, if not so long as some wars, at least as long as many a peace,) being cited as a reason for the continued distress of the country. If the report of the last Committee was to be taken as primâ facie evidence of the continuance of disaffection, the next report would afford a new primâ facie evidence; and so they might go on ad infinitum, without ever wanting a ground to deprive the people of their rights and liberties. With regard to the hand-bill which had been read, nothing had been said by the noble earl to remove the impression of his noble friend's statement. His noble friend had some reasons to believe that the circulators of the hand-bill at Norwich were the same persons who communicated the intelligence to the Secret Committee respecting the societies at Norwich, which was afterwards questioned and offered to be disproved. The noble lord, perhaps, would admit this. (Here Lord Sidmouth was understood to express his dissent to the statement of the noble baron). He should be very glad if the noble viscount shewed that the hand-bill did not proceed from the same persons in Norwich, whose communication to the Committee had been publicly, and, he might say, officially contradicted. What had passed, however, with respect to the late Report, would, he hoped, convince any Secret Committee that might henceforth be appointed, of the necessity of investigating with the greatest strictness the validity of the evidence submitted to their consideration. Their lordships remained without any information as to the persons who had been examined: and though it had been offered to be proved at the bar, that statements in the Report of the Committee were incorrect, the evidence so offered had not been accepted. From these circumstances it was to be concluded that the Report had not been the result of a fair inquiry; and that must be a very good reason with plain men for saying, that such a Report could not be primâ facie evidence of the necessity of continuing the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. The Ministers had asserted that great danger to the Constitution existed; they had asked for extraordinary powers to enable them to avert that danger. Great and extraordinary powers had been granted, and they had possessed them for three months; but instead of having removed the danger, as they pretended they would, they asked for the continuance of the same powers. This was a proof that the cure to which they had resorted was not the proper remedy for the disease. His noble friend, who observed that the question ought to rest on its own merits, and who thought the notice sufficient, had gone even farther in his contempt of precedents than the noble lord opposite. The notice, however, as he had already stated, referred merely to the bringing down the message; and with respect to the motion for the Committee, it was sufficient to observe, that no understanding respecting it appeared on the journals. If he approved of the measures that were now proposed, as much as from the bottom of his heart he detested them, still he should be anxious to shew the most careful attention to the rules and orders of the House. On these grounds he should oppose the motion for appointing a Committee.

The Marquis of Buckingham explained. He had not said that the Report of the Committee afforded a ground for continuing the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, but for agreeing to the proposed inquiry into the state of the country. His noble friend had greatly misunderstood his principles, if he supposed him so indifferent to the advantages of the Constitution as such an opinion would imply.

The motion was then agreed to, without a division.

Lord Sidmouth said, it was not his wish to give occasion for farther discussion; but as their lordships had agreed to refer the message of the Prince Regent, and the papers which accompanied it, to a Committee, it was now necessary to consider in what manner that Committee ought to be appointed. The usual mode in which former Secret Committees had been selected was, by ballot; but that mode required the preparation of glasses, and the depositing of lists, which would occasion considerable delay. He thought, therefore, that immediate nomination would be more consistent with the course which had been taken. The noble earl did not appear to be impressed with a very favourable opinion of ballots, though he understood that he was not perfectly satisfied with the name it was thought advisable to propose as a substitute for the noble duke who had declined to sit on the renewed Committee. Of the propriety of that nomination it would be for the House to judge. He should, as he had before stated, move the re-appointment of the former Committee, with the single exception of that name.—His lordship concluded by moving the names of the noble lords who composed the former Committee, substituting the Earl of Talbot for the Duke of Bedford.

Earl Grey did not dispute the noble lord's influence in that House, whether the Committee should be chosen by ballot or nomination; but though a ballot required glasses, lists, and various preparations, which would occasion a delay, he did not consider that objectionable. When it was proposed to continue the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, it was the duty of the House to proceed with the greatest caution, and every delay was therefore an advantage.

The noble earl concluded by proposing the Earl of Rosslyn instead of the Earl of Talbot, as a substitute for the Duke of Bedford.

Lord Sidmouth said a few words in opposition to this motion.

Lord Holland observed, that he had no objection, personal, or political, to the noble earl who had been proposed by the noble viscount; but as it was understood that that noble earl was going to Ireland, (as Lord Lieutenant), he did not think him on that account the most proper person that might be chosen. Ireland was the only part of the empire to which Ministers had not thought it necessary to extend the benefit of their precautionary measures; and why a noble earl who was about to proceed to that part of the United Kingdom should be appointed on this Committee, he could not see, unless it was wished that he should take a lesson as to the manner of getting up measures of this sort before he proceeded further.

The Earl of Liverpool recapitulated the proceedings which had been adopted on the appointment of the former Committee. It being the opinion of the Executive Government that there should be a farther inquiry into the state of the country, what medium for that inquiry could be more proper than the late Committee?

If their lordships had no reason to distrust that Committee, if they still thought it worthy of their confidence, they would on such an occasion readily agree to a motion for its revival. On every consideration, he would maintain that the former Committee was the most proper that could be appointed for the investigation. The reappointment of the whole of the members, without any alteration, would have been proposed; but a noble duke, from motives which he unquestionably felt to be of the most honourable nature, had declined to attend. He could see nothing solid in the ground on which the noble baron opposite had objected to the noble earl who had been proposed to supply the place of the noble duke. Any station in which the noble earl might hereafter be placed could afford no reason for rejecting his services on this occasion. His going to Ireland, if such an event should take place, would not incapacitate him from being a member of the Committee. On the contrary, there were circumstances which seemed more particularly to point out that noble earl to their lordships' choice. His having been Lord Lieutenant of a county in which disturbances had occurred, and in the suppression of which he had conducted himself with the greatest propriety and ability, surely could not render him unfit for the inquiries to which the attention of the Committee was to be directed. He concluded by moving that the name of Lord Sidmouth be added to the Committee (Lord Sidmouth having omitted his own name in reading the list.)

Earl Grey saw no necessity for the new Committee being of precisely the same number as the last. There was no magic in the number 11, and he should therefore withdraw his motion for substituting Earl Rosslyn for Earl Talbot, and move that the name of his noble friend be added to the Committee.

The Earl of Liverpool objected to this, as informal. As the Committee was to be revived, the number of members could not be altered.

Lord Holland said, it would appear from the journals, that a motion had been made for increasing the number; the reason of the alteration would therefore be recorded: it would appear that the Committee of 11 was revived, but that the House had thought proper to add one to the number.

Earl Grey, to remove the difficulty made by the noble earl opposite, suggested, that as the Lord Chancellor was much occupied with other important avocations, his noble friend should be substituted for the learned lord on the woolsack.

The Lord Chancellor, on putting the question, said, "the motion is, that the Lord Chancellor, on account of his numerous avocations, shall be excluded from the Committee; ought I to add, that Lord Rosslyn, on account of his avocations, shall be substituted for the Lord Chancellor?" (A laugh.)

This motion was negatived, and the list as proposed by Ministers agreed to.

rose to call the attention of the House to the correspondence which had passed between the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the magistrates of the county of Berks, relative to the prisoners confined in consequence of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. The acts which had passed in the beginning of this Session, had, in the first place, given the noble Secretary of State the power of committing any person charged with treason to prison, and detaining him there without trial; and, in the second place, he was empowered to remove the persons so committed from one prison to another at his pleasure. Such powers required to be vigilantly observed; and it was on this ground he thought it his duty to bring under the consideration of their lordships a correspondence which had recently appeared in the public prints. And here he must ask, whether it was not to be understood that the visiting magistrates of a county ought to perform their duties on their own responsibility, without appealing to the Executive Government for instruction on legal questions? The noble Secretary of State was no expounder of the law. To impose restrictions on magistrates in visiting prisons did not belong to his office. The magistrates of Berks had, however, addressed a set of queries to the noble viscount, which he had answered, and he must say that his answers were all improper; and one of them appeared to him illegal and contrary to the provision of an existing statute. He should at present content himself with reading the queries and the replies, with the Act of Parliament (31st of the King) which applied to the question. Here the noble lord read the following documents:

“Q. May magistrates generally of the county of Berks visit the State Prisoners in common with other prisoners, which they are privileged to do, and ask questions and enter into conversation with them?—A. No, except upon special reasons being assigned, which must be submitted to and judged of by the Secretary of State.

Q. If State Prisoners may have a copy of official directions to gaolers?—A. No.

Q. If they may have free use of pen, ink, and paper, under certain restrictions, as ordered by the official directions?—A. Vide official directions, which must be strictly observed.

Q. If they may read the public London or provincial newspapers, under certain restrictions?—A. No.

Q. If they may have books to read from circulating libraries?—A. Such books as are approved of by the visiting magistrate.

Q. If they may have wine, or strong beer, or ale, in limited quantities, at their own expense, or that of Government?—A. What quantity is desired.

Q. If through the day they be confined in solitary cells, and at night in better apartments, if such can be procured by magistrates for them?

—A. To be confined in such manner as has been usual, and in such apartments as have been heretofore allotted to State Prisoners.

Now, he did not mean to animadvert upon all the answers, though all of them were harsh; and to all of them it might be objected that they were unnecessary, for the Secretary of State had taken upon himself to give directions for the management of prisons, and the treatment of prisoners, where law or practice ought to constitute the rule; but where both law and practice were wanting the noble Secretary of himself decided. He would particularly mention the official instructions respecting books and papers to be allowed to the prisoners as both harsh and unjust. They had the authority of his noble friend upon the woolsack, that prisoners had a right to present petitions, if they were bona fide petitions; (see page 416.) but how were they to draw them up, if they did not know the directions given to gaolers upon that subject? But the first question, and the answer to it, was the point to which he more especially wished to call the attention of their lordships. The answer to that question said, that visiting magistrates were not to visit State prisoners. Now there was an act, 31 Geo. III. ch. 46, directly in the face of this answer. The clause to which he particularly alluded expressly enjoined “that justices of the peace shall, at every general or quarter-sessions, appoint two or more visiting justices, who shall personally visit the common gaols, houses of correction, and penitentiary houses, at least three times in each quarter of the year; shall take cognizance of the treatment and condition of the prisoners, of the state of the prisons, and of the conduct of the gaolers; and shall give redress according to the circumstances that come under their view; that the visiting justices shall, at every quarter-sessions, report their compliance and their observations; and that the chairman of the quarter-sessions call upon them for such report.” Here the law was express, and not only gave permission, but rendered it imperative upon magistrates to visit the prisoners. There was no exception as to State prisoners; it was a general imperative appointment, that they shall visit the gaols, and inquire into the state of the prisoners. There was another section in the same act which was not imperative, but which said that all magistrates might enter into gaols, and examine into the treatment of the prisoners; and if they saw any abuse, they should report it to the next quarter-sessions: and upon such report being made, it should be taken into immediate consideration, and no abuse so reported should be allowed any longer to continue. The noble Secretary had improved upon the Act of Parliament, and, upon his own authority, prohibited magistrates from visiting certain prisoners. The power thus arrogated he thought most illegal and most unconstitutional. The noble Secretary had done by his fat what the Legislature had not done, and what he (Lord H.) believed they would not do. The two first clauses of the Declaration of Rights—the second was, in effect, the same with the first—were, that the laws of the land shall not be dispensed with: so anxious were those enlightened men at the Revolution to preserve the laws essential to the due administration of justice. If the noble Secretary had found the laws insufficient, he ought to have manfully come down to Parliament, and called for an alteration; but instead of that, the noble Secretary thought proper to give his own authority, and to direct magistrates to act upon his opinion; but, be it observed, upon their own peril. The noble Secretary, without taking upon himself any danger, had told them that they might do certain things.—The noble lord concluded with moving, “That copies of all the communications regarding Reading gaol, between the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the magistrates of Reading, Berkshire, be laid upon the table.”

Lord Sidmouth said, he understood the noble lord to charge him with having assumed to himself an unconstitutional power, and having exercised unnecessary harshness in the discharge of his official duties. He had never acted from his own bare opinion; he had always taken the best advice. The answers were not his, but those of the law-officers of the Crown. He knew that he was responsible for the opinion; he mentioned it, not from a desire of throwing the responsibility off himself, but to shew that he had acted with every possible deliberation. He always considered that gaols were his Majesty's gaols. They were subject to his Majesty, and regulated by Royal prerogative. The 31st of the King, chap. 46, in no degree affected the prerogative of the Crown, to give instructions respecting state prisoners. He would appeal to his learned friend on the woolsack, that it was not the same with state prisoners as other prisoners. They were directed “to be kept in close and safe custody,” and the gaolers, in their treatment, were liable to the Secretary of State. The King's Bench, in like manner, acted for the King, and two eminent judges of that Court had decided on the very principle for which he contended. Lord Holt had decided, that a wife could not see her husband, confined on a charge of treason, without other persons being present. Lord Raymond had decided that near relatives could not visit but in similar circumstances. The suspension of the Habeas Corpus had enabled the Secretary of State to commit several persons for high treason, and to him belonged the right of giving all directions concerning them. In the exercise of this right he had consulted the first legal authorities in this country, and had in no degree exceeded his powers to which they thought him entitled. With respect to the mode in which this duty was performed, he had strictly adhered to the opinions of the Attorney-General at the time, and no greater harshness was exercised, than in every instance of a long period during which the Habeas Corpus was formerly suspended—he meant from 1793. He did not think it right to lay claim to greater humanity than his predecessors. With respect to the particular case before their lordships, the magistrates of Berkshire put certain queries; and received specific answers. The noble lord could only say, that he had seen a paper in which those queries and answers were stated. He would put it to their lordships, whether, upon this primâ facie case, they could so far impute blame to him as to order the production of any documents? He had shewn no harshness in the exercise of his duties; he had followed the example of his predecessors. He must, therefore, resist the motion of the noble lord. Nothing was more necessary for discharging the arduous and important duties of his situation than that he should possess the confidence of their lordships. If they agreed to the motion, it would have the appearance of blaming and censuring him as having been harsh and arbitrary in the exercise of his office. He should bow to the decision of their lordships, but he trusted that if they did not think that blame attached to his conduct, they would not hold out to the country that his proceedings were so suspicious as to justify inquiry.

Earl Grey observed, that he was not prepared to speak upon this question, yet he must speak in consequence of what had been said by the noble Secretary. A more mitigated answer could have been given to all the questions. With respect to papers and books, there seemed to have been a very unnecessary degree of rigour and severity exercised. But whether the noble lord had exceeded his powers, the Act of Parliament was express and decisive. One clause was explicit, actually compelling magistrates to visit prisoners. Another was equally explicit, empowering them to visit. He had felt very curious to hear the noble Secretary's answer to this point. The act had appeared to him clear and distinct; and unless the noble lord could cite some subsequent statutes in his favor, his conduct was in direct contravention of a public law made to protect prisoners from undue harshness and injustice. What answer then did the noble lord give? His answer did not a little surprise him. Usage was appealed to. Judges in the King's Bench had decided to his purpose. It could not be denied, that Lords Holt and Raymond, were eminent and distinguished judges; but the decisions referred to were not in point. They regarded quite a different principle. The noble lord ought to have shewn that they had prevented magistrates from visiting gaols: but even then the authority would not have applied, because they lived prior to the 31st George III. Since that period nothing was stated to have been enacted to alter the statute. If any usage could be shewn against it, the power of this express law was sacred and conclusive; no usage, however, had been in any shape brought forward to justify his lordship's conduct; but prerogative had been appealed to as above acts of Parliament. This was a new and extraordinary doctrine. The manner, too, in which the noble lord had availed himself of this argument deserved attention: gaols were the King's gaols, and, therefore, State-prisoners were subject to the arbitrary regulations of the Secretary of State! If this argument applied to one gaol, it applied to all gaols; if to one prisoner, to all prisoners. All gaols were the King's, and all prisoners were the King's. How was it possible to make any distinction? The prerogative must be equally applicable to all. It could not be pretended that the Legislature had passed a law of this kind, and excepted State-prisoners. State-prisoners were rather objects of peculiar protection; and an act would be found with an exception in their favour. He did not know whether there was abuse in this case, but they were told that the Secretary of State had done what on the face of it appeared to be in contravention of an Act of Parliament. If the noble Secretary did not give something better than the opinion of the law-officers of the Crown, he would put it to their lordships whether prerogative could be a valid defence for violating an act of Parliament? The question was, whether the prerogative gave such a right. But the noble lord here again precluded inquiry by urging that a presumption of blame would arise, if an order for the production of the papers in question stood upon their journals; and he claimed a degree of confidence from their lordships, as necessary for discharging his duties with satisfaction to himself and benefit to the country. He, on the contrary, contended, that a constitutional jealousy that would not sleep was not only wholesome but necessary. The motion went merely to inquire into an apparent contravention of an act of Parliament. The fair inference from such a charge, prima facie, according to the noble Secretary's expression, was, that their lordships could not dismiss it without farther inquiry. If the noble Secretary should be found to have acted conformably to his powers, he would stand acquitted and absolved, and the sentence of their lordships would relieve him from blame: but because an inquiry implied that the noble Secretary might have acted illegally, they could not enter into an inquiry! This was a proposition, he trusted, which their lordships would never admit. All they wanted was information. The noble Secretary was charged with a departure from the line of conduct prescribed to him by law: their lordships could not, without a departure from their duty, refrain from calling upon him for his justification. He felt now more anxious than ever for an inquiry, in consequence of the plea set up by the noble lord. He most earnestly hoped that their lordships would investigate the law and practice upon this point, and hence

The Earl of Liverpool considered the proper view of the act of the 31st of the King to be very different from that which had been taken of it by noble lords opposite. The noble Secretary of State had said, that he had acted conformably to practice; but that the regulations he had prescribed were more lenient than on former occasions. The noble earl would not enter into arguments at that time concerning the regulations, whether right or wrong; but he could see no ground of doubt, that from 1791 to the present period, State-prisoners had been subject to regulations in the manner now adopted. There was, therefore, the experience of 26 years in favour of what had been done. During that time, unfortunately, owing to pressing circumstances, the Habeas Corpus Act had been repeatedly suspended, and many individuals had been indicted and tried for the crime of high treason. He thought that, during that period, there were the best legal authorities in favour of the conduct pursued: but, still, before the act of the 31st of the King passed, there were other acts existing which regulated the conduct of justices of the peace with respect to gaols. He must maintain that it never was contemplated by those who introduced that act, those who passed it, or those who read it, that it was intended to interfere with particular regulations respecting State-prisoners. All authority of law and Parliament was contrary to such an interpretation.

The Earl of Rosslyn said, he did not mean to enter much into legal arguments; but he thought it his duty to look at the provisions of the act itself. In this he was borne out by the noble Secretary of State, who, on a former occasion, had observed, that it was not the meaning of the movers and supporters of an act that ought to be considered; but that they were to examine what the law really enacted. Looking at the act, on that principle, he could find none of the exceptions with respect to State-prisoners. It gave the magistrates certain powers as to all confined in prisons. To take away any of the privileges of the magistrates would, in his view, be against the law. If the noble lord could shew him that any case on the subject had ever been brought fairly into discussion by a judicial proceeding, and had been decided according to his opinions, he might yield to his arguments and construction; but it did not appear that any such case could be adduced: no precedent, if appeared, could be shewn as a reason for the violation and abrogation of this particular law. Let the matter be brought fairly before the House, and if a new statute was necessary, let it be enacted: at all events, there should be an end to proceedings of which the authors were not sure that they were supported by the law of the land.

face the observations which he intended to make with the same protest which he had made on a late legal question in that House—he meant, that he must beg not to be concluded or bound by any opinion which he gave as a member of that House, beyond that night. (See page 1047.) The plain reason for such a protest was this—that as that House was the dernier resort of all questions of law, it was important that the ultimate decision should not be prejudiced by any obiter dictum on an accidental motion. It was the less necessary that he should interfere with any opinion, because there was a regular remedy for any abuse of the existing law. If the gaoler did wrong, he might be proceeded against by action. He did not mean to say that the liberty of the subject was not a question deserving the gravest discussion of the House: but he should wish, whenever so important a subject was to be agitated, that due notice should be given. At present he was taken somewhat by surprise, and therefore was not prepared with such authorities as he should have collected, had he expected to be called upon for them. As it was, he must say that it would be much better to introduce a bill, to declare formally the law on this subject. One thing he could state, which bore strongly on the present question; and this was, that, in point of law, every gaol in the kingdom was the King's, and therefore under the Royal control. He could say that, in 1793 and 1794, it was never thought for a moment that the King's Counsel or the Secretary of State had not the power of giving advice as to the regulation of prisoners: he was perfectly sure that regulations and directions were issued from day to day. He was ready to admit that no right of the subject should be taken away, except on the most mature deliberation, and after a perfect conviction of its necessity: and, in the present case, if he had not been taken by surprise, he would have gone into the fullest consideration of the question; as it was, he must say that the prerogative of the Crown ought not any more than the liberty of the people, to be taken away without the most attentive investigation. For these reasons, although he attached the highest importance to the treatment of prisoners, he must object to the present motion, on the ground that the evil sought to be remedied should be made the subject of a particular bill, and should not be concluded by a mere motion in that House.

Earl Spencer conceived the main point to be, whether magistrates should be deprived of that power of visiting prisons which the law had hitherto given to them. The noble and learned lord would perhaps recover from that surprise which he at present professed if the question were adjourned to another day; he would then find that consideration which he thought to be so necessary for a right decision of so important a point: with this view, therefore, and because he thought the question one of the highest moment, he should move to adjourn it: and unless the House were at once prepared to declare that magistrates should no longer have the power of inspecting the King's gaols, he hoped that his motion would be agreed to. He should propose Monday next as the day of adjournment.

Lord Holland rose to state that he was ready to support the motion of the noble earl, and on the grounds which he had assigned. He could not but observe, that the noble and learned lord on the woolsack took particular pains to explain away the effect of any sentence which he uttered that could be construed in favour of the liberty of the people. When he had to speak on such subjects, he was always most anxious in begging not to be concluded by what he said, as if he feared that any opinion should fall from him too favourable to the cause of the public. (Hear, hear.) However, the main point now before the House was, whether the noble Secretary was justified in suspending the right hitherto possessed by magistrates of inspecting all the gaols of the kingdom. The noble lord had admitted that justices were enabled, under the act, to visit the gaols; but he seemed to contend that it was a part of the King's prerogative to keep them out of the gaols. He had called the gaols the King's gaols, and seemed to consider them exclusively under the jurisdiction of his Ministers; but the same language might be held of the army, the navy, the courts of justice, and of many other branches of the executive. It was in common language the King's army, the King's court, the King's navy; but no one ever contended that on that account these branches of public service were exempt from the ordinary operation of the laws. The reasons applied by the Secretary of State for exemption from the provisions of this act went equally to sweep away the authority of all Acts of Parliament. In other cases, indeed, the noble lord had been ready enough to allow the magistrates a power of expounding Acts of Parliament, but the moment this power might interfere with the exercise of his own authority, he had contended that they ought not to be allowed to exercise it. It was no argument to say that the act was an unreasonable act: it stood as the law of the land, and as such could not be departed from. He, therefore, called on the House to inquire into this matter, or at least to pause before they denied all inquiry. When a pretence had been set up for the suspension of our most valuable rights, it more than ever became the Legislature to inquire into the exercise of these new authorities; and not a word had been said to lessen the force of the act, or the clause of it which he first read to their lordships. He could not allow that the practice pursued since 1791 furnished any reason for what had now been done. The point he wished to bring before their lordships was, not whether this business was warranted by precedent, or even whether it was legal, but whether, in the very teeth of an Act of Parliament, it was competent to the Secretary of State to tell the magistrates that they were not to visit the gaols within their jurisdiction. The noble lord then disclaimed any intention of taking the House by surprise, and alleged that he had given repeated notice of this discussion.

The question that the debate should be adjourned to Monday next was then put and negatived, as was the original question.

1st. Because it was acknowledged in debate, that in the correspondence moved for, his Majesty's Secretary of State refused permission to certain Justices of the Peace for the County of Berks (See printed queries and answers,) to visit the State Prisoners confined in the Gaol of Reading, to ask questions of them, or to enter into conversation with them; and it is expressly enacted in the fifth Section of an Act of the 31st of the present King, intituled, 'An Act for the better regulating of County Gaols and other places of confinement,' "that certain Justices of the Peace appointed by the General or Quarter Sessions shall, either together or singly, personally visit and inspect both the common Gaols and other the houses of correction or other places of confinement, at least three times in each quarter of the year, and oftener if occasion shall require, and shall examine into the state of the buildings, and the behaviour and conduct of the respective officers, and the treatment and condition of the prisoners; and furthermore shall at any General or Quarter Sessions make a Report in writing of the state and condition of the same, and of all abuses which may occur to their observation; and the chairman of the said Sessions is hereby required to call upon the said visitors for such Report;" it is moreover in the same section expressly declared, that "it shall be lawful for every Justice of the Peace for such County, Riding, or Division, of his own accord, and without being appointed a visitor, to enter into and examine the same at such time or times, and as often as he shall think fit, and if he shall discover any abuses therein, he is required to report them in writing at the next General or Quarter Sessions of the Peace."

We could not reconcile it to our duty to reject all further inquiry into the violation of a statute neither obsolete nor ambiguous, and when we adverted to the quarter from whence such disobedience to the law had originated, we deemed ourselves called upon to protect one of the most essential rights of the people, vindicated at the Revolution of 1688, and asserted in the Act of the 1st of William and Mary, namely,

1. That the pretended power of suspending laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of Parliament, is illegal.
- 2. That the pretended power of dispensing with the laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal."

sdly. Because the argument urged in debate, that the prerogative of the Crown extends to the regulation of all his Majesty's gaols, that consequently no Act of Parliament relating to them can, without reciting the previous consent of the Crown, be imperative against the mandates of a Secretary of State, appears to us unfounded in principle, inconclusive in its application, and highly dangerous in its consequences.

A prerogative, however undisputed; cannot, we presume, counteract the force of an Act of Parliament, sanctioned by the three branches of the Legislature, and consequently consented to by the Crown.

The Justices authorized by the 31st of the King to visit the common Gaols of their respective counties, do not, by complying with the, alter any regulations made by his Majesty; they act under his commission; they are removable at his will, and they are permitted, and in some cases required, to enforce the regulations for gaols, issuing either from the Crown in virtue of its prerogative, or from any other lawful authority. The provisions, therefore, of the 31st of the King, cannot interfere with the prerogative of the Crown, to whatever extent that prerogative may be supposed to exist.

If the claim of unlimited prerogative is to be set up in all Institutions, which, in the language of the law, belong to the King, and if the laws of the land, after passing the two Houses of Parliament, and receiving the Royal assent, have no power to limit that prerogative, then in all things relating to the army, the navy, and the Courts of Justice, the dispensing power, which our ancestors struggled to extinguish, is revived, and the securities devised for our property, our liberties, and our lives, by the wisdom of Parliament, exist only at the mercy of the advisers of the Crown—a system which would substitute arbitrary will for positive law, convert Parliament itself into an useless appendage of a Court, and our free Constitution into an absolute Government dependent on the caprice of a Monarch and his Advisers.

sdly. Because the law does not enact, not does reason require any difference of treatment between State-prisoners and other prisoners committed to a Common Gaol; and should the exigencies of the State require such difference to be made, the Secretary of State has it in his power to commit in the first instance, or afterwards to convey such prisoners to fortresses and other places of confinement more immediately under the direction of the advisers of the Crown, and not, as we apprehend, included in the provisions of the 31st of the King.

4thly. Because no practice previous to the passing of the Act, and none subsequent to it (if any such were pretended), can justify his Majesty's Secretary of State in departing so entirely from its spirit and its letter, as to prevent the Magistrates from executing duties plainly enjoined, and from exerting powers without any reserve or exception conferred upon them by an Act of Parliament, clear in its construction and consistent in its provisions: and when this branch of the Legislature has so recently been called upon to concur in the temporary suspension of the most valuable laws of the land, we felt it more imperiously our bounden duty to watch over the statutes which are still permitted to exist, and to enforce an obedience to the remaining laws in those who are entrusted with the execution of them, and already invested with powers so extraordinary and so liable to abuse.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, June 3.

At half past three o'clock the Deputy Usher of the Black Rod appeared at the bar, and commanded the attendance of the Commons in the House of Peers, to hear the Royal commission read regarding the confirmation of the choice of the Speaker.

The House went, and being returned, Mr. Speaker reported, that the Lords who were authorized, by commission, to communicate the Royal pleasure, had expressed the approbation of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, of the choice which the House had made of a Speaker. The right hon. gentleman said, he would again take the opportunity of expressing the high and grateful sense that he entertained of the distinction that had been conferred upon him, and the confidence reposed in him. He was sensible how unworthy he was of that high honour, and how much he should require their assistance, in executing the arduous duties which he should have to discharge; but he was confident that, as long as he exerted his humble endeavours to the utmost of his power in their service, an appeal to their indulgence would never be made in vain. (Hear.) He would implore them to support him in maintaining the rights and privileges of Parliament, which were as valuable to the welfare and security of the people, as they were necessary to the existence, the dignity, and the efficiency of the House. (Hear, hear.) It would be his anxious care, as it was his duty, to enforce the orders of the House, as the surest safeguard of these rights, and the best means of preserving them. He had now to suggest, that, as there were several dropt orders and notices, owing to the late interruption to public business, it would be convenient now to fix the time for their discussion.

Lord Castlereagh suggested, that as to-morrow (the King's birth-day) was a day on which it was not usual to transact any public business, that circumstance should be taken into consideration in making these arrangements. The lord then moved that the House at its rising should adjourn till Thursday, which was agreed to.

The dropt notices and orders were then fixed for future days.

POLICE REPORT.] Mr. Bennet rose and said, he held in his hand a Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the Police of the Metropolis. He had seen with surprise that it was published in a Sunday newspaper; (The Observer) although none of the members had yet received a copy of it through the regular channel by which such proceedings were communicated. He was entirely unacquainted with the manner in which it had been obtained; and he mentioned the fact, not for the purpose of making any formal complaint of its publication, but for stating that those who enjoyed the confidence of the House, and whose business it was to circulate copies of its printed reports among its members, had not on this occasion performed their duty.

EXTENTS IN AID.] Mr. H. Davis presented a petition of certain merchants, bankers, traders, and others, inhabitants of the city of Bristol, against Extents in Aid, which, after a few words from Mr. Protheroe, in support of its prayer, was ordered to lie on the table.

HABEAS CORPUS.—LONDON COMMON COUNCIL PETITION.] The Sheriffs of London appeared at the bar, and presented a petition passed at a meeting of the Common Council against the farther suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. The petition was read, and, on the motion of Sir W. Curtis, was ordered to lie on the table.

LAW OF TREASON.] Mr. Curwen said, he rose to move for a paper of great importance at the present time. It related to the due and pure administration of the justice of the country, and involved a question of the most serious interest. It might be said at all times, that subjects of this kind demanded the utmost vigilance and jealousy of Parliament, but more especially at the present period, when our liberties were suspended, and our Constitution was in abeyance. The case to which he referred regarded the law of treason as applicable to the prisoners in the Tower, whose trial would shortly come on. (See the note, p. 1280.) This law, in order to protect the subject, required that persons accused of the crime of high treason should be furnished with the names and designation of all the witnesses who were to be brought forward by the prosecution against them, ten days before their trial took place. It appeared in the present instance that this form had been complied with in a manner that would defeat the object which the law had in view. It was known, that on the evidence of 41 witnesses the bill was found against the prisoners; and a list of no less than 240 witnesses had been served upon them as prepared to appear at their trial. He was old enough to remember, that in 1798, an attempt was made in Parliament to destroy this salutary privilege of having a list of the witnesses, as regarded the persons then accused of high treason, and that it excited much discussion in the House. He recollected that, on that occasion, that eminent statesman, Mr. Fox, who always lent the exertion of his great talents in defence of the rights and liberties of his country, contended strenuously against this violation of the law.

Mr. Curwen proceeded. He conceived himself perfectly in order, and could not see the propriety of the noble lord's interruption. Mr. Pitt at that time had endeavoured to shew, that it was not necessary to serve the prisoners with a list of witnesses; and he (Mr. C.) who had then a seat in the House, had stood up and contended for the privilege. It was then understood to be the law, that prisoners in this situation could not be refused this right, but it might be rendered nugatory by the mode in which it was granted. If in a list of 240 witnesses, there were 199 more than necessary, as would appear to be the case in this instance, of what use was it that any list at all should be supplied, except for distracting the prisoners? Was the letter of the law to be kept, while its spirit was neglected? Then why not repeal the law at once? It was surely better that every thing should be open and fair, than that the subject should be mocked with the semblance of a right that no longer existed in reality. (Hear, hear.) The treason might arise out of the measures of the Ministry; and where was the safeguard of the subject, if the law was thus to be defeated by the mode in which the public prosecutor brought on its administration? He was entitled to shew some jealousy on this head, when he considered that Government were endeavouring to create a belief in plots and conspiracies which the country universally disclaimed. (Hear, hear.) He would ask, were 240 witnesses necessary to give evidence against the unfortunate persons now charged with State offences; or was not the number multiplied beyond what was requisite for obtaining the ends of justice, to prevent the prisoners from knowing who would really appear against them? He accused Ministers of knowing this circumstance, but he did not deny that it admitted of explanation. If they were not aware of it, he trusted they would thank him for the information, and take steps to remedy the evil, as there was yet sufficient time. Adverting to the notice which had been given of a Message on the state of the country, and the appointment of a committee, he expressed a hope that no Report would be made to the House on plots and conspiracies, till after the trial of those prisoners, as any such Report might excite alarm, and prejudice the minds of the jury. (Hear.) He concluded by moving, "that there be laid before this House, copies of the lists of witnesses served on the Prisoners in the Tower, now under arraignment for high treason." (Hear, hear.)

The Attorney-General said, that the list was necessarily extensive, because it was imperative on the public prosecutor, in cases of high treason, to state the name and designation of every witness that could be called to give evidence on every fact that it might be requisite for the ends of justice to establish at the trial. In other cases, either civil or criminal, as was known to every person acquainted with the forms of legal proceedings, witnesses might be called to speak to any fact, the effect of whose testimony could not be known till the cause came to be heard. Here it was not necessary to give previous notice; but the law was different in charges of treason. A list of all the witnesses to be examined must previously be given, and no witness whose name and designation were not previously given could be heard. The prosecutor should, therefore, have credit for not inserting the name of any witness, whose evidence might not contingently be useful and necessary. He trusted that he should be believed when he said, that those who had the conduct of the trial had no wish but to promote the ends of justice, and that they had not swelled the list of witnesses for any purpose of perplexing the prisoners. (Hear, hear, hear.) They were actuated solely by the desire of arming themselves with all the testimony that they thought necessary for establishing the facts of the indictment, and had not named one human being whom they might not feel it their duty to call, and whose evidence might not turn out to be of the greatest importance in the result of the trial. (Hear, hear.) When he said this, he did not mean to insinuate, much less to assert, that every individual mentioned in the list would be examined; but it was impossible for him, or any one, to say beforehand who should or who should not be called. Particular facts in a long train of transactions might be substantiated by particular testimony, which separately would be of no moment, but which taken in connection might be very important. (Hear, hear.) If in such a case they did not arm themselves with the means of proving such facts, they would be guilty of a great dereliction of duty. It was certainly in such a case no abuse of the law to state all the persons who might by possibility give necessary evidence.—The hon. and learned gentleman deprecated discussions like the present, which might prejudice the ends of justice, and could be productive of no possible benefit. (Hear.) The minds of the jury might be so affected by them as to prevent them from executing their duty with that impartiality which was expected. He therefore opposed the motion of the hon. gentleman as perfectly uncalled for.

Mr. Curwen said, from the explanation given by the hon. and learned gentleman, he would not press his motion, though he was satisfied that in making it he had done his duty, and produced some good.—The motion was then withdrawn.

USURY LAWS.] Mr. Sergeant Onslow presented a petition of certain inhabitants of Belfast, praying that the House would take into its consideration the propriety of removing all restrictions on the interest of money.—Ordered to lie on the table.

NEW WRIT FOR OXFORD.] Sir William Scott moved, that the Speaker should issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new writ for the return of a member to serve in the present Parliament for the University of Oxford, in the room of the right hon. Charles Abbot, the late Speaker, who had been called up to the other House by the title of Baron Colchester.—Ordered.

NEW WRIT FOR LONDON.] Sir William Gwilt, after a slight allusion to the continued indisposition of one of his respected colleagues, moved for a new writ for the return of a member to serve as a representative of the city of London, in the room of Harvey Combe, Esq. who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.—Ordered.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.] Lord Castlereagh appeared at the bar with a Message from the Prince Regent, relative to the state of the country, similar to the one presented to the House of Lords, for which see page 1276.—The noble lord then moved that this Message should be taken into consideration on Thursday next.—Ordered.

THE LATE SPEAKER.] Lord Castlereagh then brought up a Message from the Prince Regent respecting the late Speaker, similar to the one presented to the Lords, see page 1276.—His lordship gave notice, that he should on Thursday move a vote of thanks to the late Speaker.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave notice, that he should move the consideration of the Message on the same day.

Mr. C. W. Wynn expressed his astonishment at the mode of proceeding adopted by the advisers of the Crown on this occasion. Nobody would concur more willingly than himself, in a vote of thanks to Lord Colchester, because it appeared to him to be a just and necessary proceeding; but why did the Crown interfere to prevent the House from going farther, and from originating every other reward that was due to his acknowledged merits? His services had been performed in that House, and from that House, therefore, ought their recompense to proceed. (Hear, hear.) The only similar case was that of Mr. Speaker Onslow, and in that case the proceeding was initiated by an address from the House to the Throne. This was not a mere question upon a point of form; it was not a matter of indifference that persons sitting in that chair should be accustomed to look to the Crown for the reward of their exertions in it. (Cries of hear.) Strictly speaking, the Crown could know nothing of what passed in that Message, respecting the late Speaker. [1804

House, nor be able to appreciate the merits of the Speaker in the discharge of the duties of the chair. Had the Message been preceded by an address; every objection would have been precluded; but the services in question were of that nature which, for peculiar reasons, ought in the first instance to be fully recognized and appreciated by the House.

Lord Castlereagh hoped that the House would do his Majesty's Ministers the justice to believe, that it never could be their wish or intention to stand between the liberality of the House and the individual in question; but that right hon. person having been raised to the distinguished dignity of the peerage, the purport of the Message ought to be understood as inviting the House to make a provision in consideration of the title, and not of his services as Speaker. (Cries of no, no.)

Mr. Ponsonby professed himself quite astonished at the explanation offered by the noble lord. How he could say on his legs in that House, that the proposed reward was not in consequence of the late Speaker's services, or how, being in what was vulgarly called a scrape, he could endeavour so to get out of it, was to him a most surprising incident. The very words of the Message itself declared that it was founded upon those services. (Hear.) The Crown had not, in fact, any constitutional right to take notice of their Speaker's services, and it was a flagrant violation of their first privileges in Ministers to have thus advised it. He knew not what course it might be now most expedient to pursue, but he hoped the House would not cease to maintain its constitutional and established rights. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. H. Sumner agreed entirely with the observations of the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Wynn) in stating his objections to the present form of proceeding, but saw no way of getting out of the difficulty into which his Majesty's Ministers had led them. He entertained even a farther objection; whatever had been the intention of the noble lord (Castlereagh), the fact was, that the Message did stand between their late Speaker and the liberality of the House. It was true, that the amount of the money was not mentioned, but the term of the grant, namely, for two lives, was distinctly recommended. (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it could not be supposed that any disrespect to the House was intended by taking the earliest opportunity of proposing an adequate reward of the services which they had received from the noble lord in his late office of Speaker. He could not conceive that the prerogative of the Crown had been improperly exercised on this occasion. Whenever the rank of the peerage had been conferred in recompense of distinguished merit, the Crown had been in the habit of sending similar messages. It was done in the case of the Duke of Wellington, and had always been understood to be the settled and necessary form of enabling the House to carry into effect the wishes of the Crown.

Mr. C. W. Wynn declared, that under the circumstances of this case, he felt it his duty to oppose the motion. Trusting that the House would proceed to accomplish the same purpose by an address in the first instance, he thought such a course would be infinitely more honourable to the noble lord whose merits were the ground of such a proceeding. He could see no analogy between this case and that of naval or military services. Of these last the Crown was the natural and proper judge, but could not be of services rendered in that House. The Crown had already the power of granting a pension for life; and had this power been exercised on this occasion, he knew no legal objection that could have been urged against it; but all would admit, that it must have been a very ill-advised measure. Such a mark of favour would have been a very unequal compliment for the occasion. The House was the theatre of the services performed, and ought not to seem as if it wanted to be put in mind of the obligations it was under. (Hear, hear.) Neither ought it to be held out to future Speakers that they were to look elsewhere for their reward. In the hope and confidence that the House would take up the subject, he proposed to move the previous question, the present motion being to refer the Message of the Prince Regent to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. F. Fitzgerald could not admit that it would be for the honour of Lord Colchester that the recommendation contained in a gracious Message from the Throne, bearing reference to his eminent services, should be negatived in that House. It appeared to him to be nothing more than a struggle between the two sides of the House who should be foremost in the acknowledgment of those services. (Hear, hear.) He was aware that, in either case, respect for the noble baron could not be wanting; but he could not admit the doctrine which had been stated in such latitude, of the Crown being supposed to be in constant ignorance of the merits of their Speaker. He believed that Lord Colchester had, on every occasion when, in discharge of his duty as Speaker, he had offered himself to the attention of the illustrious person on the Throne, received some testimony of the Crown for his distinguished services in the House. It was evidently absurd, therefore, to suppose that the Crown, which was the fountain of honour in all cases, should be disabled in this instance only to recognize and reward services of an important nature.

Sir J. Newport stated his objections to the proposed mode of proceeding, and trusted that the chair would never look to any other quarter than that House for any reward or distinction to which it might aspire.

Mr. Fitzgerald explained.

Mr. Huskisson considered that the precedent of Lord Onslow's case stood upon different circumstances. At present the Crown had no funds at its disposal beyond a pension for life of 1,000*l*. If, therefore, an address was presented, this was all that could be done, and the Crown must again refer the matter to the House. In the former case, the Crown had the power of granting a pension of 5,000*l*. a year for life; and was thus very differently situated.

Mr. Wynn said, he had never imagined that the Crown could proceed in this case without the authority of the House; but if an address were presented, praying that a suitable reward should be conferred, a Message might be brought down stating the existing limitations on the power of granting pensions, and the House would then have it in its power to supply the deficiency. The difference in point of form was but technical, and he had no wish to press his opposition to the motion to a division, if the right hon. gentleman should be disposed to withdraw it, and substitute the other form of carrying the wishes of the House into effect.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted the candour of the hon. and learned gentleman's imputation. The great object on all sides, he apprehended, must be to do that which would be most gratifying to the feelings of the distinguished person immediately interested. If it was the pleasure of the House to adjourn the consideration for the present, (Gries of no, no), he apprehended, then, that it would be the most satisfactory course to withdraw the motion he had already made, and give notice of his intention to move an address to the Crown on this subject on Thursday next. (Hear, hear.)

NEW STREET ACT.] Sir F. Burdett presented a petition of several inhabitants within the line of the proposed new street, complaining of the injuries they had sustained under the powers exercised by the commissioners. The hon. baronet moved that it should be referred to the Committee now sitting to inquire into the provisions of that act.

Mr. Huskisson opposed the motion, on the ground that such of the petitioners as were tenants at will had no right to complain; and that all proprietors who were dissatisfied with the terms offered by the commissioners might have recourse either to arbitration or an action at law.

Sir F. Burdett observed, that it was a mere mockery to tell a poor man of his action at law. Many of the petitioners had paid considerable sums for the advantages, or what was called the good-will of their business, which might depend entirely on its situation. After some farther conversation, the House divided—

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

IRISH ELECTION LAWS.] A Bill was brought in, and read a first time, "for the better regulation of polls, and for making other provisions touching the election of members to serve in Parliament for places in Ireland."

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, June 5.

THE LATE SPEAKER.] The order of the day for the consideration of the Prince Regent's Message relative to the late Speaker, being read,

The Earl of Liverpool rose to propose an Address to his Royal Highness, in answer to the Message. It was not his intention to detain their Lordships by a detailed statement of the merits and services of the late Speaker of the other House of Parliament. He admitted that those services were better known in the other House, in the chair of which they had been rendered: but their Lordships were aware that it was customary for the Sovereign to take notice of the services of the Speaker, and to order the Lord Chancellor to express the Royal approbation of a Speaker presented at their bar, founded upon experience of his past conduct. As to the distinguished person whom his Royal Highness had thought proper to raise to the dignity of a Baron, by the title of Lord Colchester, their Lordships would observe that he had been longer in the situation of Speaker than any other individual, except one, in the history of Parliament; that he had performed the duties of that high and distinguished office in the most exemplary and meritorious manner during the most eventful period; and had been presented five times at their bar as the person chosen by the Commons to fill the chair, and as often approved of on the part of the Crown: and with respect to that part of the duties of the Speaker of the other House, which came more immediately under their Lordships' observation, they well knew the eloquent and manly manner in which he had expressed the sentiments of the Commons at the close of each Session. It had been usual, when naval and military officers had been raised to the peerage, to call upon their Lordships, by message from the Sovereign, to concur in making such provision for the support of the dignity conferred, as, under all the circumstances, should appear just and reasonable, and they had not refused their concurrence. He trusted that the House would deem it equally proper and expedient to concur in making a suitable provision for one who had so long filled the situation of first Commoner of the Empire with so much credit to himself and advantage to the country. He would now, therefore, propose to their Lordships, that an humble Address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, thanking him for his gracious Message, and assuring his Royal Highness that their Lordships would concur in making such provision for Lord Colchester, and the next male heir succeeding him in the title, as under all the circumstances might be just and reasonable.

The motion was agreed to, nem. diss. and an address ordered accordingly.

LONDON PETITION.] The Earl of Lauderdale presented a petition of the Lord Mayor and Livery of London, in Common Hall assembled, against the continuance of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.—Laid on the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, June 5.

POOR RATES.] Sir J. Graham presented a petition of the Earl of Pomfret and others, against the bill in progress through the House, for making Lead Mines liable to the Poor Rates. Ordered to lie on the table.

USURY LAWS.] General Michel presented a petition of merchants and manufacturers of Belfast, praying that the bill for repealing the Usury Laws, might not pass into a law. The hon. member said he would take the sense of the House on the second reading of the bill.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

HABEAS CORPUS.—LONDON COMMON HALL PETITION.] Sir J. Shaw presented a petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of London, against any farther Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. The hon. member said, that when this measure was formerly before the House, he was in a minority that opposed it, as uncalled for by the state of the country, and, therefore, an unnecessary infringement on the liberties of the people. Nothing had since transpired either to justify what was then done, or to call for what was now intended.—The petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. S. Lefevre presented a petition of inhabitants of Reading, against any farther Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.—Ordered to lie on the table.

CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS.] Lord Milton presented a petition of the Company of Cutlers within Hallamshire (York), praying that the House would adopt some measure calculated to put an end to the cruel practice of employing boys in the sweeping of chimnies. He said that it was not probable that any measure upon this subject could be adopted during the present Session, but that early in the next Session, he hoped it would be brought before the House.

Mr. Lyttleton having been requested to support the present petition, felt himself particularly called upon to say a few words, although the practice was in itself so cruel and revolting, that it did not require any instigation to excite his disapprobation of it. He trusted that some means might be adopted by the House to put an end to this disgraceful practice, the discontinuance of which could produce no inconvenience to the public, as the process could be effected by means of machinery. In Scotland, and in every other country, except England, chimnies were swept merely by machinery.

Mr. S. Worley and Mr. W. Freeman concurred in expressing a wish that some measure should be adopted to put an end to this practice.

Lord Lascelles said, the practice was so cruel, that he hoped even the present Session would not pass without something being done by the House, even if it were only to pass a Resolution on the subject.

Mr. Bennet said, that in the beginning of next week, he intended to give notice of a motion for an inquiry.

Lord Milton, in consequence of what had been stated by the hon. gentleman who spoke last, and the noble lord who preceded him, moved that the present petition be referred to a Select Committee.

The petition was then brought up, read, and ordered to be referred to a Select Committee, consisting of Mr. Bennet, Lord Lascelles, Mr. Worsley, and several others.

SALT LAWS.] On the motion that the Salt Laws (excise) bill be read a third time, Mr. Devonport objected to its passing into an act, on the ground of the injurious effects it would produce.

The bill was read a third time, and several clauses were proposed to be added to it, by way of rider, by Mr. Lushington.

Mr. Tierney and Mr. Ponsonby objected to the addition of clauses of so great length and of so much importance at this stage of the measure, when they could not be understood or deliberately weighed by members. They contended, that these clauses should have been printed, and that time should have been given for their consideration, instead of being hurried through the House in such an indecent manner.

Mr. Lushington and Mr. Rose defended the introduction of the clauses, as they were all in favour of those whom the bill affected.

Mr. C. Wynn disapproved of the practice of proposing, as riders, on the third reading of a bill, a number of clauses, each of which might require particular and repeated consideration.

The House then went into a Committee on the new clauses, which were read, and, the Report being received, agreed to.—The bill was then passed.

VOTE OF THANKS TO THE LATE SPEAKER.]—Lord Castlereagh rose, pursuant to his notice, to call the attention of the House to the discharge of that debt of public and private gratitude, which they owed to the excellent individual who had lately filled the Chair. To whatever extent their liberality might lead them in conferring another sort of reward, he felt satisfied that nothing would prove more grateful to the feelings of their late Speaker, than the unmixed tribute of affectionate gratitude which he anticipated on this occasion. He would not attempt, lest it should weaken the impression already engraven on every heart, to describe the ability, impartiality, and discrimination, with which that eminent person had uniformly guided their counsels. He had not escaped their attention that he had for a long course of years filled the office of Speaker—an office attended with peculiar difficulty—with the greatest honour to himself, and

advantage to the country, and during, perhaps, the most eventful period of our history. For the larger portion of the 15 or 16 years in which he had filled the Chair, the country had been engaged in one of the most arduous struggles that a nation had ever endured. But it was not merely the war which increased the difficulties of the office; for the country in general had taken a start in prosperity which entailed upon the House a greater burden of legislative business than had occurred at any former period. In the course of that time, the duties attached to the office of Lord Colchester had been tenfold more laborious than those of any of his predecessors. The number of ~~Inclosure~~ Bills which had been passed during that period, and the immense increase of other business, were such as to require all the diligence and ability of the most active and experienced individual. Every day the House had had occasion to observe the eminent abilities of their late Speaker, every day they had felt the advantage of being guided by his counsel, which was the ablest and the best that had ever emanated from that Chair. (Hear, hear.) Whatever party differences there might have been—into whatever warmth or even violence of discussion they might have been betrayed—still they always felt that they were conducted by an authority the most high, combined with an independence and integrity the most pure. (Hear, hear.) It was his wish on this occasion first to submit to the House, a resolution expressive of its thanks to Lord Colchester. As to any ulterior measure, he hoped they would do his Majesty's Government the justice to believe, that whatever course of proceeding might be adopted, they were desirous that it might be such as would be most satisfactory to the House, and most grateful to the individual concerned.—After the House had testified its thanks, by passing a resolution for that purpose, he should propose to follow it up by moving an Address to the Prince Regent, praying that he would be graciously pleased to confer some distinguished mark of favour on the noble lord—(Hear, hear.) The only point on which he could anticipate that a shadow of difference could arise on this subject was, whether there was any occasion for an Address to call the attention of the Crown to the services of the Speaker; but as there could only be a struggle between the two sides of the House, to testify their feelings towards the distinguished individual in question, in the best way, he should readily assent to that mode which was most calculated to produce a spirit of unanimity. He had only now to move,

“That the Thanks of this House be expressed to the Right Hon. Charles Abbot, now Baron Colchester, for his eminent and distinguished services during the long and eventful period in which he discharged the duties of Speaker, with a zeal and ability alike honourable to himself, and advantageous to the House.

"That he be assured that the proofs which he has uniformly given of his attachment to his King and Country—the exemplary firmness with which he has maintained the dignity and privileges of this House—the ability, integrity, and unremitting attention to parliamentary business, which have marked the whole of his conduct, justly entitle him to the approbation, respect, and gratitude of this House."—(Lord and repeated cheers.)

Lord W. Russell said, it was with great regret he rose to give any opposition to the present motion, as he was to concur in every tribute to the learning and ability of the late Speaker, as well as to every other quality, both of his public and private character. There was, however, a circumstance which must be still fresh in the recollection of the House: he alluded to the Speech delivered at the bar of the other House, on the close of the Session in the year 1813*. That speech, it was equally well known, had induced a noble friend of his (Lord Morpeth) in the following Session, from he believed the best of motives, to move a vote of censure on the late Speaker for his conduct. In his judgment, it would be fatally injurious to the character and credit of the House, if after 106 of its members had supported that vote it should, only three years afterwards, pass an unanimous vote of unqualified approbation on the same individual. (Hear, hear.) There was no one ostensible reason before the public for such an alteration of sentiment, except the circumstance of the person, who on a former occasion had thought proper to make the Crown a party to the proceedings of that House, having been now called by the Crown, for he was too old fashioned to say elevated, to the peerage. (Hear.) It was not his intention to trouble the House by a division; and he could assure them, that in disturbing the unanimity of the present motion, he was actuated only by an overruling sense of duty.

Mr. C. Wynn said, that having taken an active part in urging the vote of censure against that eminent person, who seemed to him to have acted contrary to Parliamentary usage, and the spirit of Parliamentary proceeding, (by acquiescing the Throne with proceedings relative to a proposal, which had not been sanctioned by the House) he was anxious to express his opinion on the vote now proposed. The House would recollect, that to one act of that description, there could be opposed fifteen years of unwearied and able discharge of most important duties. (Hear, hear.) In passing the present vote, he did not feel that the House was pledged to every distinct act of the late Speaker, all that was granted by agreeing to the motion, was the expression of its sense of the general merits of that distinguished character.

Mr. Banks differed entirely from the view of the question taken by the noble lord (Russell). The House should recollect, that what the late Speaker had done at the period alluded to, was declared by a considerable majority in that House, (168) to have been done in conformity with the conduct of Speakers in the very best times of our history.

The question was then put and carried, and, on the suggestion of Mr. Wynn, the Thanks of the House were ordered to be presented to Lord Colchester by the present Speaker.

Lord Castlereagh rose again and moved,

"That an humble Address be presented to His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, to beseech His Royal Highness that he will be graciously pleased, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, to confer some signal mark of the Royal Favour upon Charles Lord Colchester, late Speaker of this House, for his great and eminent services performed to his Country, during the long and important period in which he has, with such distinguished ability and integrity, presided in the Chair of this House; and to assure His Royal Highness, that whatever expense His Royal Highness shall think proper to be incurred upon that account, this House will make good the same."

Mr. H. Sumner said, he did not rise to oppose the motion, but he wished to be informed, whether, after acceding to the proposed Address, it would be competent for the House not only to fix the amount of the sum, but also the duration of the grant?

Lord Castlereagh said it would, of course, like any other question submitted to their consideration, be open for the discussion of the House.

Mr. Ponsonby remarked, that the House had been already brought into one difficulty by the Message; it should not therefore increase it by any ambiguous proceeding. As the Address was now worded, they stood pledged to accede to whatever sum his Royal Highness should think proper to propose. The best course of proceeding, he apprehended, would be for the Crown to send down a Message, stating the inadequacy of its means; and then the question of the due extent of liberality would still remain with the House.

Mr. B. Bathurst observed, that the proposed

* The following is the passage in the Speech here referred to by the noble lord. After having mentioned, that prudent and adequate arrangements had been made for the future government of the British possessions in India, &c. &c. the Speaker said,—“But, Sir, these are not the only subjects to which our attention has been called; other momentous changes have been proposed for our consideration.”—(Alluding to the bill brought in for the relief of the Catholics, which was rejected in a committee by a majority of 251 to 247).—“Adhering, however, to those laws by which the Throne, the Parliament, and the Government of this Country, are made fundamentally Protestant, we have not consented to allow, that those who acknowledge a foreign jurisdiction should be authorized to administer the powers and jurisdiction of this realm; willing as we are, nevertheless, and willing as I trust, we ever shall be, to allow the largest scope to religious toleration.”

Address was precisely similar to that voted in the case of Mr. Speaker Onslow.

Mr. Pembury remarked, that there was no similarity between the two cases. In that of Mr. Speaker Onslow the Crown had the power of granting an adequate reward out of the Civil List; whilst, at present, it had no funds at its disposal beyond the limited pension of 1,500*l.* per annum for life.

Mr. Rose said, the Crown at that time could not grant for a longer time than one life.

Mr. G. Wynn said, the usual form of proceeding on every Message from the Crown was, either that it should be taken into consideration on another day, or be referred to a Committee. With regard to the course which had been adopted in the present instance, the opinion of the House might have been marked more strongly; it had been moved that the Message should be taken into consideration on that day or six months. A less offensive course had, however, been pursued. It certainly could not be supposed that the vote of thanks arose out of the Message from the Crown, though the House could not have entered into the subject of reward without some previous communication from the Crown. Some suggestion had been made, whether the mention of the Message could be entered on the Journals. He did not think that it could be called a direct violation of the privileges of the House; but, at all events, the House had discharged their duty in marking their sense of it. As to the question of remuneration, he begged them to remember, that in cases where the Crown recommended some particular object to their consideration, they did not pledge themselves to go to any certain expense. For instance, where a monument was to be erected, and they approved of the measure, they were only pledged to a reasonable extent, and not for any unnecessary expense. So far he was ready to go on the present occasion, but he could not consent to any sum which did not receive the previous sanction of the House.

Mr. Banks observed, that, with respect to what had been stated as to Mr. Speaker Onslow, the Crown would have exceeded its powers by granting a pension beyond one life. He should support the Address on the ground of its being strictly sanctioned by precedent; for example, in the case of the late Mr. Percival's family, and in that of the Duke of Wellington.

Mr. Tierney apprehended, that if this question should come to be discussed some years hence, it would appear to have grown out of the Message from the Crown; but he was not going to argue that now. It seemed to him, that when the grant was made, and it might be made immediately, the House would be shackled as to the amount of the pension to be given; and would have no power to diminish it, if they thought proper. In the case of Mr. Onslow, there certainly must have been some previous understanding as to what was to be the remuneration. He had heard several rumours with regard to the pension intended for Lord Colchester. Some persons informed him, that the noble lord was to receive 4,000*l.* a year for his life, and that his only heir male was to have 2,000*l.* He had since heard, however, that the pension to the latter was to be 3,000*l.* It would be highly proper, therefore, that his Majesty's Ministers should inform the House what they were really undertaking for. They ought certainly to know to what extent they were about to pledge themselves. (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had no objection to state, that the intention of the Crown was to make provision for Lord Colchester, to the amount of 4,000*l.* a year, with a reversion of 3,000*l.* to the next heir male of the title. In the case of Mr. Speaker Onslow, 3,000*l.* a year had been granted for two lives. This was 47 years ago, and, therefore, he apprehended the House would not go too far in liberality by acceding to the sums proposed in the present instance. They were by no means pledged, however, to this extent, as the grant must of course come under their revision, and they would then be enabled to deliberate on the propriety of its amount.

Mr. Tierney declared, that he was not, by any means satisfied with this arrangement. It appeared that they were now to make good the claim of a peerage; but it should not be forgotten that Lord Colchester was already in possession of a place of 1,500*l.* a year in Ireland; so that, in fact, 5,500*l.* a year would be enjoyed by him, and 3,000*l.* by his son; but if 3,000*l.* was enough to enable the son to support his title, why should 5,500*l.* be given to the father? (Hear, hear.) Much as he was disposed to admit, nay, strongly as he felt, that Mr. Abbot was entitled to the liberality of the House, he could not refrain from saying, that he thought this an excessive provision, and, one which, under the present unparalleled distresses of the country, ought not to be given. He meant nothing invidious by this declaration, but he would at all times discharge his duty to the country. He might incur the danger of giving offence, but this should not deter him from watching the course of the public expenditure, and of entering his protest against every excessive expense. (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was undoubtedly true that Lord Colchester enjoyed a place in Ireland of 1,500*l.* a year, nominal value, but the actual income was only 1,300*l.* He received that compensation in consequence of having relinquished a place of 3,000*l.* a year for life. (Hear.)

Mr. Tierney asked, whether Mr. Abbot had not sold that place? (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, No; he had resigned it.

Sir C. Monck could not refrain from expressing his regret, that the motion of Ministers, founded on the Message from the Crown, had not been noticed in the votes, where it ought to have been stated that it was afterwards withdrawn. Had this been done, as he could not help thinking ought to have been done, the irregularity of the Message would be known to future times. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. P. Moore considered, that the question of granting this reward should be left to the Committee of Supply.

Mr. H. Sumner begged to observe, that the situation of Mr. Speaker Onslow, which had been frequently referred to, differed extremely from that of the late Speaker. Mr. Onslow was heir to a title, and to an ample fortune for the support of it. The profits of the office were then considered at 3,000*l.* and accordingly the House in its wisdom allotted him and his son that sum for their lives. It so happened that Mr. Onslow never got the title, and his son was kept out of it for eight or ten years after his father's death, and the pension of 3,000*l.* was enjoyed by the two for about fifty-seven years. At that time the House thought it right to give Mr. Onslow a pension suited to the profits of the office, he saw no reason why Lord Colchester should be allowed only two-thirds of the salary granted to the person filling the chair, and which was 6,000*l.* per annum. On these views, and also considering that Lord Colchester had well deserved every attention the House could bestow on him, he differed from the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) near him. He was induced the more to do so, recollecting, as he did, the manner in which Mr. Speaker Foster, in the Irish House of Commons, had been rewarded. He was aware, that when compensation was alluded to, as given to persons holding situations in Ireland at that time, the motives for giving it would be thought of; but he could assure them, that Mr. Foster had been actuated by the most disinterested feelings, and he had received 5,000*l.* a year.

The original question was then repeated from the chair, and carried nem. con.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.] Lord Castlereagh appeared at the bar with a green bag, containing several papers, which was ordered to be brought up and laid on the table.

The noble lord then moved the order of the day for taking into consideration the measure of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, respecting the continuance of several traitorous practices and meetings to which the attention of the House had been called at the commencement of the Session. The Prince Regent's Message being read from the chair,

Lord Castlereagh rose and said, that, in proposing an answer to this gracious communication of his Royal Highness, he did not mean to pledge the House as to the nature of the proceedings to be afterwards adopted; or whether, in point of fact, any ulterior measures should be pursued. He should confine himself simply to a motion of thanks to the Prince Regent, and to assure his Royal Highness that the House would take the papers which he had ordered to be laid before them into their immediate and serious consideration. In the present stage of this business it would be impossible for him to make any opening as to the actual state of the country; and, indeed, he felt persuaded that it would be most acceptable to the House that he should not now attempt to enter into any details. It might, perhaps, be convenient to state what he meant to propose after the present motion should be disposed of. He intended to submit, that the papers then upon the table, containing information of the continuance of traitorous practices and meetings, should be referred to a Select Committee of the House, to be immediately nominated, and to be confined to the same persons as were members of the last Committee, except the late Attorney-General (Sir W. Garrow), who had ceased to be a member of that House. Those persons must be much more competent than any other members to follow up the communication from the Crown; but as it was desirable that the Committee should consist of the same number of members, he should propose that the name of the present Solicitor-General (Sir Robert Gifford) should be substituted for that of the late Attorney-General. The noble lord concluded with moving the Address to the effect before stated.

Lord Folkestone rose and said, that as the noble lord had opened the course of proceedings to which he meant to resort, the House ought seriously to pause before they took another step, which must lead to the subversion of all the liberties of the country. For his part, he confessed that he concurred entirely in the abhorrence which had been expressed in a petition presented to the House in an early part of the day, with respect to the measures of his Majesty's Ministers. He wished he could say, that this was the first step they had taken towards despotic power; but if the House did not stop them now, there was an end of English liberty. (Hear, hear.) If the Habeas Corpus Act were to be suspended for any longer time, it might hereafter be made a dead letter, whenever the Ministers thought proper; and the Constitution of the country was gone for ever. The House would remember, that, in the last Session, he declared his apprehension of the consequences of keeping up a large standing army; and they would now determine whether subsequent proceedings did not justify the observations he then made. One of the first measures was, the passing of the Alien Act, which was a direct introduction of lettres de cachet. On that occasion he took the liberty of warning gentlemen, that if they suffered lettres de cachet to be introduced, no matter against whom they were to operate, whether aliens or natives, other measures would speedily follow, entirely destructive of all British freedom. The Crown, however, had been suffered to retain a large standing army, a large staff, and large establishments; and if, in addition to this, the House should suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, they would put the whole liberties of the country into the hands of the Crown; they would make the Crown a despot; and the people of England would be as complete slaves as the people of any other country whatever. (Hear, hear.) He, for one, protested against the whole of these proceedings. He would not consent to any farther suspension of this great bulwark of our liberties; and he warned the House, that if they gave their assent to the propositions of the Minister, they would never see the Habeas Corpus Act unsuspended. What (said the noble Lord)! shall this country, this England, so loved, so honoured by our ancestors; shall this land, which gives freedom to every slave that sets his foot upon it, be governed by the arbitrary will of any set of Ministers? What has become of that patriotic spirit which raised this country to its former greatness? May the Genius of the Constitution still look down upon us, and save us from the ruin which Ministers have prepared!—He would not surrender to them the power of suspending the laws of England; he would not consent to any Committee, be they chosen how they might. Let proper persons examine the papers, and let them report the evidence to the House; but then let the House judge fairly and impartially for themselves. The Committee ought not to be composed of those persons who examined the former papers, as they must have a bias on their minds; they should be different persons who would enter into the examination without prejudice or partiality. If discontents existed, they arose out of the great distresses of the country, which the noble lord had formerly ascribed to a sudden transition from a state of war to a state of peace, but which, he must be now convinced, were not merely temporary. Ministers might wish to remedy those evils, but it could not be effected by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. The whole House, in a Committee, ought to consider what were the proper remedies to be applied; and they should not consent to resign the liberties of the people, merely because Ministers came down, and stated, that traitorous practices were still continued. (Hear, hear.) He would not detain them any longer then; but, in due time, he should make an amendment, respecting the appointment of the Committee.

Mr. Curwen perfectly concurred with the last speaker: he had not heard of a single breach of the peace which could afford even the pretence of a justification for continuing the measure of suspension. He hoped at least that Ministers would wait a little: when the trial of the prisoners at present in the Tower was concluded, there could be no objection to laying before the whole House a full disclosure of the plot, if any existed. He should give his decided opposition to the separation of Parliament while the Habeas Corpus Act remained suspended.

The Address was then agreed to.

On the question being put, that the papers presented to the House by Lord Castlereagh should be referred to the former Committee,

Lord Folkestone moved as an amendment, to add the words "to examine and arrange the same and to report the substance thereof to the House, omitting only such names of persons as in the judgment of the Committee it may be dangerous to the persons themselves to disclose."

The amendment was negatived, and it was agreed that the Committee should be a Committee of Secrecy, and consist of 21 members.

On the question that it should consist of such members of the Committee of the 5th of February as were now in the House,

Sir J. Newport objected to this proposal on three grounds:—First, it was going out of the way to insult every other member of the House as not being worthy of such a trust; besides, the House elected the last Committee by ballot, under the circumstances which then existed; but circumstances were now entirely different: then we were at the commencement of a Session, and now at the close of one; and the powers required were to be exercised till a new Session, perhaps till a new Parliament. (Hear, hear.) Secondly, the members of the last Committee must necessarily be more or less partial and prejudiced. It was almost unavoidable with the ordinary frailties of human nature, not to feel some bias towards the support of an opinion once advanced; and many considered, that their whole reputation depended on maintaining a sort of obstinate consistency. Thirdly, he had an objection to the appointment of any of the Ministers of the Crown on this Committee, because they had already pronounced a decided opinion on the subject; and the noble lord himself had said, that a spirit of sedition existed in the country, and that the people were to be tried on this charge by a Committee. He (Sir J. N.), on the part of the country, challenged that jury; he challenged it on the part of the country in the same manner as he would on the trial of a criminal; he challenged that jury, because the country could not have a fair trial by a jury that had already decided on the point at issue. At any rate, on the event of a farther suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, he now announced his intention to take the sense of the House on a clause which should limit the duration of such a measure to the existence of the present Parliament. If it were continued beyond that period, the people would not be in a state to exercise their elective franchise; and he hoped, at all events, that it was not intended to proceed to a general election while a sword was suspended over the people by a hair, which might any moment be cut at the option of Ministers. (Hear, hear.) He should propose, as an amendment to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the question, in order to add the words, "The Committee do consist of the following Members."

Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.	Mr. John Fane.
Lord Geo. Cavendish.	Mr. James Abercromby.
Sir Cha. Mordaunt.	Sir John Sebright.
Mr. Wellesley Pole.	Lord Vis. Althorp.
Sir Sam. Romilly.	Mr. Stuart Wortley.
Mr. Attorney General.	Mr. Williams Wynn.
Mr. Solicitor General.	Mr. Shaw Lefevre.
Sir James Shaw.	Mr. Courtenay.
Mr. Davenport.	Mr. Lyttleton.
Mr. Grenhill Russell.	Mr. Wilberforce.
	Mr. Addington.

Mr. B. Bathurst considered the course proposed as unusual, but he should answer the objections urged by the hon. baronet. As to the objection of disrespect to the rest of the House, it was to be remembered, that the same inquiry was to be made by this Committee as by the former, and that the former was chosen by ballot; but the hon. baronet, instead of acquiescing in those named by the House for making the very same inquiry, had said, "Reject them, and take 21 named by myself." It was impossible that a Committee of new members could come to so sound a judgment as the old Committee, who would examine with the advantage of having had all the papers and evidence before them on the former occasion. As to their being prejudiced and partial, if they had formed a wrong opinion on the former Committee, they would now be enabled to correct it; but if all their opinions had been borne out and substantiated by facts, the advantages they would derive from having a thorough knowledge of all the previous transactions, would much more than counterbalance any evil that might be anticipated from the infirmity of human feelings. The Committee were not called on to come to any certain conclusion; and the point before them was, not whether the liberties of the country ought to be suspended, but whether any steps at all ought to be adopted in consequence of the state of the country. As to challenging the jury, on which the hon. baronet seemed to dwell so triumphantly, and rejecting the presence of Ministers, because their minds were made up, the hon. baronet had himself contradicted his own argument, by nominating himself two of the Ministers. He might indeed say, that they were not on the last Committee; but, according to him, their minds were made up, and that was the principal point of his challenge. But, admitting that the hon. baronet were to challenge the jurors as partial, how was the allegation to be supported? His Majesty's Ministers had seen the whole of the papers; these papers the Committee would also see; and why were Ministers more partial because they had already seen that which all the Committee must see before they came to a decision? The comparison made by the hon. baronet had entirely failed; and it was impossible that Ministers, by being possessed of the various documents to be produced before the

Mr. Brand said, that if any thing could add to his regret at the thin attendance of members on a subject which involved the interests of our liberties and existence, it was the manner in which the hon. gentleman seemed to treat the question. The great object of appointing a Committee was to obtain an impartial discussion of the evidence on which the great point of the suspension of our liberties was now to rest; and the hon. gentleman had shewn a degree of triumph, because the hon. baronet had named two of the Ministers for this Committee. He, (Mr. Brand,) wished he had not done so: but this afforded no ground for a hasty or inconsiderate appointment. Ministers had preferred a sort of bill of indictment against the people of England, and they were to be tried on charges of sedition and rebellion; but by what jury? He would ask whether the Report of the last Committee gave satisfaction to the discreet or reflecting part of the people? If he were to ask out of doors whether the Committee had been satisfactorily appointed, the answer would be, No! they were not appointed by the House, they were merely nominated by Ministers. (Hear, hear.) Let a Committee be appointed by the fair consideration of the House, and he was sure the result would not be such as followed a Committee selected by Government; their names all written down beforehand, and circulated by Ministers among their dependents. (Hear, hear.) He thought the reasons alleged by his hon. friend against appointing the same Committee had great weight in them; for it was impossible to conceive that men who had before made up their minds should not continue, in some degree, wedded to the opinions they had formed at first. A Committee was wanted that should come to the business without the influence of any preconceived opinion; but had not Ministers made up their minds beforehand? If his Majesty's Ministers, if the representatives in Parliament, wished to carry the people with them, they would cautiously abstain from introducing into the Committee any persons whose names were not such as would carry conviction to all honourable, discreet, and conscientious individuals.

Mr. Barham agreed with his hon. friend, that the people were brought to a sort of trial, and that it was highly necessary the jurors should be altogether impartial. He took the earliest opportunity of entering his protest against the measures that were now in contemplation. On former occasions, he had felt himself constrained, painfully constrained, to concur in acts which suspended the liberty of the subject. The circumstances of those times seemed, in some measure, to justify such a course of proceeding; but circumstances at present were so obviously different, that he should not detain the House by dwelling upon them. We were then engaged in a war, not for pride, not for prosperity, but for existence: it was then known, that if discon-tents existed in the country, they could be formed from without by a powerful enemy, and every encouragement and assistance held out to the disaffected: those discontents, too, were ramified and extended in every direction through the country. At present, not one of those grounds of alarm existed; no force was in arms against the Government, either within or without the country; and the disaffected were without credit, and without encouragement. We were at peace with all the world, and the foreign spirit of revolution and disorganization had not only fallen into disrepute, but had been succeeded by a reaction of the very opposite tendency. The measures at present in contemplation were also the more grievous, as they seemed not to be temporary, but meant for a continuance, and as an overtone to the total extinction of our liberties. (Hear.) If Ministers succeeded in their present intentions, he could not conceive a case in which they might not for the future demand a suspension of the Habeas Corpus. Any wicked Minister, wishing to be absolute, would only have to instigate a disturbance, by any of the easy methods for raising the passions of the poorer classes of society, and there would then exist the same ground for suspending our liberties as at present. Neither were the measures proposed at all applicable to what had happened: he might admit that certain districts were in a state of disturbance, which might afford a reason for enacting a law as to those particular parts; but was it any ground for depriving the whole country of its rights and liberties? (Hear, hear.) We were familiarizing our ears a great deal too much to this word suspension. Did we sufficiently consider, that when the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended, there was no difference between this Government and that of the most despotic sovereign? The power which a Minister had of committing to prison on such occasions was quite as great and as dangerous as the lettres de cachet, so long and so justly reprobated. We were congratulated on the glorious issue of the war, as it was termed—on our triumphs and acquisitions; but in what had we conquered, if we were after all to lose our rights and liberties, and all our importance as a nation? What had we gained, or in what was this Government different from that of Buonaparte, if our personal freedom was taken away? (Hear, hear.) Was he any longer addressing a free people? (Hear.) And if a new Parliament should be elected (which he trusted would never be the case) during a suspension of all our freedom, would it be a Parliament? (Loud cheers.) Could the people, under such circumstances, be said to exercise their elective franchise, when any party whose conduct or opinions might be deemed obnoxious was liable to be imprisoned during the pleasure of Ministers? (Hear, hear.) In surrendering this they surrendered every thing—themselves, the House of Commons, the country. He would entreat the noble lord to reconsider his proposal, and see what other mode he could adopt more satisfactory to the people.

Mr. W. Smith adverted to what the last Report had stated respecting Norwich. He believed he could shew that the Lords' Committee, particularly, came to a wrong decision on that point. It was said, that there would be greater convenience in the new Committee being composed of the same members who formed the last, as they could look back to the papers formerly laid before them. He must suppose that the last Committee took down minutes of their proceedings, and that these would be laid before a new or revived one. A Committee, therefore, differently chosen, could just as well consider these records, and make their reports, as any other persons. He held authority in his hand on some particulars, and was desired by the magistrate who presided at Norwich to state facts on the subject to the House, which he should do very briefly. The Steward of the Corporation of Norwich, acting in the absence of the Recorder, gave instructions to the Grand Jury respecting the objects of their presentment; they returned that, in consequence of his directions, they had minutely examined the constables of the different wards, as to their knowledge of the existence of any meetings of a secret nature, at private or public places, or any societies promoting sedition, blasphemy, or irreligion. The constables declared, there were no such societies; and that was also their (the grand jury's) opinion. The Steward, on discharging the jury after their attentive investigation, observed, that he considered Norwich acquitted of the imputation. He (Mr. W. S.) knew that this was also the Steward's own private opinion: and he had requested him to state the fact forcibly. As to events which had since occurred, he must observe that there had been a county election; and he wished to know whether any circumstances attending it were such as gentlemen opposite would call seditious, in the common acceptation of the word? No man of common sense would maintain that; it was a spirit the reverse in its motives and objects to what was commonly so termed: it was a spirit of riot and tumult, that shewed itself at Norwich at the election. He gave great credit to the magistrates for doing their utmost to suppress it; and had it been renewed, he was satisfied it would have been effectually suppressed. The question was, whether there existed among the lower orders such a spirit as his Majesty's Ministers had reason to be afraid of—such a spirit as they were told by their base informers did actually exist? He was clearly in favour of putting the papers into other hands; and he hoped a new Committee would consider well, and compare all the events with the predictions. This might lead them to doubt other sources of information laid before the former Committee, and they might draw a different conclusion, which they were more likely to do than those who stood already pledged to their opinions. It should not be forgotten, that when measures were adopted to enforce order in the disturbed districts of Ireland, the whole kingdom was not put out of the King's peace and under the ban.

Mr. Protheroe thought the last Committee should have contained more county members. He had given his vote in favour of the result of their Report chiefly because of their unanimity, and that was a circumstance which in any new Committee would much influence his decision. He did not approve of any individual nominating a list of members, with the semblance only of a free election. He wished to know whether, in the event of carrying the amendment, other amendments could be moved upon it?

Mr. Lamb concurred in the views of the hon. baronet who moved the amendment, and pressed the noble lord to agree to a new Committee of unbiassed and intelligent members, and to lay all the papers before them. On former occasions, the Minister had proposed the renewal on his own responsibility. That was a manly mode. But when it was attempted to mix in a Committee, with Ministers and their friends, some of those who were generally contrary to them in politics, such a Committee ought to be formed upon a larger basis, or it could not be expected to be satisfactory to the country. (Hear.) The proceeding of the noble lord could not farther even his own views. If his proposed Committee made a similar report with the last, the people would say, that they were prejudiced and pledged. If that Committee, so constituted, presented a different Report, then the people would say that they had been alarmed by the public reprobation which their former conduct had received. (Hear.)

Sir W. Burroughs contended, that it would be much more satisfactory to the House, as well as to the country, that 42 unobjectionable members should examine and report on so important a matter, than 21, selected by Ministers, and prepossessed on the subject.

Lord Milton said, he felt himself rather in a dilemma. If he inclined to think that there should be a new Committee, he did not think the plan proposed the most convenient. If the old Committee should be revived, he, as a member, should feel it his duty to attend: a circumstance that appeared to render the revival of the old Committee advisable, as it might be considered as a sequel to the examinations. Yet he owned it would be more satisfactory to the country if a new and larger Committee were appointed. On balancing the difficulties that occurred to his mind, he thought it would be the better way to mix up some new names rather than to remove the old ones. Ministers, he thought, should be in it; so should some gentlemen below him; but the other members should be selected differently. Upon the whole, he must vote against the noble lord's motion. The old Committee might, perhaps, get through the business a day earlier than a new one, yet probably not more satisfactorily to their own minds. He did not, however, consider the plan of the hon. baronet convenient.

Sir J. Newport said, the question was, whether the words be left out after the word "that," or not. If that amendment were carried, the House could afterwards consider the nomination of each member in the order in which he might be proposed.

Mr. B. Bathurst explained, that if the hon. baronet succeeded, the question would then be on his proposition.

Sir J. Newport said, it would still be liable to any amendments.

Mr. S. Wortley wished to know, if the motion of the noble lord should be carried, whether there would be a power of adding names?

The Speaker said it would not be practicable, in consequence of the vote being for 21 members. For one of these there must be a substitute, as the original member was not now in that House.

Mr. S. Wortley observed, that under that circumstance, he inclined to vote for the amendment.

The House then divided—

For the original motion . . . 126

Against it 66

Majority for Ministers . . —60

The main question being thus carried, the name of Mr. Solicitor General was added to the Committee, who were ordered to report the matter, as it should appear to them, to the House. They were directed to send for persons, papers, and records—seven to be the quorum—to adjourn from time to time and from place to place, and to report their proceedings from time to time—and had leave to sit during the sitting, and notwithstanding any adjournment of the House.

Lord Folkestone then moved, "That it be an instruction to the said Committee, that they inquire particularly into the origin, character, and extent, of the disaffection supposed to exist, or which may be alleged in the said papers to exist, in the country; and that they examine witnesses both to these particular points, and as to the credit due to the written evidence on which the allegation of such disaffection is founded; and that they report their opinion on all these matters, distinctly to the House, together with an Appendix, stating the substance of the Evidence on which such opinion shall be founded."

Lord Castlereagh said, he felt it his duty to oppose the motion: first, on the ground, that part of it was unnecessary, as the Committee were already empowered to send for persons, papers, and records; and, secondly, because the Appendix would expose many things which it was expedient, both for the sake of justice and tranquillity, should be concealed.

Mr. Bennet observed, that if the last Committee had examined witnesses, they would never have made the Report which had excited so much disgust. Could there be a doubt, that many of the circumstances mentioned in that Report would have assumed a very different aspect, if those busy, meddling, mischievous magistrates, (cries of hear) who, in order to stand well with the Ministers, had furnished all sorts of rumours and charges, (hear),—if those magistrates themselves had been brought before the Committee? If those enlightened gentlemen, who had lately such an interesting correspondence with the Home Secretary; if those worthy persons, who called themselves knights of Brunswick, (hear, hear), one of whom, in the late contest for Norfolk, had been author of one of the most atrocious calumnies that ever issued from the press; if such pernicious meddlers were brought to the test, and their vague assertions and suspicions were well sifted, could there be any doubt that the result of such examination would be, that their charges would dwindle into the most ridiculous insignificance? He was the more led to make these remarks on account of some circumstances that had taken place in his own county, and also in the town which he represented in Parliament. He had been told, that, in Northumberland, a mischievous magistrate had thought proper to bring charges of a treasonable nature against a gentleman of the first respectability; and had put him, as it were, to the ban, as a dangerous person, because, forsooth, he had gone up to the Cheviot to hunt; and this wise magistrate had taken it into his head, that he was going to array the shepherds in arms against the Government. (Hear, hear, hear.) And yet, contemptible as such a suspicion was, this gentleman, before he set off to hunt, was forced to go and explain his object to this informing officious magistrate. He verily believed, that nine-tenths of the evidence furnished by the magistrates would, if sifted to the bottom, be found to be equally groundless and absurd. (Hear, hear.) In the town which he represented, though there had been the greatest distress, yet he believed it had been borne more patiently than in almost any district; nor was there the least trace of disaffection; yet he had been informed, that within this day or two, the streets of Shrewsbury had been paraded with cavalry, on some mistaken notion that some of the inhabitants intended to attack a depot of arms there.—He could assure the House, that the inhabitants had no such intention. (A laugh from the Treasury Bench.) He did not quite understand the meaning of that laugh; but he could re-assert, that the inhabitants of Shrewsbury contemplated no such disorder as was imputed to them; and he would say, generally, that he firmly believed, that if any disaffection existed any where in the kingdom, the cause was to be traced solely to the measures of the Government itself. (Cries of hear.)

Mr. B. Bathurst could assure the hon. gentleman, that he was misinformed as to both the circumstances related. No intelligence had been sent to Government, by which any gentlemen, either in Northumberland or Shropshire, were compromised. He could not well go into particulars, but thus much he thought it right to declare.

The motion was then negatived.

Lord Folkestone rose and said, that notwithstanding this failure, he should presume to offer another motion. (Hear, hear.) He understood that several persons had been taken up under the Suspension Act, and he knew particularly that 3 persons had been apprehended in Berkshire. It would be a grievous thing if they should be left to rot in gaol: but he knew no other means of remedying so great an evil, than by the motion which he should now propose. It was, "That it be an instruction to the said Committee, that they inquire into the particular case of each and every person detained under the provisions of an Act passed in the present Session of Parliament, 'for enabling his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect are conspiring against his Person and Government;' and that they report to the House a List of such persons, stating their names, their trades, professions and occupations, their ages, the places of their confinement, the places where arrested, and the dates of their arrest and commitment, together with their opinion on the necessity and expediency of their arrest and commitment, and of the continuance of their detention."

Lord Castlereagh objected to the motion.—The Secretary of State acted upon a grave responsibility, and ought, therefore, to be trusted with a certain discretion. Besides, the motion of the noble lord would defeat the very object of the acts passed this Session, which were intended to give the power of detaining in prison, in cases where the ends of justice would not be forwarded by immediate trial.

The motion was negatived.

Lord Folkestone then gave notice, that on Wednesday next, he should bring forward a similar motion.

CUSTOM-HOUSE DOCKS, DUBLIN.] Sir H. Parnell rose to move for an account of all sums expended upon the formation of the Wet Docks, near the Custom-House of Dublin, and of the authority under which the same were expended. He maintained, that the old Canal Docks could be made efficient for the sum of 60,000*l.*; whereas the New Docks would cost half a million. He quoted the opinion of an eminent merchant of Dublin, that the scheme of the New Docks was one of the most shameful jobs in a jobbing country. (Hear, hear, from General Mathew.)

Mr. Peel said, that to call these Docks a shameful job, was a shameless assertion. The Government had used all the means in their power to ascertain whether the Canal Docks, or the New Dock, would be the most efficient or expedient: they had consulted Mr. Rennie, the most eminent engineer in the country, who gave his opinion, that the Canal Docks could not be adapted to the purposes required. Besides, the ground for the New Docks had been already purchased and excavated, (so that the hon. baronet's motion was ill-timed); and had been so since 1815; and it had been ascertained that the new plan would be much more economical than continuing the old one, even if the latter could have been made serviceable. It was easy to apply the term job; but what advantage could it be to Government whether the Docks were on the right or the left of the Liffy? Government, instead of furthering the new plan, would have been glad, if possible, to have made use of the Canal Docks, especially as the Canal Company were debtors to the public in a sum of 150,000*l*. He should second the hon. baronet's motion, because he was anxious that the fullest information should be furnished on this subject.

Mr. Ponsonby wished to know, when and why the ground had been purchased on which the New Docks stood; for he was sure it was a most disadvantageous situation.

Mr. Peel said, he was unable to answer the question: the purchase had been made under an administration with which he had no connection; however, he should readily assent to any motion on the subject which the right hon. gentleman might make.

Mr. W. Pole said, that every pains had been taken to inquire before any purchase was made; commissioners had made reports on the necessity of buying the ground; and eminent engineers had examined it before it was purchased. The subject had been under consideration when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, and he believed the necessity of the measure was then admitted.

Sir J. Newport said, that in 1808 a proposition was made to the Administration of which he had the honour to be a member, rather for taking some ground and building storehouses, than for the object that was now under consideration. If his memory did not fail him, all that was asked for the ground was 15,000*l*.; and in that sum, the money to be paid to the tenants was included. Upon that proposition he hesitated. After he left office he knew no more of the business. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Pole said, the warehousing system was not thought of at the time the hon. baronet mentioned (1806). By that system, since introduced, so much room was required, that 86 warehouses were occupied by the Customs in different parts of Dublin. The work was not undertaken till found absolutely necessary.

Sir J. Newport said, that in 1806, the Docks were calculated for warehousing tobacco and other goods.

Sir H. Parnell observed, that many engineers differed from Mr. Rennie on the subject referred to.

M. K. Fitzgerald said, the propriety of the expenditure had been admitted two years ago. The rents of the warehouses now occupied, exceeded 15,000*l*.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Ponsonby then moved for an account of the several persons from whom the land where the Docks were to be formed was purchased, and the amount of purchase-money paid to each person, within the last 15 years.—Ordered.

FINANCE REPORT.] Mr. D. Gilbert brought up the Fourth Report of the Finance Committee, respecting Estimate of Expenditure, which was ordered to be printed.

POOR RATES.] Lord Lascelles moved, that the House should go into a Committee on the Bill for making Lead Mines liable to Poor Rates. Sir J. Graham, Mr. Banks, Mr. Tremayne, and Sir C. Monck, opposed the motion: Lord Lascelles, Mr. D. Gilbert, Mr. Morret, and Lord Milton supported it. The House divided, Noes 71—Ayes 28—Majority 43.

The Committee was put off for six months.

DEMISE OF THE CROWN.] On the motion of Mr. Ponsonby, the Civil and Military Offices Continuance Bill was read a third time and passed.

SHERIFFS IN IRELAND BILL.—FORFEITED RECOGNIZANCES BILL.] These Bills were respectively considered in a Committee, and ordered to be reported to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, June 6.

DIVORCES.] Further evidence was given on Miller's Divorce Bill.—There was a point of some importance in this case, namely, whether the House would pass a Bill of Divorce where it appeared (as it might in this case) that, during the absence of the husband, in Malta, the wife lived four years in England, misconducting herself, and having four children in that time, without such inquiries on the part of the husband, as might lead to a detection of her misconduct sooner.—Further proceedings on Thursday.

The Salt Bill, Savings Banks' Bill, Offices' Continuance Bill, and several other bills, were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

LONDON PETITION.—HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION.] Lord Holland presented a petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London, against the farther Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.

The petition was read, and in substance expressed the astonishment of the petitioners at the report that Parliament, instead of attending to the reduction of the public expenditure, and to reforming the Representation, was about to continue the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, upon ex-parte evidence laid before a Secret Committee; and that with such precipitation, that no opportunity would be afforded to the country in general, to petition against it; and prayed that the Suspension might not be continued.

Lord Holland said, by the appointment of the Secret Committee, the subject to which the petition referred was certainly before Parliament, and there could be no objection on that ground to receiving it. He would at present, however, do no more than move that it be laid on the table, ardently trusting that it would not be the last against this measure, and that the general voice of the nation would at length have its due effect on both Houses of Parliament.

POOR EMPLOYMENT BILL.] The order of the day being read for the second reading of this bill,

The Earl of Liverpool said, that he was ready to state its general nature; but he understood, that it would be more convenient for some noble lords, that the discussion should take place at a future stage. He now moved that the bill be read a second time.

The Earl of Lauderdale threw out, for the consideration of the noble lord, that though the bill was framed so as to apply to parishes in Scotland, as well as in England, there were no words in it under which any description of persons in Scotland could apply.

The bill was read a second time, and committed for Monday.

Friday, June 6.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.] Several motions were made and agreed to, that different members should have leave of absence for a certain time.

When leave was moved for Mr. Harcourt, on the ground of urgent private business, Sir M. W. Ridley strongly objected to the granting so many applications on this plea. His hon. friend (Mr. Phillips) had better discharge the order for the call of the House altogether, than allow so many infringements. The order would be no check on those who were unwilling to attend, if it could be dispensed with on such grounds as had been assigned.

Mr. Abercromby concurred in this observation. The control over its members which the order was meant to enforce, could not be efficient over any but those who would attend without, if every slight pretence were allowed to be sufficient to obtain a dispensation from it. It would operate only on the conscientious, and would be entirely nugatory against others, if the present system were persevered in.—Leave was granted.

SAVINGS BANKS.] On the motion of Sir J. Newport, the House went into a Committee on the Irish Savings Banks' Bill, when several amendments were introduced.—Report on Monday.

COTTON TWIST.] Mr. Davenport presented a petition of manufacturers and weavers of Stockport, complaining of the exportation of cotton yarn, and praying the interference of Parliament to check or prevent it. It complained of the great distress of the weavers from want of employment; of the increase of pauperism, and its attendant evils; and attributed this distress in a great degree to the unlimited exportation of cotton yarn, for the encouragement of foreign weavers at the expense of our own. It concluded by praying for a prohibitory law.—Upon the motion that it lie on the table,

Mr. Cawthorne expressed a wish that this and similar petitions on the same subject should be referred to a Committee of the whole House, which might take into consideration the evil complained of, and inquire into the best means of remedying it. He did not wish to set the cotton-spinners and cotton-weavers against each other; but it was of the utmost importance that Government should consider the matter, and adjust their opposing interests. He was no manufacturer himself, nor had any connexion with manufactures; but coming from a part of the country which depended so much on the success of manufactures, he could not be deaf to the prayer of the petitioners, nor ignorant of the distress by which it was prompted. He wished to see British yarn woven by British looms, instead of foreign; and he believed, that if restrictions were laid on the exportation of cotton yarn, foreigners would be under the necessity of applying for our cloth, which could be furnished so cheap and so good as to command its proper share in the foreign market. Much would thus be done for our distressed manufacturers, as well as for the prosperity and tranquillity of the country.

* It may be a question, how far Members are warranted, by the rules and practice of the House, to come down and vote on particular occasions, after they have obtained leave of absence. On the 3d of June, when a motion was made, that Sir Edward O'Brien should have leave of absence, General Motley complained, that several members had come to vote on the Election of a Speaker, after their leave of absence was obtained. No notice, however, was taken of the remark; and, therefore, the point still remains open to inquiry. If a member obtain leave of absence for a month, it does not follow that he may not return to his seat before the expiration of that period, but the question is, whether he can come down and vote on a particular occasion, and then stay away, till his leave of absence expires?

Sir J. G. Egerton concurred in the wish for a Committee.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

REGULATION OF ALE-HOUSES.] Mr. Bennet rose, pursuant to notice, to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the laws relative to the licensing of public-houses, and for the better regulation of the same. He did not think it necessary to enter into many observations on the subject, as his present motion, and the provisions of the bill which he wished to bring in, arose out of the inquiry of a Committee which had reported its labours fully to the House, and suggested the principles on which he meant to proceed. The Committee of Inquiry into the Police of the Metropolis had sat nearly the whole of last session, and a great part of this, and one subject only had occupied its attention. It appeared to the Committee, that many of the vices of the lower orders arose out of the abuses of the licensing system, and the lax enforcement or inefficiency of the laws for regulating public-houses. The whole body of police officers and magistrates admitted this to a greater or less degree, while some of them entirely concurred with the Committee in the magnitude of the evil and its cause. The extent to which irregular public-houses existed was alarming to every friend of the happiness, good order, and morals of society. They were known by the police officers only, but connived at and even frequented by them. He had in his pocket a list of more than 200 such houses in the metropolis, which were haunted by the most irregular characters. They were resorted to, not only by men and women, thieves and depredators, but also by boys and girls of nine or ten years of age, who were initiated into the most depraved society, and trained to the most nefarious practices. In one which he had heard of, there was a regular court of justice and a jury, under the presidency of a Jew pickpocket, for directing the sale of stolen property, and the distribution of spoil; where the laws of depredation were reduced to a system, and the rules of the society enforced. (Hear, hear.) All the gains of the association were brought there, and divided according to the respective claims of the parties. (Hear.) He was credibly informed that a boy of thirteen years of age, who had been since transported, had there divided property for his share to the amount of 100*l.* (Hear, hear.) The Committee had inquired into many similar scenes, and had reported the result of their observations.—The hon. member then entered on the present management of public-houses, as detailed in the Report. The recognizances required of the publicans, as well as the certificate of character, were a mere nullity. The beadle, or clerks of the sessions, held lists of the publicans applying for license, and no inquiries were made into their previous conduct, respectability, or power of answering the responsibility they came under; only in one instance had the Committee found that the recognizance was satisfied. The character of those persons was never examined. He proposed, therefore, that character should be attested by a greater number of individuals, and that not only in the parish where the publican had resided for the last six months, but in that where the public-house was to be opened. With regard to the recognizance, he would propose, that the rules to which it bound the party should not only be more largely stated when entered into, but that the sum of money should be raised. If these rules were transgressed, the parties should be fined for the first offence to a considerable amount; still higher for the second; and on the commission of a third, the matter should go to a jury, and the publican, if found guilty, should then forfeit his recognizance, and be deprived of his license. The hon. member then adverted to the connexion between the brewer and the publican, and the obligation which the former laid upon the latter from the system of having the property of ale-houses to sell their beer exclusively. Great evils resulted from this: the public were under the necessity of buying frequently trash, or of resorting to the manufacture of small beer from treacle, by which the revenue was defrauded. He, therefore, proposed a clause in his bill, by which all such previous contracts between the brewer and the publican should be declared void. He knew that such contracts were so considered in a Court of law already. The Committee had also taken into their consideration the policy of allowing magistrates to deprive the publicans of their licenses without trial. Many cases of such deprivation of license had come before them; and they found that in every case where a reason was assigned, it was a bad one. The publican was thus at the mercy of the magistrates, who might out of mere whim and caprice deprive him of his means of livelihood, and expose him to all the calamities of want and despair. It might be said that a magistrate who misconducted himself might be brought to account; but no remedy could be obtained, except a corrupt motive was assigned and could be proved; which it was difficult, if not impossible, in most cases to establish. As the law now stood, a magistrate was not bound to give any reason for his conduct. He brought no charges against magistrates in general. He, as fully as any one, allowed their general respectability and great usefulness; but the system of licensing was seldom interfered with by the general body: they allowed that branch of their duty to be exercised by a few of their number, who had an interest in the abuses they connived at. No man's property and means of livelihood should be left to be disposed of at their pleasure and caprice, however respectable they might be in private character; especially when they were frequently brewers, or persons interested in the profits of the publican. The publicans, to become orderly and respectable, should be made independent, and should feel secure in their situation, except when found guilty of offences against the laws by a jury of their countrymen. His bill would, therefore, have for its objects a more respectable certificate of character, greater recognizances, and a diminution of the power of individual magistrates over ale-houses. The hon. member concluded by moving for leave to bring in a bill "for amending the Laws for regulating the manner of licensing ale-houses in that part of the united kingdom called England, and for the more effectually preventing disorders therein."

Mr. S. Wortley said, he thought this proceeding of his hon. friend very extraordinary. A Committee, of which he was the chairman, had been appointed to inquire into the Police of the Metropolis, and had produced a Report which was as yet in the hands of very few members; yet upon this report of a partial case, he moved for leave to bring in a bill for the whole kingdom. He not only objected to the mode and the hurry of the measure, but should oppose some of its most important clauses. He could not allow the power of depriving publicans of their licenses to be taken from the magistrates, which he conceived to be the only great check that the laws had imposed upon irregularities, and the only safe-guard of public morals, till he heard it proved that they had misconducted themselves in so important an exercise of their authority. If in the metropolis magistrates had been found, who had transgressed the limits of their duty, that respectable body all over the kingdom should not be condemned, unheard, for the errors of a few who came within the notice of this Committee, whose report was yet unprinted (No, no, from all parts of the House), or if printed, not distributed or circulated. Whether the Report was in the hands of members or not, it was only a Report on the Police of the Metropolis, and did not furnish ground for a national measure.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow said, that having, early in the session, presented a petition from 2000 licensed victuallers, complaining of the law as it now stood, he felt himself called upon to support the motion of the hon. member. He could not say that he approved of all the proposed clauses, but many of them were wholly unobjectionable. Perhaps it would be possible to adopt some modifications of the bill, which would adequately meet the inconvenience of vesting an absolute and unconditional power in magistrates. With respect to the alleged irregularity of the Committee in entering upon such an inquiry, he wished to state, that the petition from the licensed victuallers was specially referred to them; and therefore they had not exceeded their powers in reporting upon the subject.

Mr. H. Sumner saw no irregularity in the motion for leave to bring in a bill. The report was printed and in the hands of members.

Mr. S. Lefevre observed, that if the hon. member who objected to the motion had seen the evidence which was laid before the Committee, he would have found that it related not merely to the county of Middlesex, but to various other parts of the country, Berkshire, Surrey, &c. He thought there were great evils in the present system, and therefore he should support a proposition which tended to remove them.

Mr. Bennet replied, and, after a few words from Mr. Gooch and Mr. S. Wortley, denying, as far as their knowledge extended, any abuse in licensing by the magistracy, for electioneering purposes, leave was granted.

Mr. Bennet then brought in the bill, which was read a first time and ordered to be printed.

THE LATE SPEAKER.] Mr. Speaker reported Lord Colchester's answer to the Vote of Thanks of yesterday, as follows:—

"London, June 6, 1817.

"SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge your letter of this day, communicating to me a Resolution of the House of Commons, by which the House is pleased to express its thanks to me for my services as their Speaker, during the period in which I have been called upon to fill that high office. And having devoted the best years of my health and strength to the service of the House of Commons, with the consciousness that, during that long period, I have never ceased to exert my best endeavours to execute the various duties of the station which I held by their favour, however inadequately those duties may have been performed, I beg you will assure the House of the deep and lasting gratitude with which I now receive this distinguished testimony of its approbation.

"I request also that you, Sir, will be pleased to accept my best thanks, for the expressions of kindness with which you have conveyed to me this communication.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most faithful and most obedient servant,
COLCHESTER.

"To the Right Hon.
The Speaker of the House of Commons,
&c. &c. &c."

Lord Castlereagh brought up the Prince Regent's answer to the Address of yesterday, which requested his Royal Highness to confer some signal mark of favour upon the late Speaker. It was as follows:—

"The Prince Regent has the justest sense of the long services and great merit of Charles Lord Colchester, late Speaker of the House of Commons; and, in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, had already taken the same into his consideration.

"The Prince Regent is desirous, in compliance with the wishes of his Majesty's faithful Commons, to confer upon the said Lord Colchester some further signal mark of his favour; but, as the same cannot be effectually granted and secured without the concurrence of Parliament, his Royal Highness recommends to the House of Commons the adoption of such measures as may be necessary for the accomplishment of this purpose."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that this answer and recommendation be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next, which was agreed to.

NEW WRIT FOR CHIPPENHAM.—DISTRESS IN IRELAND.] Mr. F. Fitzgerald moved, that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the clerk of the Crown, to make out a new writ for the election of a member to serve in the present Parliament, for the borough of Chippenham, in the room of the right hon. Robert Peel, who, since his election, had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

Mr. Ponsonby said, he did not rise to object to the motion, but to advert to a subject which the absence of the right hon. gentleman would not justify him in passing over. As that absence would also probably continue for several days, he took this opportunity of referring to the alarming state of Ireland, from the scarcity of necessary provisions. It would be painful to dwell upon such a subject, but he could assure the House, upon the authority of numerous communications, that nothing could be more distressful than the situation of many parts, from the absolute want of food. He knew well that it would be impossible to provide a complete remedy, but he thought some good might be effected. Unless, indeed, something was done, the consequences must soon become most calamitous. One practicable measure of relief he would beg leave to suggest was, the buying up considerable quantities of rice, and distributing it in the most effectual mode without farther delay.

Lord Castlereagh felt deeply interested in the painful subject to which an allusion had been just made; and could assure the House, that his right hon. friend had long since turned his attention to it, and that every practicable remedy had been applied. The duties on rice had already been taken off, and measures adopted for supplying Ireland with large quantities of seed corn, for the double purpose of guard-

After a few words from Mr. Ponsonby, the question was put and carried.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.] On the motion of Mr. Phillips, the order for calling over the House on Monday next, was discharged, and appointed for Monday the 16th.

ELECTION LAWS.] The Ireland Election Laws Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

COLONIAL ACTS.] Mr. Goulburn brought up a copy of the acts passed in the Colonies, pursuant to an order of the House; and stated that, for the convenience of the Colonial-office, he should make a motion towards the close of the session, that they be returned to that department.

Mr. W. Smith expressed his surprise that these acts had not been produced at an earlier period; he thought it very desirable that the House should retain possession of such important documents.

Sir S. Romilly observed, it was very proper that the House of Commons should be in possession of a complete collection of these laws. He understood that of some of them no duplicates existed.

Mr. Goulburn said, he had certainly found it very difficult to procure copies of all the acts; and it was very possible that in many instances no duplicates could be obtained. This was the reason which induced him to wish that they should be restored to the office.

Mr. W. Smith stated, that many islands had been so careless of their own laws, that no copies could be procured of them.

Sir S. Romilly thought it very extraordinary, that the supreme court of judicature in this country should have to sit in appeal upon these laws, and yet be left to guess at them. It was much to be regretted that no complete collection had been made.

Mr. Goulburn said, many of the islands had formerly considered it too great an expense to print the acts. Government had latterly expostulated with them on this subject, and the more recent enactments had been published.

The papers were then laid on the table.

CIVIL SERVICES RECOMPENSE BILL.] The order of the day having been moved for the House to resolve itself into a Committee on this bill,

Mr. Calcraft rose and observed, that, as one of the members of the Committee, he approved of the principle of the bill; and although sinecures had certainly been much condemned by the people, yet the House must recollect, that they were in the hands of a very strong party,—the Crown: and he did not think it fair or right that the Crown should be called upon to make this sacrifice without receiving some compensation. Out of the pension list, however, and particularly out of the pension list for Ireland, very large sums might be carved for this purpose. At present we were taking away from the Crown about 90 or 100,000*l.*, and giving it only 42,000*l.* With regard to the bill itself, he thought that no pension should be granted till a sinecure fell.

Mr. Boswell said, that the bill did not so much give a recompense to the Crown, as to the officers holding situations under it. For his part, he wished the offices to be continued, and desired to enter his protest against a change.

¶ Sir J. Newport was surprised at the observations of the hon. member who had just spoken. Sinecure offices had fallen into such disrepute in the country, that they could be no longer considered as honourable rewards for service, which they were formerly intended to be. He begged to ask the noble lord, whether he had understood him correctly on a former occasion, that, in case the bill for suppressing these offices failed, the Crown would be advised to withhold its consent from the compensation bill?

Lord Castlereagh had no difficulty in stating, that Ministers would do every thing in good faith with respect to this measure, both as regarded their official influence and their individual exertions. (Hear, hear.)

The Speaker left the chair, when a conversation ensued on various clauses of the bill, which were finally agreed to without a division.

After the House had resumed, Mr. V. Fitzgerald stated, that he declined any emolument in lieu of the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland, which he had resigned, and which did not now exist. (Hear, hear.)

The report was ordered for Tuesday.

TITHES LEASING BILL.] The report of this bill was further considered; the bill re-committed; considered in a Committee, and the Committee ordered to sit again on Tuesday next.

MINT OFFICES REGULATION BILL.—MUTINY BILL.] These bills were respectively considered in a Committee, and ordered to be reported; the former on Tuesday next, the latter on Monday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, June 9.

The Salt Bill was read a second time.—The Poor Employment Bill passed through a Committee, and was reported without amendment.

Monday, June 9.

REPEAL OF THE SEPTENNIAL ACT.] Sir S. Romilly gave notice, that in consequence of the indisposition of his hon. friend, (Mr. Brougham) his motion for to-morrow would be postponed till Thursday week.

USURY LAWS.] The following petition of the Directors of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures, established by Royal Charter, in the city of Glasgow, in favour of the Usury

Laws Repeal Bill, was presented, and ordered to lie on the table:—"That the laws which regulate or restrain the rate of interest of money, appear to your petitioners to be useless, impracticable, and impolitic; useless, because they neither prevent prodigality, protect simplicity, benefit indigence, nor check improvidence; impracticable, because by the system of purchasing goods, borrowing on annuities, and many other modes which are at present authorized, a legal door is opened to their evasion; and impolitic, because they interfere with the private concerns of individuals, interrupt the operation of mercantile policy, compel the sacrifice of property, increase the embarrassments of the country, induce the infraction of the laws, corrupt the public morals, impede the progress of commercial enterprise and agricultural improvement, and divert the surplus capital of the nation from its legitimate and patriotic employment at home, to the accommodation and aggrandisement of foreign states; that the repeal of the laws against usury would not be attended with injury to individuals, because it would not be followed with a rise of the rate of interest, which depends, like the price of every other article, on the supply and demand; besides at present the market rate of interest is lower than the legal; and because, even under the existing system, there is no impediment to the creditor calling up his money, and foreclosing the mortgage whenever he esteems it to be for his advantage; that the repeal of the laws against usury would not create inconvenience to the public, because it would not occasion any greater fluctuation in the terms of loans than is experienced in all the other daily transactions of life, or in national contracts, where Government are left perfectly free; and to prevent misconceptions, where no previous agreement was made, the present rate of interest might be declared to be the rule of settlement; that the repeal of the laws against usury would not produce the effect of embarrassing the Government in their contracts for loans, because the national security is always preferred to that of individuals, because the terms are not affected by the legal rate of interest, but by the quantity of money in the market, the prospect of rise in the funds, and the comparative advantage resulting from investments in the stocks, and other means of employing capital, and because on the principle, even if it were correct, of facilitating the public engagements, by contracting the sphere of private competition, there might with equal propriety be a restriction on the purchase of land, or the pursuits of commerce."—The petitioners therefore humbly prayed that the bill now pending before the House to abolish those regulations which restrain the rate of interest of money, might be passed into a law; leaving it to the wisdom of the House to enact such provisions, as to the time and mode of the measure, as might prevent immediate inconvenience or injury to the people.

On the motion of Mr. Sergeant Onslow, the bill was read a second time, Mr. Calcraft intimating his intention to oppose it in the Committee.

BANKRUPT LAWS.] A petition was presented of merchants, traders, and inhabitants of Bristol, complaining of the bankrupt laws, and of the manner in which they are at present administered.—Ordered to lie on the table.

POOR REMOVAL BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

GRANT TO THE LATE SPEAKER.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the House resolved itself into a Committee to consider the Prince Regent's Answer to the Address of Thursday last.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, after a warm eulogium on the merits of the late Speaker, entered into a consideration of the provision which it was desirable to make for him. He adverted to the allowance made to Mr. Speaker Onslow on his retiring from the chair in the early part of this reign, which was 3,000*l.* a year; and observed, that considering the depreciation in the value of money, and the increase of duties which the Speaker had to perform, 4,000*l.* a year to Lord Colchester during his life, and 3,000*l.* a year to his immediate successor, would not be too liberal a vote. The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving a resolution to that effect.

Mr. H. Sumner considered the sum insufficient, when compared with the grant to Mr. Speaker Onslow. After expatiating on the services of the late Speaker, he ended with proposing, as an amendment, that the grant be increased to 5,000*l.* per annum, for the life of that gentleman, and hinted that his immediate successor ought to have 4,000*l.* He should also propose, that the grant be extended to three lives. He thought the public purse could never be too poor to reward eminent public services.

Sir M. W. Ridley said, that none could estimate the services and merits of the late Speaker more highly than himself; but in fixing the amount of the grant, there were other considerations to be attended to more imperious than even gratitude itself; and the hon. gentleman's assumption that the public purse could never be too poor to pay public services was altogether without foundation. The state of the public means was such that we could not now part with one shilling, without the most mature consideration; but the noble lord (Colchester) had a place of 1,900*l.* a year in Ireland, which would make his income, received from the public, amount to 5,300*l.* a year.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that this discussion confirmed him in the idea that his proposal was, under all circumstances, the best; and he recommended the House to adhere to it: at the same time he must add, that the place in Ireland was given as a compensation for one that had been relinquished.

Mr. Pensonby was extremely glad the amendment had been withdrawn. With every respect for the Speaker, and value for his services, he felt there were other duties to be attended to in fixing the amount of the grant. He could not agree that the office of 1,300*l.* a year was to be put out of the question; the public paid it, and the question was, not under what name or form, but to what amount. He believed that every man in the country would think that 5,300*l.* was a sufficient grant; and he hoped the hon. member would not press the extension of the grant to three lives instead of two, for he should certainly oppose it.

Mr. Sumner explained, and insisted, that in the sum proposed for the late Speaker no proportion was observed with regard to the different grants for eminent military services.

Mr. Tierney declared, that no man could feel more grateful than himself for the services of the late Speaker, but it would be inconsistent with his ideas of economy to grant more than had been proposed; and he felt some indignation at the manner in which the grant had been at first mentioned to the House. Under the present circumstances of the country, and according to all the precedents, he could not for himself agree to pay the late Speaker 4,000*l.* a year. On what grounds was that sum proposed? The noble lord had no longer to support that hospitality which was expected of him when Speaker, and was the salary to be continued when the hospitality it was meant to support was no longer requisite? Besides, what had been the scale to others? There was a bill before the House in which the utmost reward that could be bestowed on civil services was limited to 3,000*l.* a year for one life; and though the Speaker's exertions were great, what were they when compared with those of such a man as Mr. Pitt, who had the interests of all Europe to attend to? And yet his wardenship of the Cinque Ports was not worth more than 3,000*l.* a year. What Minister had ever been rewarded on the scale now proposed? Lord Wellington had no more than 2,000*l.* a year attached to his rank of Viscount. Why had the Speaker greater claims on the public purse for services, which, after all, were services affecting the health alone?—for, as to the anxiety that had been talked of, he felt less than any man in the House, or perhaps was the only man entirely without anxiety; he existed in a sort of middle atmosphere, between the two contending parties, and his absence from all care seemed to him (Mr. T.) quite enviable. He had only to remain erect in his chair, to bend his head to one side or the other, and enjoy the fray of contending parties. (A laugh.) He was unwilling to say more; but if the hon. gentleman persevered, he must oppose the extension of the grant to the third life, that the public might not have too much reason to censure the improvident guardianship of the public purse.

Mr. Curwen expressed the highest regard for the Speaker, but coincided in the sentiments expressed by his hon. friend, on account of the state of the country, and the distress of our finances.

Mr. Lambton moved, as an amendment, that the grant should be 3,000*l.* instead of 4,000*l.*

The House divided on the amendment.

The original motion for 4,000*l.* a year to Lord Colchester, and 3,000*l.* a year to his immediate successor, was then agreed to.

Mr. Ponsonby then rose and observed, that when the communication respecting the late Speaker first came to the House from the Crown, an objection was made against taking it into consideration. The proposition was in consequence withdrawn; but he saw no notice of that fact, in the journals, in which it ought to appear.

The Speaker said, it was perhaps his duty to explain the circumstance as far as he was informed upon it. It was true, it did not appear in the votes, and could not appear on the journals. A motion made on the same day by the hon. member for Carlisle, was certainly noticed; but that was regularly withdrawn, and therefore appeared in the votes. There was a difference in the two cases. It appeared to be understood to be the general sense that, as on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's motion, a different suggestion was agreed to, and the motion immediately withdrawn, it should not appear at all. For himself he had only, as he stated when he was first raised to the chair, to throw himself upon the indulgence of the House. They would see that there was a difficulty now in curing the defect, as the remedy would come irregularly. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's motion was not withdrawn in the regular way by consent of the House.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he had little to add, after the clear statement from the chair. He had certainly felt disposed to withdraw his motion, and thought it better that no notice should be taken of it, which he also considered to have been the feeling of the House.

Mr. Ponsonby meant not in the slightest degree to ascribe any blame to the Speaker, but there appeared to have been some misunderstanding. There was a general assent to the withdrawing of the motion, but it was not the understanding of himself and of many others that it was not to be entered upon the journals. At present the journals contained an imperfect representation of the conduct of the House.

Lord Castlereagh saw nothing irregular in the proceeding. In either way the same result was obtained. A great object in withdrawing the motion was to procure unanimity. The transaction at present stood fairly on the journals.

Mr. C. Wynn thought the House would have lost its own dignity if it had proceeded on the communication. He should prefer that the withdrawing of the motion was noticed, to shew that the House did not think fit to proceed upon it.

Mr. Canning said, nobody could mistake the fact, that no proceeding took place on the message: but that on the next day the House took up the business itself. Whatever jealousy might be entertained respecting parliamentary forms, he thought that expressive silence answered every purpose. He had great objections to going back to the matter.

Mr. Ponsonby saw no difficulty in making the entry. If it was right to do so at first, it could not be wrong to do so now.

Mr. C. Wynn said, the question should be, whether notice should be taken, or else whether the original message should be expunged from the journals or not.

Mr. Banks did not perceive any irregularity. He believed that on a division there would have been a majority for the original message; but he, for one, wished for unanimity. The message from the Crown came first, and there was no regular withdrawing of the motion. The whole matter was, that the House chose to proceed in its own way, and not by the message.

Sir C. Manck believed there were not ten members in the House who did not blame the first proceeding. The votes were supposed to be made up regularly. It was said it was now too late; but by the insertion the whole proceeding would appear more clearly, and for future advantage. Ministers appeared to wish to have their mistake suppressed in the journals.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that there was no question before the House.

Mr. C. Wynn said, it was too much for the right hon. gentleman to say that there was no question before the House, when an irregularity was the subject of conversation.

Lord Palmerston said, he had attended to what had passed when the Chancellor of the Exchequer withdrew his motion. It was suggested to that right hon. gentleman, that it was most advisable that the motion should not appear at all. His (Lord P.'s) feeling at the time was, that this was formally acquiesced in, as no dissent was expressed. With that impression he left the House that night.

Mr. Croker said, he had a similar recollection, and had told a friend of his, that there was a general acquiescence that it should not appear at all.

Mr. Ponsonby said, there was a general understanding certainly for withdrawing the motion: but he would solemnly declare, that it never entered his mind that the fact was not to be entered. He only desired to see it stated in the journals that the motion was withdrawn. He therefore moved, that the following Entry be made in the Journal of this House of Tuesday the 3d day of June, after the Entry of the Prince Regent's Message concerning Charles Lord Colchester, late Speaker of this House.—“Motion made, and question proposed, that his Royal Highness's said gracious Message be referred to a Committee of the House, for Thursday next;—and the said motion was, with leave of the House, withdrawn.”

Lord Castlereagh repeated, that he understood

it to be the sense of the House that the matter should not appear.

Dr. Phillimore said, it appeared to him, that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to withdraw his motion, there was a general "no" from the House.

Mr. Ponsonby believed the general "no" applied to the adjournment of the debate.—The motion was negatived without a division.

GAME LAWS.] Colonel Wood moved the second reading of the bill for legalizing the sale of game. He observed, that his object was to stop poaching, a practice which had spread through the kingdom, destroying the morals of the poor, and encouraging many vices. If those who opposed the bill could be convinced it would check that evil, he was sure they would be in favour of it. He wished that game was made private property; and could see no reason against it. He then cited a case of Sutton v. Moody, in which Lord Holt said, that a man had no more property in rabbits in a warren than in his own lands; that the property belonged to him at the starting, but that in the hunting it belonged to the hunters. This was the law from the time of Henry VIII. Lord Kenyon, at Westminster, in a case where a man had started a hare, and another took it up in another ground, quoted the opinion of Lord Holt. It appeared, from various circumstances, that game had been recognised as private property. It was said, that if its sale were legalized, the poachers would destroy it all, as they would find a better market. How could that be? At present, poachers did not go out and get game, and then look for their market; no, they knew their market well beforehand. The game which supplied this great metropolis was taken and collected in the country and transmitted to the salesmen, from whom it came to the poulterers, and from them to the public at large. The salesmen and poulterers were in a hard situation, for the penalty was on the seller and not on the buyer. The poulterer frequently could not carry on his trade without dealing in game. In justice the matter ought not to remain so. He did not expect the House would lay heavy penalties on the purchaser; but then they ought to give a legal supply. The magistrate had the power to search the house of every suspected unqualified person, and could impose a penalty of 20*s*. In the Committee this might be increased if the House pleased, to 5*l*. Every existing facility for preserving game might be retained. Much had been said about a man of small property, living near a large preserve, attracting the game by high feeding; but the more the subject was considered, the objection would appear imaginary. The present system was ruinous. It was asked, "Could gentlemen sell game?" Why not? Did they not at present sell their pigs, and fowls, sheep, and horses, that sometimes tumbled down for a after they were purchased? Was it less profitable then to sell a pheasant? Many gentlemen would agree to this alteration. He knew that Lord Anglesea, not a penurious nobleman, had said, that he was ready to send up his game for the supply of London; adding, that his own chief pleasure was in shooting it. At present the salesman generally had three-pence per hare, the poulterer sixpence, and the carriage of a hare for 100 miles was but a shilling. It was said that the game cost the poachers nothing: he would say it cost the gentleman nothing: it cost the poacher his day's work, which he lost by going out at night after the game. The poacher, therefore, might be undersold. Suppose the duty on French Brandy was reduced, would not smuggling also be diminished? So it would be, if we took off the duty on French gloves; and the articles would be less rare and valuable. Let hares and pheasants be sold like chickens and turkeys, and probably many would prefer the latter who now desire the former. There was a duty on French game, which, if taken off, would occasion a great supply from the Continent. He considered resident country gentlemen the greatest blessing of this country, and regretted that so many were absent from their estates, which stood so much in need of their presence. If the bill should diminish the bad practices that prevailed in the country by poaching, spring-guns, and steel-traps, it would be a material advantage to country gentlemen, and encourage their residence. Let the House recollect, that by an account upon the table, not less than 1200 persons were confined last year under the Game Laws. For sheep stealing, or chicken stealing, it would be found that 1-50th part of the number had not been committed. Ought not such an evil, generated by the prohibition of sale, to be remedied? It was not to be supposed, that he undervalued the Game Laws in general; they kept up the character and spirit of gentlemen: but he was for altering them, and placing them upon a better footing. Those were his reasons for introducing the present bill; and he hoped the House would not object to go into a Committee upon it.

Lord Deerhurst was astonished that a bill, which ought to have been crushed at first, should have been allowed to proceed so far. It should not, however, proceed farther without his voice being raised against its very injurious tendency. The object of the bill, as appeared from the correspondence of the hon. colonel with another hon. colonel, a member of the House, was to give country gentlemen an opportunity of selling their game; and a noble marquis was named as prepared to avail himself of the law, if passed: yet the country gentlemen would be constantly undersold by poachers. The case would be similar to that of two broom-makers, who sold their brooms in adjoining stalls. The one sold so as to have the very smallest profit; the other sold a halfpenny cheaper. The former asked, with astonishment, how he could sell so cheap? Why, replied the latter, because I steal my brooms ready made. Just so the poacher could get his game ready made. (A laugh.) The difficulty of effecting a sale was the great means of entrapping poachers. Let them not cut up the goose for the golden eggs. The history of sale at present was thus: a person bought game of the poacher at 7s. the brace, and sold them to a poulterer in London for 15s.; he again sold them to the consumer for 2 guineas. If sale were legalized, a door would be opened to game-keepers and others to poach and sell without risk of detection or fear of punishment. If citizens, who had much money, must have game, let them get it on the same terms with country gentlemen. They had it at present for one-fourth of the expense of rearing it. (Hear, hear.) If this bill passed, in two years there would be no game in the country. The House should be very cautious how it listened to such a proposal. From small beginnings great consequences often proceeded. He nuncia seriatim in mala. This was not a time to disgust resident gentlemen.—He concluded by moving that the bill be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. Curwen said, he wished to give every encouragement to country gentlemen to reside on their estates: but the severity of the game laws defeated the purposes for which they were intended, and the whole nature of them ought to be altered. They were most unjust and pernicious; they took away and gave a right of property arbitrarily. One man was fined 80l. for what, in other circumstances, cost only 5l. Nothing could make the poacher view his conduct as criminal while public licences were given. He must say to gentlemen who were against legalized sale, that they acted very unaccountably. The nobleman alluded to, he believed, meant to sell merely to set an example. It had been observed, that this was not a time to disgust gentlemen. Was it, he would ask, a time to disgust the country? The whole body of the people reprobated those laws. He would recommend to the hon. colonel rather to withdraw the bill, and to prepare a more general measure for next session. As to the argument that game cost the poacher nothing: it cost him an incalculable price. Was loss of leg or limb nothing? He lost more than his labour; he lost his liberty and hazarded his life. Some alteration was necessary for all classes, for the little as well as the great. (Hear, hear.) The country was dissatisfied with the invidious distinction of the present system. He should vote with the hon. colonel, but he would rather the bill were withdrawn.

Sir C. Burrell thought that houses for the sale of game would encourage tipping, and that poachers would become thieves and robbers by this bill. Though the sale of rabbits was legalized, poaching was not prevented. Since, therefore, this principle did not hold in that particular instance, it could not be maintained as a general principle. The monied interest suffered no hardship, for they could have game on the same terms as the country gentlemen; that is, if they laid out their money, for which they now received 15 per cent., in the purchase of land, for which they could receive only 24 per cent. (Hear, hear.) He concurred with the hon. member for Carlisle, that a deeper measure was necessary, and he would go into a Committee upon any plan that might put down poaching.

Mr. Wilberforce considered something of this nature loudly called for, in order to protect the morals and comforts of the public. By the present system of game laws, people in the country, who might be expected to be more virtuous than manufacturing citizens, were rendered much more depraved. There was a peculiar difficulty in this case. Gentlemen of the highest rank and station, lords, judges, and magistrates purchased game, (cries of no, no); he had made inquiry into the subject, and found that persons of all kinds purchased game. (Hear, hear.) In other cases, the receiver was held to be as bad as the thief; in this case, the higher classes did, without any penalty, what cost the poor their moral principles, their character, and their liberty. The former felt neither loss nor reflection: the latter were transported, and often trained for the gallows. The objection, that the bill would increase poaching, was obviated by the circumstance that game was already sold. The objections as to tipping-houses, and other supposed evils, could be removed by giving licences only for limited periods, and during good behaviour. Gentlemen would then buy only of honest dealers, and a sharp look-out would be kept upon those that sold game. Some clauses might, he admitted, be added to the bill to the effect of preventing poachers from supplying the licensed seller. He had inquired how this matter stood in France, and read a letter stating, that while poaching brought to the gallows, the practice was most frequent; now that game was declared to be the property of the proprietor of the land, poaching was no longer a trade. A remedy was immediately called for, since 1,200 people had been confined upon those laws in the course of a year. The loss to the poacher was even greater than had been stated. He lost the freedom of the empire; he acquired the face of an evil-doer, and met every man with a downcast eye. The value of the class of men thus exposed was very great, and their interests ought not for one moment to be neglected. An immediate, innocent, efficient remedy should therefore be adopted. The interests of members and constituents were here in some measure opposed, and the public had their eyes upon the House, to mark whether they regarded the first principles of morality, and consulted the dictates of justice, and the suggestions of humanity. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. G. Bankes observed, that the hon. gentleman attempted to enforce his experiment by means of the public voice: but he was convinced he began at the wrong end. Till a thorough change was made, the foundation on which whole system stood should not be shaken. Persons would qualify under such a law, and purchase a little from the fair dealer as a cloak for large purchases from poachers. (Hear, hear.) Gamekeepers especially would have every facility for deception and fraud.

Mr. Preston was of opinion, that the House should go into a Committee on the bill.

Sir J. Sebright conceived that something was necessary to be done; game should be declared private property as well as turkeys and geese. To this bill, and every thing short of that, he was resolved to give every opposition.

Mr. Goulbourn said, that as France had been referred to, he would tell gentlemen, that he knew of a country where the relaxation of the laws occasioned the entire destruction of game.

Colonel Wood, in reply, observed, that as he wished sincerely well to the bill, he thought he could not do better than not press it to a division. The game-keepers were the greatest poachers in England; one half of the game sold in London was killed by them.

The second reading was then put and negatived, and ordered for that day six months, without a division.

ORDNANCE AND MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.] The House resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, when the Ordnance and other Estimates were taken into consideration.

Mr. Ward said, he would move the different Resolutions, and was ready to answer any questions that might be asked. The sums required this year were, with the exception of those for Ireland, one half less than the corresponding sums of last year.—The following sums were then voted:

348,959*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.* “in full, for the charge of the Office of Ordnance for land service for Great Britain for 1817.”—63,186*l.* 15*s.* 3*d.* “in full, for the charge of the Office of Ordnance for Ireland, for 1817.”—25,000*l.* “in full, for defraying the expenses of reduction in the Office of Ordnance for land service in Great Britain in 1817.”—105,728*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.* “in full, for the charge of the Office of Ordnance for Great Britain, on account of the allowances to retired general officers, to superannuated, retired, and half-pay officers, to officers seconded, and to officers for good services, to superannuated or disabled men; also for pensions to widows and children of deceased officers, late belonging to the several Ordnance Military Corps, for 1817.”—15,008*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.* “in full, for the charge of allowances, compensations, and emoluments in the nature of superannuated or retired allowances to persons late belonging to the Office of Ordnance in Great Britain, in respect of their having held any public offices or employments of a civil nature; and also for the charge of widows’ pensions, for the year 1817.”—7,000*l.* “in full, for the charge of the Office of Ordnance in Ireland, on account of the pay of retired officers of the late Irish Artillery and Engineers, and of pensions to widows of deceased officers of the same, for 1817.”—1,750*l.* “in full, for the charge of allowances, compensations and emoluments, in the nature of superannuated or retired allowances, to persons late belonging to the Office of Ordnance in Ireland, in respect of their having held any public offices or employments of a civil nature; and also for the charge of widows’ pensions, for 1817.”—15,814*l.* “for defraying the charge of the Civil Establishment of Sierra Leone in Africa, from the 1st Jan. to the 31st of Dec. 1817.”—13,440*l.* “for the Province of Nova Scotia in America.”—12,815*l.* “for New South Wales.”—11,325*l.* “for the Province of Upper Canada in America.”

Some inquiries were here made by Mr. Curwen respecting the encouragement given to emigration.

Mr. Goulbourn replied, that the happiest effect had resulted from the measures adopted by Government; this year the only encouragement given was the providing of land and sea coast for emigrants on their arrival.

6,247*l.* 10*s.* “for the Province of New Brunswick in America.”—5,485*l.* “for the Island of Newfoundland in America.”—5,826*l.* “for the Island of Saint John (now called Prince Edward Island) in America.”—3,301*l.* 10*s.* “for the Bahama Islands, in addition to the salaries now paid to the public officers out of the Duty Fund, and the incidental charges attending the same.”—2,550*l.* for Cape Breton in America.”—600*l.* “for the Island of Dominica.”—17,000*l.* to defray the charge for printing Acts of Parliament for the two Houses of Parliament, for the sheriffs, clerks of the peace, and chief magistrates throughout the United Kingdom, and for the acting justices throughout Great Britain; also for printing bills, reports, evidences, and other papers and accounts for the House of Lords, for 1817.”—2,552*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* “for printing 1250 copies of the 49th volume of Journals of the House of Peers.”—815*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* “to make good the deficiency of the grant of 1816 for printing 1750 copies of the 69th volume of Journals of the House of Commons.”—3,500*l.* “for printing 1750 copies of the 70th volume of Journals of the House, being for the Session of 1815.”—3,250*l.* “for printing 1750 copies of the 71st volume of Journals of the House, being for the Session of 1816.”—3,250*l.* for printing 1750 copies of the 72d volume of Journals of the House, being for the present Session.”—3,500*l.* “for re-printing Journals and Reports of the House in 1817.”—6,472*l.* 17*s.* “to make good the deficiency of the grant for the year 1816 for re-printing Journals and Reports of the House of Commons.”—21,000*l.* “for printing Bills, Reports, and other papers, by order of the House during the present Session.”—8,197*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* “to make good the deficiency of the Grant of 1816 for printing Bills, Reports, and other Papers, by order of the House during the last Session.”—2,500*l.* “for printing the Votes of the House during the present Session.”

Mr. Bankey wished to know, whether the improved machinery was made use of in printing such voluminous works? He thought it would produce considerable saving.

Mr. Arbuthnot said, he had intended to have a Committee appointed on those matters. Inferior paper was used this year, which had reduced the charges a little; but the suggestion respecting the improved machinery was well deserving of attention, as it might bring them still lower.

4,895*l.* 6*s.* "for the superintendence of aliens for 1817."—13,500*l.* "for the relief of American Loyalists for 1817, and that the said sum be issued and paid without any fee or other deduction whatsoever."—3,000*l.* "to defray the expense of confining and maintaining criminal lunatics for 1817, without any fee or deduction."—20,000*l.* "to defray the expense of law charges for the year 1817."—4,000*l.* "for the extraordinary expenses that may be incurred for prosecutions, &c. relating to the coin for 1817."—266*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* "for superannuation allowance or compensation to one of the late pay-masters of Exchequer Bills for 1817; and that the said sum be issued and paid without any fee or other deduction whatsoever."—1,950*l.* "for superannuation allowances or compensations to retired clerks and other officers formerly employed in the office of the Commissioners for auditing the public accounts, for 1817; without any fee or deduction."—331*l.* 10*s.* "for superannuation allowances or compensations to retired clerks and other officers, formerly employed in the Lottery Office, for 1817; without any fee or deduction."—620*l.* for superannuation allowances or compensations to retired officers formerly employed in the Mint, for 1817; without any fee or deduction."—20,000*l.* "to be applied in further execution of an Act of the 43d year of his present Majesty towards making roads and building bridges in the Highlands of Scotland, for 1817; without any fee or deduction."—Item 25,000*l.* "for the Caledonian Canal."

Mr. Gordon wished to know, whether it was the determination of Government to lavish such extravagant sums in a work that was represented as so unpromising?

Mr. Arbuthnot said, that whether the money already expended was well or ill laid out, it would be highly improper now to withhold the necessary supplies.

Mr. Curwen objected to so large a grant for this purpose in so thin a house.

Mr. Arbuthnot said, he did not wish to press it at present: he thought, however, a smaller sum could not be granted, and that it was particularly proper in the present season of distress, arising from the want of employment, not to interrupt an undertaking which must necessarily be finished, and which would give work to so many persons. If the Committee thought proper, he would withdraw the resolution, and bring it forward on a subsequent day.

The resolution was then withdrawn.

Ordinance and Miscellaneous Estimates. [1850

2,695*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* "to be applied towards the repairs of Henry the Seventh's Chapel, for the year 1817; without any fee or deduction."—3,000*l.* "to defray the expense of the National Vaccine Establishment, for 1817; without any fee or deduction."

Mr. S. Lefevre asked, whether any report had been made of the number vaccinated, and of the number who, being vaccinated, had subsequently taken the small-pox?

Mr. Arbuthnot answered, that he did not know of any such report.

Mr. Curwen thought that the subject should be inquired into, and that the public money ought not to be voted away in support of an establishment whose benefits, if vaccination did not completely secure against the small-pox, were equivocal.

Mr. F. Lewis deprecated any opinion going forth from such high authority as a member of Parliament, that would tend to unsettle the minds of the people with regard to the discovery, the benefits of which could not be doubted. Though there might be particular cases of small-pox, after vaccination, yet these would be found to be so disproportioned to the number in which it acted as a complete preventive, that no suspicion should be thrown upon it that might limit its extension. Nothing had ever been proved by those who opposed its introduction, or who endeavoured to depreciate its effects, that could in any way destroy the belief of its being one of the greatest blessings that science or invention had conferred on mankind. (Hear, hear.) It was not necessary for the proof of its efficacy to shew that no person vaccinated had ever afterwards been liable to the small-pox; it was only requisite to shew that if any such cases existed, they were insignificant in comparison with those where it operated a complete protection. Its reputation in this manner had been completely established, and a solitary instance to the contrary could furnish no ground for suspicion, far less give any countenance to a policy that would neglect an establishment destined to extend its benefits. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Curwen, in explanation, denied that he had attempted to excite suspicion; he only wished to lay a ground for examination.

Lord Castlereagh said, that in making a comparison between the advantages of vaccination and inoculation, as to the number of deaths which took place under each mode of treatment, it ought to be recollected, that the latter not only endangered the lives of those who underwent the operation, but created an atmosphere of infection which extended the disease to others. In this respect vaccination, which never enlarged the sphere of contagion, had decidedly the advantage, even though it did not always protect from the small-pox, and might be regarded as a great blessing to mankind. (Hear, hear.) The tendency of the practice was therefore to diminish and finally to extinguish the small-pox. In some places of Europe this had nearly been its result. By extending the practice, therefore, there was every reason to believe that the small-pox might be eradicated as a disease altogether, and then neither vaccination nor inoculation would be necessary. (Hear.)

Mr. Wilberforce said, the practice of vaccination was not confined to this country. It had been tried in every country, and in every climate, and had been the source of the greatest blessings. Its efficacy had been established in a degree unexpected and undoubted. Suspicions, indeed, had been raised, but not on a solid foundation. In this country, where the people prided themselves on their liberty, and were averse to adopt any new practice at the dictation of others, vaccination had not produced its full benefits, because it could not easily be universally enforced. The small-pox therefore still continued to spread infection. In other countries the practice was more general, and had been more beneficial. Even here it had established its claim as a preservative against the small-pox as much as inoculation; for he had himself known instances where the latter was a complete protection. If any case of a vaccinated person's taking the small-pox occurred, it was immediately declared that vaccination was universally useless or inefficacious; whereas, it would be found as great a safeguard as inoculation, and had tended more than any other discovery of modern or ancient times to diminish mortality among the young.

Mr. Rose supported the grant. He had himself been the means of establishing a Board of Inquiry, which had held an extensive correspondence on the subject of vaccination both at home and abroad; and which, being composed of persons without any bias, might be considered as a mediating party between the zealous friends of the practice and the public; and all the information which they had collected tended to confirm a belief in its efficacy.

Mr. Lefevre wished to see the Report of this Board.

Mr. Arbutnot said, he would withdraw the resolution if it was objected to. (No, no, from all parts of the House.)

The resolution was then passed.

§ 571. 16s. 5d. "on account of the expenses to be incurred in the management of the British Museum, for 1817."—§ 3,038*l.* "for the Barrack Department in Great Britain, in 1817."—§ 300,649*l.* "for the supply of bread, meat and forage, coals, candles, straw, and furniture, for the troops in Great Britain; and for casual supplies for the troops on foreign stations, and also for the pay of the commissariat department, for 1817."

The House then resumed, and the Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

CLERGY RESIDENCE BILL.] This bill was considered in a Committee, when several blanks were filled up, and the Committee was ordered to sit again.

IRISH GRAND JURY.] Mr. F. Fitzgerald

brought in a bill "to provide for the more deliberate investigation of Presentments to be made by Grand Juries for Roads and Public Works in Ireland," which was read a first time.

Tuesday, June 10.

POOR EMPLOYMENT BILL.] The Earl of Liverpool moved the third reading of this bill. He said, no person could be more deeply impressed than he was with the soundness of the general principle, that Parliament ought not to interfere by grants of this nature with the carrying on of public works. He was perfectly satisfied that they might be conducted in a much better manner by individuals or private bodies; and to their capital and industry, generally speaking, they ought to be left. This was a sound general principle, and one which ought never to be lost sight of in this country. Circumstances, however, might exist in which it would be of advantage to lend the assistance of public credit to the support of useful public works; and the present situation of the country appeared to him to afford a proper ground for such a proceeding. The measure was not without precedent; for a grant of the same nature had been made in 1793 and 1809: and it was a singular circumstance, that on both those occasions the whole of the money allowed to be granted was not demanded; and he believed he had a right to say, that the trust was executed with the utmost impartiality, and in such a manner as to give entire satisfaction. The present measure, he admitted, was in some respects different from those to which he had referred; but their general nature was the same. In many places works of public utility had been begun, and necessarily given up, owing chiefly to the diminution in the circulating medium, though the best security could be given for any advances that might be made. These works too were, for the most part, to be found in districts where there existed a superabundance of labour, and then fore the pressure of the general distress would be considerably alleviated in places where relief was most imperiously required. The bill involved two principles. The Exchequer Bills were to be issued to commissioners, who were to grant them on proper security. 1st. For the carrying on of useful public works. 2dly. For the purpose of giving relief to parishes in certain cases with respect to the poor-rates. In this last point of view he admitted that he did not think the measure would be of much use: yet if there were any cases in which it might be attended with benefit, that part of the bill ought to be retained. It appeared to him that the first cause of the present distresses was, the great depreciation of landed property; but this evil was likely to be soon removed. The manufacturing interests also had suffered severely; but he did not look at them with feelings of despondency. Upon the close of the war, the ports of Europe were suddenly thrown open, and by over speculation the foreign markets were glutted to such a degree as to occasion a violent reaction. The country, too, was suffering from the effect of the late defective harvest; but the distress of Great Britain from this cause was nothing when compared with that of other countries in the western part of Europe. He had seen letters from Germany and France which presented a most appalling picture. When he looked at these special circumstances, he thought it advisable to lend the credit of the country, to a certain extent, to the promotion of its industry; and he had no doubt but that the measure would be attended with some advantage.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, it was not his intention to enter so fully into the discussion of this bill as its importance perhaps deserved. It was generally known at the beginning of the Session, that the labouring classes connected with agriculture and manufactures were in a state of extreme distress; and he had expected that Parliament would at a much earlier period have been occupied with a more extensive and efficient measure of relief; but at the close of the Session the noble earl came forward with this grant of Exchequer Bills to the amount of 1,500,000*l.*; and on such usurious terms, that few individuals would care to apply for them, more particularly, as in case of non-payment, the process of the Crown was to be issued for the recovery of the money. The noble earl himself admitted that, as far as the bill went to give relief to parishes, it would be of little use; and that its great object was the carrying on of public works; but then the impression was, that Government intended to give relief to the parishes, and the bill purported to have that object. The consequence would be, that if the relief was not afforded, the poorer classes would blame the country gentlemen. There was already a sufficient tendency to blame and pull down the proprietors, without fostering that sort of spirit by such a measure as this. If that part of the bill must prove abortive, why not leave it out? The only effect of it must be to create an idea that Government intended to relieve the parishes, but that the relief was withheld by the rich. The noble earl had ascribed the present distress to bad harvests, the sudden transition from a state of war to a state of peace, glutted markets, superfluity of labour, and diminished demand. He (Earl L.) believed that these were very subordinate causes. The real cause, if he might speak out, was twenty years of war, in which this country and others had expended a larger portion of capital than had ever been expended in any former war; and in the transfer of that capital from the hands of those who before held it, into the hands of others, an artificial expenditure had been produced which created an artificial demand for labour, and that again had increased the population of the country; so that when the unnatural demand for labour ceased, a great part of that population was left without employment. If that was the real cause of the evil, where was the prospect of relief from this plan? The object of it was merely to create an artificial demand for labour; or, in other words, to keep that cause in force which had produced the evil. Suppose one whose health had been injured by over-drinking of ardent spirits were brought to the noble earl to be cured, the noble earl would, upon his principle, prescribe two drams a day. Then all this money was to be repaid in two years, or to be recovered by the process of the Crown: but in what a condition would the country be, when the money should be withdrawn? Works would be begun, and employment would be created, which, on withdrawing the money, would be stopped; so that the scheme would be attended with the double mischief of keeping up an artificial demand for labour, which must soon cease, and annihilating a demand for labour, which would otherwise arise in the natural progress of things. It was material also, to observe, looking at the measure as intended for the relief of the poor, that the demand which it would create would be a demand for the best labourers. When the speculators got the money, they would naturally look out for the best and cheapest labourers from all parts of the country, without the least regard to the particular district in which the works might be carried on. They had an example of the consequences of an expenditure rashly begun in the project of the Caledonian Canal. One of its objects was, to give employment to the Highlanders at home. What was the result? The money being once given, the managers looked out for the cheapest labourers, and instead of employing Highlanders, they had transplanted an Irish colony to the Highlands. Then it was also to be observed, that it required no small discrimination to find out what works were proper objects of encouragement. The Board of Commissioners was to consist partly of London merchants. Such a Board he did not think well calculated for the purposes of the measure; and, at any rate, it was impossible that the investigation could be properly completed in time to render this scheme efficient as a plan of relief. The noble earl had said, that measures of this kind had been adopted on two former occasions. What was the nature of the first occasion? A great quantity of commodities had been prepared, calculated for a demand in time of peace. A war broke out, and the demand was suddenly stopped. Exchequer Bills were issued to those who held these goods, on the security of the goods and their own bills, to enable them to keep the articles till a better market offered. The measure then produced great benefit, and was well executed. But what resemblance had that, or the other measure to which the noble earl referred, to this project? This mode of relief, if it was good for anything, must be perma-
